sals were missing. Among the well known people who were in evidence were Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Dr. Cabot, Miss Rice, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Miss Sturgis, Mrs. N. U. Walker, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mrs. John Reece, of Longwood, Mrs. Thomas Mack, Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and daughters, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Estes, Mrs. William H. Prior, Miss Ada Langley Briggs, Mrs. Lowell, of Newton, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mrs. H. W. Dodd, Miss Harriet A. Shaw, Mrs. Will H. Cook, Miss Lyman, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis.

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Orchestra Begins Its Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its twelfth season on Saturday evening at the Music Hall with a performance of the following programme: Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Prelude and "Love-Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and the Kaiser March of the same composer. The orchestra, materially the same as last season, but somewhat differently and much better placed upon the stage, played in the conventional manner of the past three seasons, although at times with less roughness in the strings. The wood wind, however, still preserves the coarseness concerning which so much has been written in these columns, while the brass was as boisterous and violently overblown, as it has been ever since the present incumbent has had the direction of the orchestra.

In the Beethoven symphony, which was read without exaggeration and in most reasonable tempo, the strings played with much delicacy and a fine discrimination of the composer's indications, but the tranquillity, repose and refinement suggested by the efforts of the strings was immediately destroyed when the wind instruments came in. There was a lack of precision at times in the efforts of the players, and the wood wind was out of tune oftener than it should be with such skilful players as compose the members of this department. Strange to say, the first oboe offended in this respect. The compositions given being familiar ones call for no critical review. A praiseworthy feature of this opening concert was the short duration of the programme—a feature it is to be hoped which will prevail for the rest of the season. Last season it was the rule rather than the exception that the programmes were over-long and tedious. Next Saturday evening the orchestra will play "King Manfred" overture by Reinecke; concerto for piano in C minor, No. 4, by Saint-Saens. Mr. Carl Stasny, soloist; and Tschalkowsky's Fifth Symphony in B minor, given for the first time in Boston. An interesting programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The friends and acquaintances of young Huntz of the Symphony orchestra predict, I understand, a brilliant future for him. During the summer he has been, I believe, in Bayreuth, the Wagner Mecca, playing in the orchestra there, so that it is clear he means not to let his most tuneful strings grow rusty from disuse. A little bird has whispered a little secret to me about this same musician that calls for congratulations. I am not at liberty to tell it yet, but it is news that will keep and shower the youth with good wishes when it comes out.

She was at the Symphony rehearsal. She was studious. She read every moment she got in a book which she held close to her eyes. I guessed that she was near sighted. The name of the book was on the cover. It was Hegel's Philosophy. I thought how wise all Boston girls are. She dropped her book. I picked it up. I was awkward unwittingly, believe me, the cover, one of those embroidered adjustable affairs, fell off. The name of the book was on the cover, this time the inner cover. It was not Hegel. It was "A Little Game, With," etc. Again I thought "how wise Boston girls are."

If everybody saw everything in the same rose-colored light, and always regarded life as a sugar-coated pill, our existence would be painfully humdrum, and we should all die of inanition and monotony. In this era of gush and rush, when one is carried along by the crowd in spite of one's self, is it not a relief to occasionally find eyes and ears that see and hear differently from our own? And this, too, when we are told constantly that one opinion is as good as another—or, "what you say is just right. I agree with it perfectly," style of argument. Now, I understand that, unless one falls into the gushing attitude in respect to the Symphony concerts, it is a criminal offence, and one is accused of being antagonistic or "down" on somebody or other for wondering at the very expensive audience submitting to the inexpensive—well, let that pass! The selection of soloists, like kissing, goes by favor, but there are true music lovers who wish there might be no soloists, good, bad or indifferent, at any Symphony concert. At all events, the wild patronage of the 12th season proves that people go to these concerts because they are the fashion, and not for the fine orchestral playing heard at them. As the season has just begun, and soloists of startling fame are yet to come, it is suggested that Boston be given a chance to listen to artists with whom it is not familiar, that the orchestra men who usually appear as soloists give place to their peers or superiors from other cities. Native talent is not resident talent in this instance. And, apropos of this, a promise my young Boston composer, whose works were much praised by the great little man now at the head of our musical art, was told by him to go and study in Munich or Leipzig for a while, and then the Boston orchestra would gladly bring out the compositions! Nothing can go in musical Boston without a German cachet, it seems, but the young composer is willing to bide his time, and to go on writing music to please himself, knowing that even Beethoven did not finish his musical education by a few studies in Munich!

Another story is flying about that bears on this same Germanized taste monopoly, and it is so good it deserves printing. Not a hundred years ago a youthful artist desired to give a concert, and for attractions engaged at his own price a well known leader of the Symphony orchestra to assist. The programme was made out, and all was satisfactorily arranged when this first violin flicked at the introduction of a certain composition by a young musician whose ability is well recognized here. "Was anything wrong about it?" "Oh, no, not at all; but if this work was played it would cost the gentleman $50!" The thrifty leader of the famous quartet could not play a new American piece without proper remuneration over and above the regular price.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first Symphony concert of the new season had not altogether an important program. A more noble symphony for an opening selection than Beethoven's C minor could not easily have been chosen, but very poor taste was shown in placing at the other end of the program the noisy Kaiser Marsch, by Richard Wagner, which contains, perhaps, the most irreverent and un-scholarly arrangement of Luther's "Ein fest Burg" that a composer of any importance could easily concoct. The enormous difficulties of the "Tristan and Isolde" vespers and finale were ably mastered, and the reproduction of the well-known love scenes in the second act was broadly interpreted.

As it was a Beethoven-Wagner concert, Mr. Nikisch would have shown exceptional taste had he selected instead of Beethoven's No. 5 the "Heroic Symphony," as this master-piece was especially dear to Wagner. It would consume too much time to discuss the original features of Mr. Nikisch's leading of the Symphony, which furthermore were by no means so numerous as when the work was performed under his direction several years ago. Mr. Nikisch is gradually becoming a conservator, and although there was an excusable roughness and lack of precision in the performance of the opening allegro of the Symphony, the remaining movements were remarkably well played. The finale allegro was given out with extraordinary energy, strong rhythmical accentuation and telling power in the climaxes, and it was received almost rapturously by the audience.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The new series of Symphony concerts began with a programme of excellent and commendable brevity, although so composed otherwise as to be rather exacting upon attention and strength. It began with Beethoven's fifth symphony, which is in itself nearly enough for an evening's hearing and necessarily makes almost anything which can be placed after it appear weak and cold, unless this be some composition which makes a distinct contrast by its levity and pleasantry. It was very well played, except that the scherzo was some degrees too slow, Mr. Nikisch keeping himself and his men fully in hand and reading the first movement—which he has been wont to exaggerate—without any extremes of pause or emphasis. Here and there there was some superabundance of force, especially in the entrances of the obbligati, but the men kept an even swing and were in entire agreement. After this were presented the prelude and "Love's Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," which seemed rambling, inconsequent and indeterminate after the ordered strength and symmetry of passion in the symphony. The growth of sound, the elaboration of instrumental volume, the restless feeling and the constant striving for something not to be attained, were splendidly shown by Mr. Nikisch, and his rendering was rewarded with long and warm applause. But the distinctly theatrical composition would have sustained itself better as expressive music had it been heard before the symphony. The only other work was Wagner's "Kaiser" march, which sublimation of massive tone and splendor was led through with immense vigor and perfect picturesqueness, and made its usual exciting impression.

The rearrangement of the orchestra appears to be a good one. By dividing the double-basses between the two wings, their occasional thickness and heaviness of compact tone will be relieved, and the wooden wind and middle strings will gain by coming into the centre. Possibly the brass may be found too resonant in its new position, with all its mouths directed straight forward; but judicious management could correct that. The kettle-drummer also comes nearer the middle of the rear line, where, let us hope, it will be easier to control his obstreperous disposition. The little platforms on which the orchestra's semicircle is built up are stained a pleasant red, and so is Mr. Nikisch's dais, over which a great white fur robe is thrown. The programme books are to be compiled by Mr. W. F. Apthorp, whose first specimen was as learned and light as an encyclopædia.

The programme for tonight begins and ends with a novelty—Reinecke's "King Manfred" overture, and Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony. Between these will be played the fourth piano-forte concerto of Saint-Saëns, the soloist being Mr. Stansy of the New England Conservatory, who is a strong and showy executant.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The First Symphony Concert of the Season.

Concerning the Arrangement of an Orchestra.

Sundry Appearances of Jupiter in Opera.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season '92-'93, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. There was a large audience. Mr. Nikisch was welcomed warmly, and hearty applause followed each number of the programme. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....	Beethoven
Vorspiel and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde".....	Wagner
Kaiser-Marsch.....	Wagner

The symphony was in its proper place. When such an elaborate composition is heard toward the end of a concert the music falls on sated or dulled ears. Beethoven himself knew this. On the third page of the first violin part of the Heroic Symphony, which was published in 1806, is this remark in Italian: "This symphony is longer than the ordinary symphony. It should be played at the beginning and not at the end of a concert, after an overture, air or perhaps a concerto. If it appears too late it will not affect the hearer as the composer intended, for the faculty of hearing will have been fatigued by the preceding compositions."

The symphony was read with sane and musical feeling. There was an absence of the theatrical exaggeration that characterized the performance of Nov. 9, 1889, and provoked acrid discussion, and, in certain instances, family strife. With the exception of an occasional lack of precision, it was finely played.

The chromatic groanings and moanings of the music from "Tristan" were treated with reverential appreciation by the orchestra and by many of the hearers. But the constant straining after effect and the hysterical promises of the composer that are never fulfilled seemed tawdry after the noble work of Beethoven.

I believe that the Kaiser March was last heard at a Symphony concert in January, 1886. One performance in six years is enough. This blatant galimatias, this combination of reminiscences of "Die Meistersinger" and "Tannhauser," which jostle constantly a famous choral, is better adapted to the circus ring than the concert hall. It was that sturdy patriot, Heinrich Dorn, the teacher of Schumann, who

The friends and acquaintances of young Kuntz of the Symphony orchestra predict, I understand, a brilliant future for him. During the summer he has been, I believe, in Beyreuth, the Wagner Mecca, playing in the orchestra there, so that it is clear he means not to let his most tuneful strings grow rusty from disuse. A little bird has whispered a little secret to me about this same musician that calls for congratulations. I am not at liberty to tell it yet, but it is news that will keep and shower the youth with good wishes when it comes out.

She was at the Symphony rehearsal. She was studious. She read every moment she got in a book which she held close to her eyes. I guessed that she was near sighted. The name of the book was on the cover. It was Hegel's Philosophy. I thought how wise all Boston girls are. She dropped her book. I picked it up. I was awkward unwittingly, believe me, the cover, one of those embroidered adjustable affairs, fell off. The name of the book was on the cover, this time the inner cover. It was not Hegel. It was "A Little Game, With," etc. Again I thought "how wise Boston girls are."

If everybody saw everything in the same rose-colored light, and always regarded life as a sugar-coated pill, our existence would be painfully humdrum, and we should all die of inanition and monotony. In this era of gush and rush, when one is carried along by the crowd in spite of one's self, is it not a relief to occasionally find eyes and ears that see and hear differently from our own? And this, too, when we are told constantly that one opinion is as good as another—or, "what you say is just right." I agree with it perfectly, style of argument. Now, I understand that, unless one falls into the gushing attitude in respect to the Symphony concerts, it is a criminal offence, and one is accused of being antagonistic or "down" on somebody or other for wondering at the very expensive audience submitting to the inexpensive—well, let that pass! The selection of soloists, like kissing, goes by favor, but there are true music lovers who wish there might be no soloists, good, bad or indifferent, at any Symphony concert. At all events, the wild patronage of the 12th season proves that people go to these concerts because they are the fashion, and not for the fine orchestral playing heard at them. As the season has just begun, and soloists of startling fame are yet to come, it is suggested that Boston be given a chance to listen to artists with whom it is not familiar, that the orchestra men who usually appear as soloists give place to their peers or superiors from other cities. Native talent is not resident talent in this instance. And, apropos of this, a promising young Boston composer, whose works were much praised by the great little man now at the head of our musical art, was told by him to go and study in Munich or Leipsic for a while, and then the Boston orchestra would gladly bring out the compositions! Nothing can go in musical Boston without a German cachet, it seems, but the young composer is willing to bide his time, and to go on writing music to please himself, knowing that even Beethoven did not finish his musical education by a few studies in Munich!

Another story is flying about that bears on this same Germanized taste monopoly, and it is so good it deserves printing. Not a hundred years ago a youthful artist desired to give a concert, and for attractions engaged at his own price a well known leader of the Symphony orchestra to assist. The programme was made out, and all was satisfactorily arranged when this first violin kicked at the introduction of a certain composition by a young musician whose ability is well recognized here. "Was anything wrong about it?" "Oh, no, not at all; but if this work was played it would cost the gentleman $50!" The thrifty leader of the famous quartet could not play a new American piece without proper remuneration over and above the regular price.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The first Symphony concert of the new season had not altogether an important program. A more noble symphony for an opening selection than Beethoven's C minor could not easily have been chosen, but very poor taste was shown in placing at the other end of the program the noisy Kaiser March, by Richard Wagner, which contains, perhaps, the most irreverent and un-scholarly arrangement of Luther's "Ein' fest Burg" that a composer of any importance could easily concoct. The enormous difficulties of the "Tristan and Isolde" voespiel and finale were ably mastered, and the reproduction of the well-known love scenes in the second act was broadly interpreted.

As it was a Beethoven-Wagner concert, Mr. Nikisch would have shown exceptional taste had he selected instead of Beethoven's No. 5 the "Heroic Symphony," as this master-piece was especially dear to Wagner. It would consume too much time to discuss the original features of Mr. Nikisch's leading of the Symphony, which furthermore were by no means so numerous as when the work was performed under his direction several years ago. Mr. Nikisch is gradually becoming a conservator, and although there was an excusable roughness and lack of precision in the performance of the opening allegro of the Symphony, the remaining movements were remarkably well played. The finale allegro was given out with extraordinary energy, strong rhythmical accentuation and telling power in the climaxes, and it was received almost rapturously by the audience.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The new series of Symphony concerts began with a programme of excellent and commendable brevity, although so composed otherwise as to be rather exacting upon attention and strength. It began with Beethoven's fifth symphony, which is in itself nearly enough for an evening's hearing and necessarily makes almost anything which can be placed after it appear weak and cold, unless this be some composition which makes a distinct contrast by its levity and pleasantry. It was very well played, except that the scherzo was some degrees too slow, Mr. Nikisch keeping himself and his men fully in hand and reading the first movement—which he has been wont to exaggerate—without any extremes of pause or emphasis. Here and there there was some superabundance of force, especially in the entrances of the obbligati, but the men kept an even swing and were in entire agreement. After this were presented the prelude and "Love's Death" from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," which seemed rambling, inconsequent and indeterminate after the ordered strength and symmetry of passion in the symphony. The growth of sound, the elaboration of instrumental volume, the restless feeling and the constant striving for something not to be attained, were splendidly shown by Mr. Nikisch, and his rendering was rewarded with long and warm applause. But the distinctly theatrical composition would have sustained itself better as expressive music had it been heard before the symphony. The only other work was Wagner's "Kaiser" march, which sublimation of massive tone and splendor was led through with immense vigor and perfect picturesqueness, and made its usual exciting impression.

The rearrangement of the orchestra appears to be a good one. By dividing the double-basses between the two wings, their occasional thickness and heaviness of compact tone will be relieved, and the wooden wind and middle strings will gain by coming into the centre. Possibly the brass may be found too resonant in its new position, with all its mouths directed straight forward; but judicious management could correct that. The kettle-drummer also comes nearer the middle of the rear line, where, let us hope, it will be easier to control his obstreperous disposition. The little platforms on which the orchestra's semicircle is built up are stained a pleasant red, and so is Mr. Nikisch's dais, over which a great white fur robe is thrown. The programme books are to be compiled by Mr. W. F. Apthorp, whose first specimen was as learned and light as an encyclopædia.

The programme for tonight begins and ends with a novelty—Reinecke's "King Manfred" overture, and Tchaikowsky's fifth symphony. Between these will be played the fourth piano-forte concerto of Saint-Saëns, the soloist being Mr. Stansy of the New England Conservatory, who is a strong and showy executant.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The First Symphony Concert of the Season.

Concerning the Arrangement of an Orchestra.

Sundry Appearances of Jupiter in Opera.

The first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season '92-'93, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. There was a large audience. Mr. Nikisch was welcomed warmly, and hearty applause followed each number of the programme. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 5.....Beethoven
Vorspiel and "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Kaiser-Marsch.....Wagner

The symphony was in its proper place. When such an elaborate composition is heard toward the end of a concert the music falls on sated or dulled ears. Beethoven himself knew this. On the third page of the first violin part of the Heroic Symphony, which was published in 1806, is this remark in Italian: "This symphony is longer than the ordinary symphony. It should be played at the beginning and not at the end of a concert, after an overture, air or perhaps a concerto. If it appears too late it will not affect the hearer as the composer intended, for the faculty of hearing will have been fatigued by the preceding compositions."

The symphony was read with sane and musical feeling. There was an absence of the theatrical exaggeration that characterized the performance of Nov. 9, 1889, and provoked acrid discussion, and, in certain instances, family strife. With the exception of an occasional lack of precision, it was finely played.

The chromatic groanings and moanings of the music from "Tristan" were treated with reverential appreciation by the orchestra and by many of the hearers. But the constant straining after effect and the hysterical promises of the composer that are never fulfilled seemed tawdry after the noble work of Beethoven.

I believe that the Kaiser March was last heard at a Symphony concert in January, 1886. One performance in six years is enough. This blatant galimatias, this combination of reminiscences of "Die Meistersinger" and "Tannhaeuser," which jostle constantly a famous choral, is better adapted to the circus ring than the concert hall. It was that sturdy patriot, Heinrich Dorn, the teacher of Schumann, who of this latest outbreak of Wagner cannot be regarded otherwise than as an insult against the sublime majesty of the Emperor of Germany."

48

The orchestra is now arranged so that the wind instruments of wood and brass with the pulsatile instruments form a solid body directly in front of the leader. The strings stretch to the left and the right, and the double basses, divided, fringe the back of the stage and its further sides. The grouping is to be commended. It was thought in the eighteenth century that the double basses, cellos and bassoons should be dispersed throughout the orchestra. As Rousseau quaintly expressed it, "It is the bass that should regulate and sustain all the other parts, and all the players should hear it equally." We know how the celebrated orchestra of the Dresden opera under Hasse was arranged. The conductor was in the middle of the raised space, seated before a clavier. Behind him was a violoncello as well as a double bass. The first violins were at his right hand in a line. The second violins were on the same side, but nearer the stage. The other cellos and double basses were at the extreme ends. The violas were between the first and second violins. All of the wind instruments, with the exception of the trumpets, were on the left of the conductor. The oboes were nearest the stage and the bassoons were close to the conductor. The drums and the trumpets were on raised platforms at the sides.

The famous chorus and orchestra of the Paris Conservatory are arranged as follows: Sixteen first sopranos and 16 second sopranos are at the left of the conductor; at his right are 10 first tenors and 10 second tenors. Directly in front of him are 10 first basses and 10 second basses. To the left of the basses, as the hearer faces the stage, are 15 first violins; to the right, 14 second violins. The first and the second violins face each other. Behind the basses is the harp. Then come 10 violas facing the conductor. The next line is made up of 2 clarinets, 2 oboes, 2 flutes, piccolo, 4 cellos and 2 double basses. Behind this line are 4 horns, 4 bassoons and 4 cellos. Behind them are 2 trumpets, 3 double basses, 4 cellos and 2 double basses. Three trombones and 2 double basses are next in order, and the tuba and pulsatile instruments bring up the rear.

49
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

REINECKE.

OVERTURE, "King Manfred."
(First time in Boston.)

SAINT-SAËNS.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in C minor.
Allegro moderato; Andante.—
Allegro vivace; Andante; Allegro.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

SYMPHONY No. 5 in E minor.
Andante.—Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.—
Valse (Allegro moderato).—Finale (Andante maestoso).
(First time in Boston.)

SOLOIST:

MR. CARL STASNY.

The Pianoforte is a Miller.

48 declared in 1871 that "the barbarous vulgarity of this latest outbreak of Wagner cannot be regarded otherwise than as an insult against the sublime majesty of the Emperor of Germany."

The orchestra is now arranged so that the wind instruments of wood and brass with the pulsatile instruments form a solid body directly in front of the leader. The strings stretch to the left and the right, and the double basses, divided, fringe the back of the stage and its further sides. The grouping is to be commended. It was thought in the eighteenth century that the double basses, cellos and bassoons should be dispersed throughout the orchestra. As Rousseau quaintly expressed it, "It is the bass that should regulate and sustain all the other parts, and all the players should hear it equally." We know how the celebrated orchestra of the Dresden opera under Hasse was arranged. The conductor was in the middle of the railed space, seated before a clavier. Behind him was a violoncello as well as a double bass. The first violins were at his right hand in a line. The second violins were on the same side, but nearer the stage. The other cellos and double basses were at the extreme ends. The violas were between the first and second violins. All of the wind instruments, with the exception of the trumpets, were on the left of the conductor. The oboes were nearest the stage and the bassoons were close to the conductor. The drums and the trumpets were on raised platforms at the sides.

The famous chorus and orchestra of the Paris Conservatory are arranged as follows: Sixteen first sopranos and 16 second sopranos are at the left of the conductor; at his right are 10 first tenors and 10 second tenors. Directly in front of him are 10 first basses and 10 second basses. To the left of the basses, as the hearer faces the stage, are 15 first violins; to the right, 14 second violins. The first and the second violins face each other. Behind the basses is the harp. Then come 10 violas facing the conductor. The next line is made up of 2 clarinets, 2 oboes, 2 flutes, piccolo, 4 cellos and 2 double basses. Behind this line are 4 horns, 4 bassoons and 4 cellos. Behind them are 2 trumpets, 3 double basses, 4 cellos and 2 double basses. Three trombones and 2 double basses are next in order, and the tuba and pulsatile instruments bring up the rear.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

REINECKE.

OVERTURE, "King Manfred."
(First time in Boston.)

SAINT-SAËNS.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in C minor.
Allegro moderato; Andante.—
Allegro vivace; Andante; Allegro.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

SYMPHONY No. 5 in E minor.
Andante.—Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza.—
Valse (Allegro moderato).—Finale (Andante maestoso).
(First time in Boston.)

SOLOIST:

MR. CARL STASNY.

The Pianoforte is a Miller.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Reinecke: Overture to "King Manfred."

Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor.

Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 5, in E minor.

Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist.

Carl Reinecke's overture proved itself to be one of those works which can easily stand in the first rank of Kapellmeister-Musik; indeed, it takes quite an enormous amount of musical knowledge to write anything so good. Naturally, when a man like Reinecke allows himself to write as nearly in the Schumann vein as he does here, he inevitably weakens the impression produced by his work—if only from the amount of water he puts into his (or Schumann's) wine being the more easily detected. But, Kapellmeister-Musik though it be, it is admirably well-written music; the themes are flowing and natural, if without especial distinction; the construction is stout and finely organized; some clever passages in the working-out just fall short of showing inspiration. Still, it must be owned that a commonplace man in the fine arts is, in general, a dangerous customer to count with; where native nobility of feeling is lacking, acquired elegance of expression is not always to be relied on. A composer who has not genius cannot invariably be trusted to have even artistic good taste. Reinecke could not let his overture go without one serious blemish; at one point he really allows himself to get worked up to red heat, and so lets himself do what second-rate men usually do when they dare to throw off self-consciousness—he becomes downright vulgar. In that glowing apotheosis of a sentimental second theme, near the close of his overture, he well cuts his Schumann and Mendelssohn moorings and drifts into the vein of Flotow's overture to "Martha." The orchestra played the overture (it was its first performance in Boston) splendidly.

Of the new Tschaikowsky symphony one hardly knows what to say. It is an immensely long and elaborate work, the first movement of which one might almost venture to describe as masterly. Nowhere else have we found Tschaikowsky so thoroughly imbued with the true spirit of symphonic writing as in this first movement, the only apparent blemish in which is that the coda adds nothing new either in style or essence, nothing that we have not already heard in the working-out. For elaboration, for the amount of solid work there is in it, this movement compares well with the first movement of the composer's B-flat minor concerto; but it is less untamed in spirit, less recklessly harsh in its polyphonic writing, less indicative of the composer's disposition to swear a theme's way through a stone wall. It is none the less evidently Slavic in spirit, however, and is brilliant as it is stoutly built and coherent. The slow movement we like less; the themes are melodious, if you will, but seem rather weak and merely Goldmarkian-sensuous; the working-out is tediously protracted, and the general impression tiresome. The waltz, which takes the place of the traditional scherzo (third movement), shows nothing in its intrinsic character nor workmanship to make good its claim to a place in a symphony. In the finale, we find Tschaikowsky at his old tricks again; here we have all the untamed fury of the Cossack whetting itself for deeds of atrocity against all the sterility of the Russian steppes. The furious peroration sounds like nothing so much as a horde of demons struggling in a torrent of brandy, the music growing drunker and drunker, until it gradually forgets what it is trying to do. Pandemonium, delirium tremens, raving, and above all, noise worse confounded! The instrumentation in the whole symphony is vigorous, but, as it struck us, tending too often toward coarseness. But the first movement is something to take off one's hat to.

Saint-Saëns's fourth concerto can hardly be placed upon a level with his second, in G minor; but it is, nevertheless, an admirably written, clear, human and delightful work. Its singular economy in thematic material never amounts to poverty; if it never show great depth of feeling, it gives evidence of no little poetic imaginativeness and beauty; the means employed are always adequate to the end striven after. It is a wonder of artistic savoir faire. Mr. Stasny played it creditably, with good self-reliance and energy, if without any especially striking display of brilliancy or warmth of sentiment. But his playing was simple, straightforward, and free from all unworthy trickery. He was warmly applauded at the end.

The next programme is: Dvorák, suite for orchestra; Weber, aria from "Oberon;" Philipp Scharwenka, symphonic poem, "Frühlingswo-gen;" Liszt, song with orchestra, "Die Lore-ley;" Gade, symphony in B-flat major. Miss Emma Juch will be the singer.

SYMPHONY.

Seats for Rehearsals and Concerts at Low Prices for Season or Single Performance. An early call will secure good seats at

CASHIN'S Ticket Office,
Young's Hotel.

2t[A]

Telephone 1010.

o 20

REHEARSAL SEATS

TO LET

For Friday, in all parts of hall—$1.00 and upwards.

CONNELLY TICKET OFFICE,
ADAMS HOUSE.

2t[A]

o 19

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Floor—C 28, 29, $45; 1095, 1096, $35 each; Balcony—57, 58, $45; 260, $35; 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, $32; 381, 382, 396, 397, 398, $30; 462, $25 each.

Tickets unsold will be let on the day of the concert.

John R. Heard, 43 West St.,

Theatre Tickets.

Telephone 3544.

2t[A]

o 19

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Carl Stasny, Soloist, at the Symphony Concert.

"Fadette" Pleases at the Tremont Theatre—"Jupiter" Wins a Favor at the Globe Theatre—Cyril Tyler Artistic Triumphs—"The Fencing Master" Coming—The Park "Pops."

Director Nikisch gave the Symphony concert patrons ample food for thought last evening, as he presented a programme of three works, all of which were unfamiliar to local musicians.

The overture to Reinecke's opera, "Manfred," opened the programme, and had a first hearing here. It is certainly an excellent composition in the modern style, which does not bear the imprint of Wagnerian tendencies, the ideas having in some ways the characteristics of Schumann in his clearest and most melodious mood, while the scoring is of the Mendelssohn style. The principal theme is of a beauty well worth the skilful development given it, and the composition, as a whole, is admirably suited for the concert room. It was played with splendid effect by the orchestra, and its merit was instantly recognized and applauded.

The piano concert (or more properly fantasia with orchestra) by Saint-Saens, No. 4, in C minor, was the work selected by Mr. Carl Stasny for his first appearance here with orchestra, and the remarkable success attending his performance justified his choice of it. Only a single hearing of this concerto has been had here, and that was so many years ago that the concerto made practically a novelty. It is an admirably written work for the display of a pianist's accomplishments as well as a most enjoyable composition for all music lovers. It has some "tunes" in it that serve the composer well in supplying themes entirely worthy of the skill shown in their elaboration and development, and which give thorough satisfaction to the melodious music lover. The composer has well nigh exhausted the possibilities of the piano in this concerto, and its performance makes demands not easily met even by the most accomplished player.

In his playing Mr. Stasny showed so many good points that the concerto quite readily assumed great prominence in the evening's programme, and the opportunity for a correct estimate of the concerto was easily gained in following his reading of the work. He is a singularly clear and intelligent interpreter of this brilliant French composition, and the artistic fashion in which he performed the piano score of the concerto, instantly arrested attention and gave the player an audience in sympathy with his methods.

Mr. Stasny is a thoroughly well equipped pianist, having not only a clear musical insight but a control of his instrument which enables him to develop his ideas of the composition in hand in the most lucid manner. He has a clear, clean, and sympathetic tone, with ample and well controlled power, his technical attainments are equal to the most intricate difficulties of the modern school, and, all in all, he is a most enjoyable player. This estimate of his abilities appeared to be held by the audience, as the applause which rewarded his appearance was of the most pronounced character.

In bringing forward the Tchaikowsky symphony No. 5, in E minor, as one of the early novelties of the season on this occasion, Conductor Nikisch added a most notable work to the orchestra's repertoire, and one which is worthy of more than a single hearing.

This masterly musician is at his best in this his most recent symphonic composition, for it displays his genius as a writer for the modern orchestra, his rare skill in the combination of instruments and his originality in producing effects which charm the listener upon even a first hearing of the work. Tchaikowsky to be sure shows his appreciation of the fun of musical ideas to be had by a study of his national folk songs, but this source of melodic forms is so unfamiliar that his recourse to it is never ill-advised.

His fifth symphony consists of the following movement: Andante, andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza, valse (allegro moderato) and finale (andante maestoso).

The composer has held to symphonic traditions mainly in this work, the use of the valse movement in the place of the usual scherzo being the most prominent departure from accepted forms. It is throughout a thoroughly enjoyable composition, and is so straightforward in its themes and their development that little analytical study is demanded to appreciate its full worth.

It was played in a superb style, and the mastery of the work shown by the orchestra in Mr. Nikisch's baton called out an unusual demonstration after each of the movements.

For the concert next Saturday Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist, and the programme will be Dvorak's suite for orchestra, Weber's aria from "Oberon," Philipp Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Fruehlingswoge" (first time in Boston), Liszt's song with orchestra, "Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B-flat major.

—At the second Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, although less fully attended on account of the holiday, there were a number of new season subscribers of the society contingent who were not in town for the opening performance. Among them were Mrs. Lindall Winthrop and daughter, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Henry Winsor, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Templeman Coolidge, Mr. Nathaniel W. Curtis, Miss Florence Lyman, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Zerrahn, Miss Gertrude Rice, Mrs. George Lewis, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot Hubbard, the Misses Fairchild, and Mr. and Mrs. Eliott Pratt.

Soloists at the "Symphonies."

To the Editor:

It is to be hoped that the soloist department of the Boston Symphonies will be as carefully attended to as the other features. Why cannot more encouragement in this direction be given to our native and resident vocal artists?

Boston.

ALFRED B. HOLMES.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

adv.

THE UNIQUE PROGRAMME OF SATURDAY.

Every Number a Novelty and Greatly Enjoyed by all Connoisseurs Present—Fine Distinctions in the Musical Demands of Beethoven's Time as Compared With Today.

The programme of Saturday was one made up entirely of novelties, and it is pleasant to be able to add that these novelties were all worth the doing. Reinecke's "King Manfred" overture headed the list. The hash-eaters of modern music may declaim against such shapely works as much as they please, and may cry "Kapellmeister-musik" to their heart's content, but such an overture is enjoyable in almost every measure, and is a most effectual protest against the formlessness of much of the music of the present. It was in the main well played, and its combat and strife was not exaggerated in the reading. The brasses were not forced, as they were at the first concert, and the harp was not obliterated, but was sometimes audible. The horn was insecure, as it was at the first concert, but made ample amends by superb playing in the last number of the programme. The lesson of the work was that one is not obliged to rush through the entire 24 keys in order to express passion, but can keep within the architectural lines and still present contrast and emotion adequately.

St. Saens' C minor concerto was practically new to concert goers, and also served to introduce a new man to the audience in its solo part. Mr. Carl Stasny had been heard in small piano-recitals in Boston last year but this was the first time that he essayed a large musical task before a Boston audience. He succeeded even better than the previous recitals seemed to promise. His chief faults on the former occasions amid an excellent musicianly reading were a too muscular style, and an overuse of the pedal. In this concerto he thoroughly curbed his strength, and gave a degree of delicacy and shading that was as welcome as it was unexpected. The second fault is not yet entirely overcome, and there were a few blurs that were caused by obtrusive use of the damper pedal. The surety of the player was commendable and the ensemble was never disturbed. Mr. Stasny's record in Europe is a high one and he has played this very work to the satisfaction of rigid German criticism. He was twice recalled with hearty applause which he deserved. The concerto is brilliant in spite of its many touches of gloom. It is too vague in form, but presents much ingenuity of development, in fact in this field, St. Saens may be regarded as the greatest of living French composers. There are plenty of reminiscent touches in the first movement, and even Gounod's "Marche Funebre d'une Marionnette" came to the surface too palpably. The final treatment of a theme of popular character, half development, half variation, was the most musicianly part of the work. It is, however, not a concerto that one grows enthusiastic over at a first hearing.

We had Beethoven's fifth symphony at the preceding concert, this time came the fifth of Tchaikowsky. The works resembled each other only in the numeral; the modern tendency cannot be better illustrated than by comparing two such works; on the one side clearness, on the other turbulence; on the one side rugged power, on the other frenzy. Yet Tchaikowsky is a splendid example of the best side of modern musical treatment; it is the trend of the entire school which is wrong; the suaviter in modo seems to be abolished; repose in action is unknown.

Tchaikowsky is a master of the orchestra and of orchestral development. He lays on the colors with a sure hand, and his combinations are always interesting and sometimes entirely original. He draws royally from the folk-music of his native land, and this imparts a vigor and a characteristic style to his work that can scarcely be overestimated. It is one of the most hopeful signs in our present music, that some of the masters are beginning to draw from the great well of popular music. It was this custom that originally nourished the German school, and Luther, Bach and all the pioneers in the foundation of it, used the folk-music freely.

This symphony is strong in its use of folk-themes. But the musician since Haydn's day demands more than a mere set of tunes, he requires that the melodies presented shall be carried to logical afterthoughts and conclusions; the themes may represent the emotional side of music, but their development must add the intellectual element, and in this combination of the intellectual and emotional lies the power of the symphony. And here we find the weak spot of this work, the development (which is always chiefly in the first movement) is very prolix, but never so clear as with the older masters; the logic of music is not so well represented as of yore. There is more reliance placed on tone-color and on quaintness. The first movement is intentionally odd from first to last. A ghostly character is imparted by weird wood-wind phases. The clarinet is used in the deep, or chalumeau, register, and imparts a gloom that reminds of the spectral effects that Mendelssohn brought forth in the same manner in his Scotch symphony and Weber in the incantation scene of "Der Freischuetz." Every part of the movement is exciting in one way or other; fierce use of empty fifths is made, and there is a revelry in dissonance of audacious boldness; the bassoon is employed (and it was excellently played) in a march theme which at once recalls Berlioz's famous bassoon figure in the "March to Execution." Spite of the reminiscences, there is nothing like plagiarism in the work. So much has been done by the moderns of a generation ago, that it is impossible to avoid occasionally treading on their ground in the matter of instrumentation. Had the symphony ended with the first movement (it would then have been a noble overture) all might have been well, but the succeeding movement brought more Muscovite gloom, and the last one added such a thoroughly Russian finale that the whole feast began to take the flavor of Caviare, and become monotonous in its bizarrie. There were many good contrapuntal touches, however, as in the imitations of the chief theme of the second movement (nobly played by the first horn) and in the coda of the finale. After the sadness of the second movement had been added to the sombre tints of the first part, it was as well to use a waltz movement as the third movement of the work. It is unusual to use this in symphony, but since the waltz is the daughter of the minuet, and the minuet is admitted freely into classical forms, the employment of this rhythm is justifiable, and as intimated, it served as a good contrast. The finale seemed almost akin to a Hungarian rhapsody. It began with a slow and mournful introduction, like a lasso, and then dashed off into a wildly hilarious movement, as the Hungarian gypsy rushes into a Friska. The movement had a frenzy that reminded of the men's dance of which the Russian is so fond—the Kamarinskaia. And so the folk flavor was carried to the very end. It was too much of one school for a single hearing, and while paying all tribute to Tschai-kowsky for his deftness of instrumentation, while recognizing his skill in the modern vein of development, his counterpoint, and the inherent power of his native music, one could not but find the atmosphere of the work heavy-laden and oppressive, and wish for the purer air of the older masters. The performance was almost a perfect one; a little more repression of the brass in the finale, and it would have been quite so. The conductor seemed to delight in the wild character of the symphony, and brought out the points with skilful hand. The woodwind played finely and had much work to do, and the violins played their scale runs at the end with wonderful effect. Next Saturday the pendulum will swing back to the gentler measures of Gade.

54

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The following was the programme: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke; concerto for pianoforte, No. 4 in C minor, Saint-Saens; Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Tschai-kowsky. The overture and the symphony were given for the first time in Boston. The concerto has been played twice before, on Feb. 14, 1878, by Mr. John Preston at a Harvard symphony concert, and on Feb. 15, 1882, by Mme. Schiller with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Henschel. On Saturday evening Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist and he played with clearness and elasticity, if not with exceeding brilliancy, the piano part of Saint-Saens's commonplace and almost at times frivolous composition. He was aided in his efforts by a fine Miller grand, and was warmly applauded and recalled.

The accompaniment of the orchestra was coarse and ragged, and served at times in placing the soloist at a great disadvantage. The "King Manfred" overture, the work of the skilled but not inspired musician, with hardly a touch of tone-color in it, a work requiring the utmost contrast in the shading in order to display its qualities in the best light, was handled by the orchestra in its most approved rough and boisterous manner.

The Tschai-kowsky symphony No. 5 was first played in this country at the Philharmonic Society's concerts in New York under Theodore Thomas's direction on the evening of Jan. 8, 1890, and later in the same concerts, in March, 1891.

Although in the regular symphonic form it is nevertheless incoherent, lacking unity in the four movements. The skill of invention is exercised throughout the work in the composer's well-known manner. The orchestration is varied and richly colored. The themes, harmonies, and rhythms are profuse and characteristically displayed, being sometimes original and startling, and again ordinary and dry. The second movement is by far the best part of the work, the horn, clarinet and oboe solos in the beginning of the movement, being delightfully played by the first instruments of the orchestra, Messrs. Hackelbarth, Goldschmidt, and Sautet, the latter playing in his unrivalled manner. The bassoon has a neat bit of work later on in the movement.

The whole orchestra can be complimented for the charming and discreet manner in which it played the beginning of this movement, but from the Piu mosso on all was exaggeration. This latter can be said of the playing of the band both before and after the Andante, while the finale was forced to the point of distortion. Next Saturday evening Miss Emma Juch is to be the soloist, and there will be a suite by Dvorak and the B. Symphony of Gade upon the programme, besides a symphonic poem by Philipp Scharwenka, "Fruehlingsorgen," played for the first time in Boston.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

For sale, three seats for Saturday evenings, front row of second balcony on right-hand "staircase" side of hall. Price $20.00 each. Apply at 154 West Chester Park. TuThS(A) 18

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

FOR SALE—Desirable seats, either side, second balcony, front row. Price reasonable. Address JOS. A. GAHM, Miles' Music Store, 13 West street. 31(A) 18

TIGHT BINDING

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was well attended. The programme was: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke, which was new to Boston; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor; Saint-Saens; Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Tschai-kowsky, also new here. The overture by the Leipzig composer, in common with all his music, is put together in a thoroughly musicianly manner, and is faultless generally in form and treatment; but it is also, in common with all his music, of the chapel-master order, and has little, save its correctness, and its excellent workmanship to recommend it to attention. Reinecke has written much and well, but his music never has a trace of inspiration in it, and suggests the industrious and genial pedagogue rather than the tone poet; the skilled music manufacturer, who is never at a loss to say something, even when he has nothing to say. This overture is made with infinite care; it is polished with a deft hand, and there is not an angle in it that will not bear the most trying examination by rule and square, but that is all. It found the audience encouragingly expectant, and left them unmoved. The Tschai-kowsky symphony is a strong work in its peculiar way, vigorously Russian here and there, but, on the whole, not heavily marked by national color. It is scarcely symphonic in character, though it is in form. Dignity and vulgarity, the lofty and the trivial, are curiously, even carelessly, mingled in it. The first allegro, when its wild, Slavic harmonies are over, becomes essentially Schumanesque. The second theme is notably warm and graceful, and is beautifully treated in its orchestration. The working out is elaborate and long sustained, but the subjects are made wearisome before the composer ceases to show how often he can present them in a new light. The andante opens with a charming theme for horn solo, and the second theme is passionately sensuous, but it has a flavor of the opera house. The movement, however, is spun out and its melodies are repeated until they almost become platitudes; but it is the most interesting portion of the work. The third movement is a waltz, dignified, yet pretty and delicate, and the instrumentation here is fascinatingly piquant. The finale is a fiery and fiercely noisy movement, with not a little that is cheap and commonplace in themes and rhythms, and more that is oppressively monotonous. It is the least attractive part of the symphony; and what it all means needs some Columbus to discover; and the discovery made, it would hardly be worth the celebrating. The work was played, throughout, brilliantly, and with fine richness of tone color. The wind instruments, especially the first horn and first bassoon, on which a severe tax is made, acquitted themselves with rare skill. The concerto, by no means a great work in its class, was interpreted in the solo part, by Carl Stasny, who played neatly, and discreetly, if not with inspiring effect. He was warmly applauded and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Suite, Dvorak; Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Symphonic Poem, P. Scharwenka; "Loreley," Liszt; and Symphony in B-flat, Gade. Miss Emma Juch is to be the soloist.

The first Symphony concert drew a large audience to Music Hall, although Mrs. Gardner is still in Europe, and Mrs. Apthorp is still in the country. The conductor's stand has been decorated in such bad taste by it. The usual habits were present, including the B. J. Lunge, Winches, Footes, Tuckers, Lamsons, Warrens, Stackpoles, Rogerses, Wesselhoefes, Hassers, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mrs. Jenks, Miss Hersey, Miss Winslow, the Hechts, the Wheelwrights, Mr. Gungl, Mr. Sturgis, the Watsons, Dr. Bradford, Mr. Jackson, the Howard Walkers, the Loverings, the Hot Hubbards, the Blakes and Mr. H. W. Swift.

SYNCRISMS.

The symphony concerts are under way again, and there is rejoicing, especially among those to whom Fridays rank as red letter days, because of their afternoons. The flurry over the auction sales of the season tickets is yet fresh in the general memory, and the eager competitions and the large premiums paid for them, caused the rest of the land to open its eyes with wonder at the love of the Athens of America for music, and classical music at that; music of Brahms, and Tschai-kowsky, and Dvorak, and other tuneless off-kays and owakys. And yet there is something in this connection that puzzles me considerably. It is that so many of these symphony tickets are offered for sale in some of the papers I have seen strings of fifteen or twenty advertisements at a time, whose purport is the disposal of these tickets. I see also a surprising number of cards in shop windows, announcing that tickets are for sale within. The result is that I begin to reflect whether the exciting demand for tickets at auction was owing wholly to love of music on the part of purchasers. Not only this, but I have heard of a certain ticket speculator who went into the buying business to the extent of some fourteen thousand dollars on his own account, and has found it somewhat difficult to dispose of his purchases. Of course this, I have no means of verifying, and I give it for what it is worth; but from present appearances it would seem, after all, that the ticket speculators deserve an important place among those who contribute to the financial success of the symphony concerts, and they form no insignificant element in the halo of enthusiasm that surrounds ticket sales. Be this as it may, however, there are tickets for sale and for hire in every direction; which would seem to indicate that something must be deducted from the credit we enjoy as a city, in which a musical frenzy in connection with symphony concerts prevails to so phenomenal an extent, that season tickets cannot be had for love or money after the sales are over. I am very sorry for the speculators who find themselves with so many expensive tickets unsold. If there really be a speculator with some thousands of dollars' worth of tickets on hand, I condole with him especially. And yet, if there be the wild craving for these tickets that there is said to be, I cannot understand why he should not have disposed of his stock long ago. It is true that he may want prices for them that place them out of the reach of all but the wealthy; but he should have thought of that before he bought them. It is scarcely open to question that were it not for the speculators, the prices of tickets would not be run up to so high a figure. Rich people, of course, will have the seats that they covet, at any price; but others would be able to obtain them on more reasonable terms. But here again is illustrated the old axiom which says: "What is one man's meat is another man's poison." The higher the sums that are paid for tickets, the more it enables the projector of these concerts to meet their expenses; and if the speculator finds himself with so many unsold tickets for which he has paid cash, the management finds itself with that same cash in pocket. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good. Nevertheless, it is none the less a pity that where so many real music lovers in moderate circumstances would be happy to attend the concerts, so many tickets should be lying idle. Still, that fact does not detract from the speculator as a prominent music patron in a music centre.

flavor of Caviare, and become monotonous in its bizarrierie. There were many good contrapuntal touches, however, as in the imitations of the chief theme of the second movement (nobly played by the first horn) and in the coda of the finale. After the sadness of the second movement had been added to the sombre tints of the first part, it was as well to use a waltz movement as the third movement of the work. It is unusual to use this in symphony, but since the waltz is the daughter of the minuet, and the minuet is admitted freely into classical forms, the employment of this rhythm is justifiable, and as intimated, it served as a good contrast. The finale seemed almost akin to a Hungarian rhapsody. It began with a slow and mournful introduction, like a lasso, and then dashed off into a wildly hilarious movement, as the Hungarian gypsy rushes into a Friska. The movement had a frenzy that reminded of the men's dance of which the Russian is so fond—the Kamarinskaia. And so the folk flavor was carried to the very end. It was too much of one school for a single hearing, and while paying all tribute to Tschai-kowsky for his deftness of instrumentation, while recognizing his skill in the modern vein of development, his counterpoint, and the inherent power of his native music, one could not but find the atmosphere of the work heavy-laden and oppressive, and wish for the purer air of the older masters. The performance was almost a perfect one; a little more repression of the brass in the finale, and it would have been quite so. The conductor seemed to delight in the wild character of the symphony, and brought out the points with skilful hand. The woodwind played finely and had much work to do, and the violins played their scale runs at the end with wonderful effect. Next Saturday the pendulum will swing back to the gentler measures of Gade.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The following was the programme: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke; concerto for pianoforte, No. 4 in C minor, Saint-Saens; Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Tschai-kowsky. The overture and the symphony were given for the first time in Boston. The concerto has been played twice before, on Feb. 14, 1878, by Mr. John Preston at a Harvard symphony concert, and on Feb. 15, 1882, by Mme. Schiller with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Henschel. On Saturday evening Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist and he played with clearness and elasticity, if not with exceeding brilliancy, the piano part of Saint-Saens's commonplace and almost at times frivolous composition. He was aided in his efforts by a fine Miller grand, and was warmly applauded and recalled.

The accompaniment of the orchestra

was coarse and ragged, and served at times in placing the soloist at a great disadvantage. The "King Manfred" overture, the work of the skilled but not inspired musician, with hardly a touch of tone-color in it, a work requiring the utmost contrast in the shading in order to display its qualities in the best light, was handled by the orchestra in its most approved rough and boisterous manner.

The Tschai-kowsky symphony No. 5 was first played in this country at the Philharmonic Society's concerts in New York under Theodore Thomas's direction on the evening of Jan. 8, 1890, and later in the same concerts, in March, 1891.

Although in the regular symphonic form it is nevertheless incoherent, lacking unity in the four movements. The skill of invention is exercised throughout the work in the composer's well-known manner. The orchestration is varied and richly colored. The themes, harmonies, and rhythms are profuse and characteristically displayed, being sometimes original and startling, and again ordinary and dry. The second movement is by far the best part of the work, the horn, clarinet and oboe solos in the beginning of the movement, being delightfully played by the first instruments of the orchestra, Messrs. Hackelbarth, Goldschmidt, and Sautet, the latter playing in his unrivalled manner. The bassoon has a neat bit of work later on in the movement.

The whole orchestra can be complimented for the charming and discreet manner in which it played the beginning of this movement, but from the Piu mosso on all was exaggeration. This latter can be said of the playing of the band both before and after the Andante, while the finale was forced to the point of distortion. Next Saturday evening Miss Emma Juch is to be the soloist, and there will be a suite by Dvorak and the B-flat Symphony of Gade upon the programme, besides a symphonic poem by Philipp Scharwenka, "Fruehlingsorgen," played for the first time in Boston.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

For sale, three seats for Saturday evenings, front row of second balcony on right-hand "staircase" side of hall. Price $20.00 each. Apply at 154 West Chestnut Park. TuThS(A) o 18

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

FOR SALE—Desirable seats, either side, second balcony, front row. Price reasonable. Address JOS. A. GAHM, Miles' Music Store, 13 West street. 31(A) o 18

TIGHT BINDING

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was well attended. The programme was: Overture, "King Manfred," Reinecke, which was new to Boston; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor; Saint-Saens; Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Tschai-kowsky, also new here. The overture by the Leipzig composer, in common with all his music, is put together in a thoroughly musicianly manner, and is faultless generally in form and treatment; but it is also, in common with all his music, of the chapel-master order, and has little, save its correctness, and its excellent workmanship to recommend it to attention. Reinecke has written much and well, but his music never has a trace of inspiration in it, and suggests the industrious and genial pedagogue rather than the tone poet; the skilled music manufacturer, who is never at a loss to say something even when he has nothing to say. This overture is made with infinite care; it joins it into each other with the closest exactness, it is polished with a deft hand, and there is not an angle in it that will not bear the most trying examination by rule and square, but that is all. It found the audience encouragingly expectant, and left them unmoved. The Tschai-kowsky symphony is a strong work in its peculiar way, vigorously Russian here and there, but, on the whole, not heavily marked by national color. It is scarcely symphonic in character, though it is in form. Dignity and vulgarity, the lofty and the trivial, are curiously, even carelessly, mingled in it. The first allegro, when its wild, Slavic harmonies are over, becomes essentially Schumanesque. The second theme is notably warm and graceful, and is beautifully treated in its orchestration. The working out is elaborate and long sustained, but the subjects are made wearisome before the composer ceases to show how often he can present them in a new light. The andante opens with a charming theme for horn solo, and the second theme is passionately sensuous, but it has a flavor of the opera house. The movement, however, is spun out and its melodies are repeated until they almost become platitudes; but it is the most interesting portion of the work. The third movement is a waltz, dignified, yet pretty and delicate, and the instrumentation here is fascinatingly piquant. The finale is a fiery and fiercely noisy movement, with not a little that is cheap and commonplace in themes and rhythms, and more that is oppressively monotonous. It is the least attractive part of the symphony; and what it all means needs some Columbus to discover; and the discovery made, it would hardly be worth the celebrating. The work was played, throughout, brilliantly, and with fine richness of tone color. The wind instruments, especially the first horn and first bassoon, on which a severe tax is made, acquitted themselves with rare skill. The concerto, by no means a great work in its class, was interpreted in the solo part, by Carl Stasny, who played neatly, and discreetly, if not with inspiring effect. He was warmly applauded and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Suite, Dvorak; Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Symphonic Poem, P. Scharwenka; "Loreley," Liszt; and Symphony in B-flat, Gade. Miss Emma Juch is to be the soloist.

The first Symphony concert drew a large audience to Music Hall, although Mrs. Gardner is still in Europe, and Mrs. Apthorp is still in the country. The conductor's stand has been decorated in such bad taste by it. The usual habits were present, including the B. J. Langa, Winches, Footes, Tuckers, Lamsons, Warrens, Stackpoles, Rogerses, Wesselhoefers, Haasericks, Miss Marguerite Hall, Mrs. Jenks, Miss Hersey, Miss Winslow, the Hechts, the Wheelwrights, Mr. Gaugigl, Mr. Sturgis, the Watsons, Dr. Bradford, Mr. Jackson, the Howard Walkers, the Loverings, the Hot Hubbards, the Blakes and Mr. H. W. Swift.

SYNOPSIS.

The symphony concerts are under way again, and there is rejoicing, especially among those to whom Fridays rank as red letter days, because of their afternoons. The flurry over the auction sales of the season tickets is yet fresh in the general memory, and the eager competitions and the large premiums paid for them, caused the rest of the land to open its eyes with wonder at the love of the Athens of America for music, and classical music at that; music of Brahms, and Tschai-kowsky, and Dvorak, and other tuneless off-kays and owskys. And yet there is something in this connection that puzzles me considerably. It is that so many of these symphony tickets are offered for sale in some of the papers I have seen strings of fifteen or twenty advertisements at a time, whose purport is the disposal of these tickets. I see also a surprising number of cards in shop windows, announcing that tickets are for sale within. The result is that I begin to reflect whether the exciting demand for tickets at auction was owing wholly to love of music on the part of purchasers. Not only this, but I have heard of a certain ticket speculator who went into the buying business to the extent of some fourteen thousand dollars on his own account, and has found it somewhat difficult to dispose of his purchases. Of course this, I have no means of verifying, and I give it for what it is worth; but from present appearances it would seem, after all, that the ticket speculators deserve an important place among those who contribute to the financial success of the symphony concerts, and they form no insignificant element in the halo of enthusiasm that surrounds ticket sales. Be this as it may, however, there are tickets for sale and for hire in every direction; which would seem to indicate that something must be deducted from the credit we enjoy as a city, in which a musical frenzy in connection with symphony concerts prevails to so phenomenal an extent, that season tickets cannot be had for love or money after the sales are over. I am very sorry for the speculators who find themselves with so many expensive tickets unsold. If there really be a speculator with some thousands of dollars' worth of tickets on hand, I condole with him especially. And yet, if there be the wild craving for these tickets that there is said to be, I cannot understand why he should not have disposed of his stock long ago. It is true that he may want prices for them that place them out of the reach of all but the wealthy; but he should have thought of that before he bought them. It is scarcely open to question that were it not for the speculators, the prices of tickets would not be run up to so high a figure. Rich people, of course, will have the seats that they covet, at any price; but others would be able to obtain them on more reasonable terms. But here again is illustrated the old axiom which says: "What is one man's meat is another man's poison." The higher the sums that are paid for tickets, the more it enables the projector of these concerts to meet their expenses; and if the speculator finds himself with so many unsold tickets for which he has paid cash, the management finds itself with that same cash in pocket. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good. Nevertheless, it is none the less a pity that where so many real music lovers in moderate circumstances would be happy to attend the concerts, so many tickets should be lying idle. Still, that fact does not detract from the speculator as a prominent music patron in a music centre.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra Presents Two Musical Novelties.

Mr. Nikisch offered two compositions new to Boston at the symphony concert last evening at Music Hall, Reinecke's overture, "King Manfred," and Tschalkowsky's symphony No. 5 in E minor.

In addition to these numbers Mr. Carl Stasny was heard in Saint-Saens's concerto No. 4 in C minor.

The programme was particularly interesting from the element of novelty it contained, and entertaining probably as much from the excellent interpretation of the numbers as from their quality.

Reinecke's overture is a sober composition, opening with peculiar passages played by the brasses and wood-winds alternately, and well played they were, too, last evening, and ending with a tumultuous finale.

The difficult sustained measures in unison on the E strings by the violins were admirably executed, and were perhaps the most pronounced and original feature of the work.

Mr. Stasny was fully equal to the digital dexterity required for the performance of the Saint-Saens number, which bristles with ornamental work.

It was a brilliant performance, and the pianist gave the "tricky" concerto with artistic color and dash.

Tschalkowsky's Slavonic symphony bears the stamp of strong, effective and, often to musical ears, harsh originality.

The whole composition is elaborately worked out, and departs somewhat from the prescribed symphonic form, a waltz movement replacing the scherzo form.

Contrasting themes are used, and many of the effects are dissonant and typical of Cossack fire and energy.

The work of the orchestra was very fine. The piccolos and clarinets fairly shrieked out the weird, allegro vivace, and the swinging waltz measures were delicately given by the strings.

The hall was filled, and the audience was quite enthusiastic.

The concert programme for Friday and Saturday will be Dvorak's suite for orchestra; aria from "Oberon," Weber; symphonic poem "Fruehlingswogen," Philip Scharwenka; song with orchestra, "Loreley," Liszt, and Gade's symphony in B flat major. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist.

Boston patrons of the symphony concerts who were unsuccessful in obtaining seats would enjoy, for contrast and novelty, attending the sale of seats for the Providence series, which opens tomorrow. O'Connor's new flower store, where the sale is to be held, is to have a passageway of palms and ferns, through which the weary purchaser will wend his way, to be refreshed by their odor and a glimpse of Mr. Ellis surrounded by roses and symphony tickets. The concerts will be given monthly on Wednesday evenings, and brilliant audiences will be in attendance.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To the Editor:

Is the Boston Symphony Orchestra to make a provincial tour this season? If so, in what places will it appear?

Indianapolis, Ind.

J. HILL.

(It is scarcely likely that New York and Philadelphia would relish the idea of being classed among provincial cities. The Orchestra will give ten concerts in the Cambridge suburb of Boston; six in Providence, R.I.; four in Worcester, Mass.; ten in Brooklyn; and five each in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.)

MUSIC.

Conner

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme performed at the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Reinecke.....Overture, "King Manfred"
Saint-Saens.....Concerto for pianoforte

Tschalkowski.....Symphony No. 5 in E minor

Mr. Apthorp, in his symphony programme notes, is correct when he says that Karl Reinecke, the composer, "has never risen above the second rank." Any well informed musician will endorse this estimate of the genial and studious Kapellmeister at Leipzig; the unrivaled performer of Mozart's sonatas, concertos, etc.; the prolific or, figuratively speaking, garrulous composer compared with whom there are thousands of musicians his superiors today whose knowledge of what really constitutes musical composition will not permit them to compose. Then wherein is the artistic consistency of performing Mr. Reinecke's music at a symphony concert given by an orchestra of world wide reputation—an orchestra that is pre-eminently "above the second rank." Mr. Reinecke may be all the greater musician for having produced a very large number of mediocre overtures, sonatas, etc.; but the principle that one good tune is worth a dozen bad overtures is an artistic one. What true art is is simply a question of quality.

Reinecke's overture "King Manfred" is conspicuously void of art; it is an artificial work; its gender is feminine; it has many notes, but little music; it is a chatterbox kind of overture, having a plausible refinement, purity and dignity not at its basis but simply in the imagination of the composer. Again we ask why should Mr. Nikisch have music performed at the symphony concerts that is by a "composer who has never risen above the second rank"?

Then followed the fourth concerto in C minor by Saint-Saens. After the first movement which leaves the impression of only being preparatory to the chief business of the piece, it becomes a remarkably grotesque composition and is a characteristic example not only of the composer's familiarity with the technical possibilities of the virtuoso but the absolute mastery he has over all the elements of composition, but all this is in juxtaposition with much that is trivial and even vulgar.

The first movement breathes a poetical spirit, though somewhat heavily and in a pessimistic vein; it is by no means worthy of the composer, of whom Bulow has said "Er ist der grösste musikalische Koff der Jetztzeit." (He is the greatest of living musicians). The finale based upon an arch and piquant folk-song is a masterpiece. The concerto has little of the storm and fury, little of the virtuosic bedlam let loose in it that is the all too prevailing characteristic of the typical modern concerto, but after the first movement it is extremely lavish in passages of real beauty and a well-nigh constant flow of melody that is rendered none the less clear by the attending auxiliaries of the pianoforte part. Whatsoever question may arise as to the emotional enjoyment to be derived from its music, this is purely a question of taste. True the opening movement impresses one as being somewhat foggy and as overcrowded with details which do not appear to bear any coherent relation to each other, but we have used the word "appear" trusting that a more familiar acquaintance with the work would remove the impression. The difficulties of the pianoforte part were overcome by Mr. Carl Stasny without seeming effort; with "classic calmness and accuracy," as the German critics are wont to remark. He is a pianist of the Charles Halle type, and seldom plays fortissimo, and yet without the slightest affectation in the other direction, for he is by no means a pianissimist. He exhibited a fine intellectual grasp of the music, a remarkably pliant, interesting and facile technique and held the interest of his listeners for every bar. Mr. Stasny's performance was the chief triumph of the concert. Of the Tschalkowski symphony, which was heard for the first time in Boston, more can scarcely be said than that it was listened to with curiosity and admiration by musicians in the audience and doubtless with all due appreciation of the difficulty which nowadays besets any composer who aspires to produce a work so transcendent in the demands that are made for it as a modern symphony.

The music is highly spiced, throughout sensuous and exciting. The composer is plainly an eclectic whose aim is to give his great work an investiture which shall be in keeping with its character both externally and internally. It is romantic music yet it is by no means so stimulated that like so much romanticism it either wearies the listener or makes him long for a fresher, healthier, atmosphere; quite the reverse. He revels in instrumental color and the language of his orchestration is at all times glowing and brilliant. Of all four movements the value makes the most unqualifiedly pleasing impression. It is fluent, fresh and vigorous, yet always refined in its rhythms, and is altogether as unique a masterpiece as has yet appeared in a modern symphony. The performance of the work was uncommonly creditable to Conductor Nikisch and the orchestra, and the most tyrannous demands of the symphony were so fully complied with that it seemed as though he had firmly inspired the musicians with an ability to render it.

C. L. C.

The Second of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Amiable Reinecke and the Wild Tschalkowsky.

A Programme of Strongly Contrasting Numbers.

The programme of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "King Manfred".....Reinecke
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor....Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 5 in E minor.....Tschalkowsky
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist.

The appearance of the overture to "King Manfred," an opera by Karl Reinecke, in a concert hall that is frequented in the year 1892.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch's Orchestra Presents Two Musical Novelties.

Mr. Nikisch offered two compositions new to Boston at the symphony concert last evening at Music Hall, Reinecke's overture, "King Manfred," and Tschalkowsky's symphony No. 5 in E minor.

In addition to these numbers Mr. Carl Stasny was heard in Saint-Saens's concerto No. 4 in C minor.

The programme was particularly interesting from the element of novelty it contained, and entertaining probably as much from the excellent interpretation of the numbers as from their quality.

Reinecke's overture is a sober composition, opening with peculiar passages played by the brasses and wood-winds alternately, and well played they were, too, last evening, and ending with a tumultuous finale.

The difficult sustained measures in unison on the E strings by the violins were admirably executed, and were perhaps the most pronounced and original feature of the work.

Mr. Stasny was fully equal to the digital dexterity required for the performance of the Saint-Saens number, which bristles with ornamental work.

It was a brilliant performance, and the pianist gave the "tricksy" concerto with artistic color and dash.

Tschalkowsky's Slavonic symphony bears the stamp of strong, effective and, often to musical ears, harsh originality.

The whole composition is elaborately worked out, and departs somewhat from the prescribed symphonic form, a waltz movement replacing the scherzo form.

Contrasting themes are used, and many of the effects are dissonant and typical of Cossack fire and energy.

The work of the orchestra was very fine. The piccolos and clarinets fairly shrieked out the weird, allegro vivace, and the swinging waltz measures were delicately given by the strings.

The hall was filled, and the audience was quite enthusiastic.

The concert programme for Friday and Saturday will be Dvorak's suite for orchestra; aria from "Oberon," Weber; symphonic poem "Fruehlingswogen," Philip Scharwenka; song with orchestra, "Loreley," Liszt, and Gade's symphony in B flat major. Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist.

Boston patrons of the symphony concerts who were unsuccessful in obtaining seats would enjoy, for contrast and novelty, attending the sale of seats for the Providence series, which opens tomorrow. O'Connor's new flower store, where the sale is to be held, is to have a passageway of palms and ferns, through which the weary purchaser will wend his way, to be refreshed by their odor and a glimpse of Mr. Ellis surrounded by roses and symphony tickets. The concerts will be given monthly on Wednesday evenings, and brilliant audiences will be in attendance.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To the Editor:

Is the Boston Symphony Orchestra to make a provincial tour this season? If so, in what places will it appear?

Indianapolis, Ind.

J. Hill.

(It is scarcely likely that New York and Philadelphia would relish the idea of being classed among provincial cities. The Orchestra will give ten concerts in the Cambridge suburb of Boston; six in Providence, R.I.; four in Worcester, Mass.; four in Brooklyn; and five each in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.)

MUSIC.

Conner

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme performed at the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was as follows:

Reinecke.....Overture, "King Manfred"
Saint-Saens.....Concerto for pianoforte

Tschalkowski.....Symphony No. 5 in E minor

Mr. Apthorp, in his symphony programme notes, is correct when he says that Karl Reinecke, the composer, "has never risen above the second rank." Any well informed musician will endorse this estimate of the genial and studious Kapellmeister at Leipzig; the unrivaled performer of Mozart's sonatas, concertos, etc.; the prolific or, figuratively speaking, garrulous composer compared with whom there are thousands of musicians his superiors today whose knowledge of what really constitutes musical composition will not permit them to compose. Then wherein is the artistic consistency of performing Mr. Reinecke's music at a symphony concert given by an orchestra of world wide reputation—an orchestra that is pre-eminently "above the second rank." Mr. Reinecke may be all the greater musician for having produced a very large number of mediocre overtures, sonatas, etc.; but the principle that one good tune is worth a dozen bad overtures is an artistic one. What true art is is simply a question of quality.

Reinecke's overture "King Manfred" is conspicuously void of art; it is an artificial work; its gender is feminine; it has many notes, but little music; it is a chatterbox kind of overture, having a plausible refinement, purity and dignity not at its basis but simply in the imagination of the composer. Again we ask why should Mr. Nikisch have music performed at the symphony concerts that is by a "composer who has never risen above the second rank"?

Then followed the fourth concerto in C minor by Saint-Saens. After the first movement which leaves the impression of only being preparatory to the chief business of the piece, it becomes a remarkably grotesque composition and is a characteristic example not only of the composer's familiarity with the technical possibilities of the virtuoso but the absolute mastery he has over all the elements of composition, but all this is in juxtaposition with much that is trivial and even vulgar.

The first movement breathes a poetical spirit, though somewhat heavily and in a pessimistic vein; it is by no means worthy of the composer, of whom Bulow has said "Er ist der grösste musikalische Koff der Jetztzeit." (He is the greatest of living musicians). The finale based upon an arch and piquant folk-song is a masterpiece. The concerto has little of the storm and fury, little of the virtuosic bedlam let loose in it that is the all too prevailing characteristic of the typical modern concerto, but after the first movement it is extremely lavish in passages of real beauty and a well-nigh constant flow of melody that is rendered none the less clear by the attending auxiliaries of the pianoforte part. Whatsoever question may arise as to the emotional enjoyment to be derived from its music, this is purely a question of taste. True the opening movement impresses one as being somewhat foggy and as overcrowded with details which do not appear to bear any coherent relation to each other, but we have used the word "appear" trusting that a more familiar acquaintance with the work would remove the impression. The difficulties of the pianoforte part were overcome by Mr. Carl Stasny without seeming effort; with "classic calmness and accuracy," as the German critics are wont to remark. He is a pianist of the Charles Halle type, and seldom plays fortissimo, and yet without the slightest affectation in the other direction, for he is by no means a pianissimist. He exhibited a fine intellectual grasp of the music, a remarkably pliant, interesting and facile technique and held the interest of his listeners for every bar. Mr. Stasny's performance was the chief triumph of the concert. Of the Tschalkowski symphony, which was heard for the first time in Boston, more can scarcely be said than that it was listened to with curiosity and admiration by musicians in the audience and doubtless with all due appreciation of the difficulty which nowadays besets any composer who aspires to produce a work so transcendent in the demands that are made for it as a modern symphony.

The music is highly spiced, throughout sensuous and exciting. The composer is plainly an eclectic whose aim is to give his great work an investiture which shall be in keeping with its character both externally and internally. It is romantic music yet it is by no means so stimulated that like so much romanticism it either wearies the listener or makes him long for a fresher, healthier, atmosphere; quite the reverse. He revels in instrumental color and the language of his orchestration is at all times glowing and brilliant. Of all four movements the waltz makes the most unqualifiedly pleasing impression. It is fluent, fresh and vigorous, yet always refined in its rhythms, and is altogether as unique a masterpiece as has yet appeared in a modern symphony. The performance of the work was uncommonly creditable to Conductor Nikisch and the orchestra, and the most tyrannous demands of the symphony were so fully complied with that it seemed as though he had firmly inspired the musicians with an ability to render it.

C. L. C.

The Second of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Amiable Reinecke and the Wild Tschalkowsky.

A Programme of Strongly Contrasting Numbers.

The programme of the second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "King Manfred".....Reinecke
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor....Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 5 in E minor.....Tschalkowsky
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Carl Stasny was the pianist.

The appearance of the overture to "King Manfred," an opera by Karl Reinecke, in a concert hall that is frequented in the year 1892, likened unto the visit of an esteemed gentleman, past the zenith of life, at the house of his kinsfolk. He is greeted warmly, and is then submitted to the inspection that follows a return after the separation of years. The old gentleman is well preserved. His locks may be scanty, but they are pleasingly combed. His eyes are bright and his step is firm. His hearing and his appetite are unimpaired. The shirt collar is perhaps not of the latest device, but its whiteness and its rigidity are irreproachable. His manners in conversation and at table are distinguished. He is always amiable. He does not interrupt; he never contradicts. He does not advance positive or extravagant opinions of his own. In fact he has no opinions, and his talk is enlivened by liberal quotations from the good fellows whom he knew in his youth, and by statements of scholars and philosophers who were of great repute when he put on man's estate. All are delighted at first. The elder members of the family revive old recollections. They commend their guest as an example to the youths of the household, who are inclined to be forward, opinionated, vehement in expression. The irreverent youngsters consider him to be a bore; they laugh in secret. They are tired of hearing him repeat tales told by Mendelssohn and Schumann. They are tempted to ask him if he never thought for himself. His very suavity irritates them. Even the elder members of the family after a week begin to think that he is too polite. So they leave him alone one evening by the fire and attend a lecture given by a Russian Nihilist named Peter Tschaiakowsky. They hear many things that startle and shock them; yet they are at times fascinated in spite of themselves by the conviction and the passion of the revolutionist. On their return they find the old man awaiting them. His kindly talk seems slow. They yawn in his face. The next day the guest departs, unruffled, in fact with Chesterfieldian composure. Strange to say, they miss his never-failing courtesy, his gentle voice, his self-control. They forget speedily the noisy threats of the Russian; but they remember the wise conversation of Schumann and Mendelssohn as repeated pleasantly by good Mr. Reinecke. And the young people, who follow Tschaiakowsky about with a curiosity that is high impertinence, begin to think that the Russian may be something of a poseur, and they appreciate in moderate degree the self-effacement of the quondam guest.

"By the side of the Blue Sea is a great and green oak tree, girt with a golden chain.

"Day and night, a marvelous and learned cat crawls around this oak.

"When he crawls to the right, he sings a song. When he crawls to the left, he tells a story.

"It is there that you must sit down and learn the understanding of Russian legends. There the spirit of Russia and the fantasy of our ancestors come to life again."

So runs the beginning of the prologue of a story by Pouchkine. It is not improbable that he who wishes to enter fully into the spirit of Tschaiakowsky must listen to the cat who dwells by the chain-girt oak which looks out on the water of the Blue Sea.

Although the fifth symphony of Tschaiakowsky was heard last week for the first time in this city, it is not a composition of this year. Its first performance was in St. Petersburg during the season of '88-89 and March 5, 1889; it was played in New York under the direction of Theodore Thomas. It was played again in New York in 1890. Brooklyn and Chicago heard it that same year. It was played in Baltimore and Cincinnati in 1892.

This symphony is kept pretty well in traditional symphonic form, except that the first part of the first allegro is not repeated, and a waltz movement takes the place of the scherzo. Few are now inclined to regret the tendency to omit the orthodox repetition. Nearly a century ago Gretry, in speaking of the sonata form, put the following question: "What do you think of a man who cuts his speech in two and repeats twice each half?" I was at your house this morning; yes, I was at your house this morning to consult you in a matter of business, to consult you in a matter of business." Reprises in music affect me in this way. Let us not confound, however, useless repetitions with a charming phrase that occurs three or four times, or with the repetitions of a few measures of a delightful air. Just as one may say to his sweetheart ten times in the same visit 'I love you,' so one may repeat a phrase that is full of emotion. I spoke of the long repetition that forms the half of a musical discourse."

Tschaiakowsky is a name not to be mentioned without a raising of the hat; and yet it is doubtful if this fifth symphony will add to his reputation or alone carry him to the consideration of posterity. It abounds in that which is known currently as Russian color. The themes are often Russian, whether they are derived from folk melodies, and through them from the plain song of the national church, or merely influenced by such associations. Furthermore, the presentation of the themes in harmonic and instrumental setting is characteristic of the members of the modern radical school of Russia. At the same time there is a skill in elaboration, seen particularly in the first movement, that is not often remarked in compositions by the colleagues of Tschaiakowsky. This elaboration in the first movement becomes over-elaboration, and fatigue is induced thereby. The slow movement is of a more popular nature. If there is again a Slavic character, there is also proof of the strong influence of the melodious Italians. The sentiment of the opening solo approaches sentimentality, but the theme is undeniably effective and is treated with rare technical skill, as is the passionate second theme of the same movement. So pleased is Tschaiakowsky with his invention that he insists on calling attention to it until the hearer begins to doubt the worth of that which at first charmed him. The waltz is free from vulgarity. It is indeed dainty, and the instrumentation is delicate and piquant without any suspicion of the bizarre. In strong contrast to the refinement of this movement is the hurry-scurry of the finale. Such music is unworthy of the symphony or the serious opera. It might not be out of place in pantomime scenes where the clown is pursued by an infuriated populace, and it would undoubtedly foment the rage of Howling Dervishes. In its dignity and in its madness, in its piquancy and in its passion, this symphony was played admirably by the orchestra.

Perhaps this symphony cannot be better described than by the words of Cesar Cui in his summing up of the merits and the faults of the Tschaiakowsky of 1880. It will be seen at once that Cui uses freely the peculiar and traditional privilege of a sincere friend. "His orchestral music is distinguished by wealth of melody, development, harmony and instrumentation. These precious gifts are not always employed discreetly. He is, for instance, not fastidious enough in his choice of melodic ideas. One finds ordinary and even vulgar tunes jostling exquisite melodies. Depth and real vigor are sometimes missed. He delights in tripping and pleasing melodies; he is fond of danse-rhythms; or he is sentimental to the point of monotony. He is prolix in the development; on the other hand his themes are at times contrasted too abruptly. He has not learned the necessity of rigid self-inspection. Therefore his symphonic style degenerates sometimes into the merely dramatic and melodramatic."

And yet much may be forgiven in the case of the man who sang in that great cantabile with throbbing accompaniment the time-and-space-defying passion of the lovers of Verona; and who invoked with unearthly strains the awful Majesty of Denmark.

There are other pianoforte concertos in the catalogue of Saint-Saens, but to the musician there is but one, the famous one in G minor. Yet there are passages in the C minor concerto that show the ingenuity of the composer, and the pianoforte is treated in a distinguished manner. As a work of the distinctively modern school, it requires a player of the modern school, a player with virtuosic blood in his veins. It is true that Mr. Stasny showed Saturday a marked improvement in his appreciation of rhythm and accentuation. He has more self-control than was seen in his performance early in November of last year. While his touch is still apparently dry and without genuine sympathy, he did not force the tone, and, in fact, he played throughout the concerto with care and with discretion. But it seemed as though he interpreted the work in the conscientious spirit of a professor expounding to his class the structure of a sonata by Clementi. He was applauded loudly and he was twice recalled.

The programme of the concerts of next Friday and Saturday is as follows:
Suite, Dvorak; aria from "Oberon," Weber; symphonic poem, P. Scharwenka; "Loreley," Liszt, and symphony in B flat, Gade.
Miss Emma Juch will be the soloist.

PHILIP HALE.

usic Hall.

1892-93.

NY ORCHESTRA,

ISCH, Conductor.

NCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

C. GOLDMARK.

OVERTURE. "In the Spring."

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN AND ORCHESTRA.

J. RAFF.

SYMPHONY. "Im Walde."

SOLOIST:

MONSIEUR HENRI MARTEAU.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK.

SUITE FOR ORCHESTRA, in D major, op. 39.

- I. Praeludium (Pastorale), Allegro moderato (D major).
- II. Polka, Allegretto grazioso (D minor).
- III. Menuet (Sousedska), Allegro giusto (B flat major).
- IV. Romanze, Andante con moto (G major).
- V. Finale (Furiant), Presto (D minor).

KARL MARIA VON WEBER.

RECITATIVE AND ARIA, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," from "Oberon." Act II., No. 13.

PHILIPP SCHARWENKA.

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Fruehlingswogen." in A flat major, op. 87.

FRANZ LISZT.

SONG WITH ORCHESTRA. "Die Loreley."

NIELS WILHELM GADE.

SYMPHONY in B flat major, op. 20.

- I. Andantino (B flat major).
Allegro vivace e grazioso (B flat major).
- II. Andante con moto (E flat major).
- III. Scherzo; Allegro, ma non troppo e tranquillamente (G minor).
Trio I. (G major).
Trio II. (D major).
- IV. Finale; Allegro molto vivace (B flat major).

SOLOIST:

MISS EMMA JUCH.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

A PLEASANT MINGLING OF OLD AND NEW.

The Dvorak Work a Sort of Apotheosis of National Dance Music, Well Rendered—Miss Juch Welcomed Back—Liszt in Vocal English Not a Success—Gade's Symphony.

Again a programme of new instrumental numbers, or of numbers so old that they became practically new, and it was a line of modern work which exhibited our conductor at his best. The Dvorak work, which began the concert, falsified the Shakesperian line,

I am never merry when I hear Suite music, for this Suite swept the gamut of merriment from placid gaiety to hilarious frenzy. It is a sort of apotheosis of national dance-music, and it gives rather an overdose of Terpsichore. The pastoral introduction is its best number, for here there is a degree of development and figure treatment which is interesting. There is an intentional monotony of bass (a sort of "ground-bass"), that is attractive. The movement was well played and the oboe work, of which there was an abundance, was commendable. Mr. Sautet not only blows the thin and tender tone of the French school (which is peculiarly appropriate in these rustic effects), but at times gives the broad, full tone which one hears from the German players, and which approaches the quality of the English horn.

Now followed a polka movement. As the "Pulka" is a national dance of Bohemia it was natural to expect it in a Bohemian suite, but, after all, its rhythm is the least adapted to interesting treatment, and while the polonaise, the mazurka, the minuet, the gavotte and the waltz all have points that can be developed to some purpose in orchestral music of the better sort, the polka remains barren even when treated by the masters, and Raff and Rubinstein, as well as Dvorak, have become prosy or conventional when dealing with its 2-4 measures. The minuet which came next was dainty in the extreme, and had a pretty little skip in its chief figure which was charming. It reminded one of the elfin Minuet which Berlioz introduced in the "Damnation of Faust."

The Romanza gives plenty of musical sugar, and a conversation between the flute and the English horn might be a dialogue of a youth and maiden. The flute obligato work was finely given, and the rest of the woodwind also deserves praise.

But now came more dancing in the shape of a "Furiant" (again a folkdance of Bohemia) and more of spiced bizarrerie. Goulasch may be good food, but one can tire even of ever-recurring Goulasch, and the very caprice displayed began to have a suspicion of sameness. Brilliant tone coloring is certainly present in the movement, but the effect produced on the writer was as if he had been at an art exhibition where the painter used only scarlet, pea green, sky blue and bright yellow.

Now came Miss Emma Juch and received a welcome that must have assured her that the Boston public remembers her former artistic triumphs. She sang "Ocean, thou mighty monster!" from Weber's "Oberon," with fine musical intelligence, and her climaxes both in high and low register were well worked up; but the voice was not altogether broad enough for the ambitious number, and more than once seemed forced. Beside a Materna or a Lehmann rendering of this dramatic scene the performance would have shown decided shortcomings. The public, however, appreciated the artistic efforts of the singer and gave the heartiest applause. It was a mistake to give Liszt's "Loreley" in English, or, in fact, to give it at all. Liszt is a decidedly unvocal writer, and the spasmodic gasps, and shrieks, and moanings, and groanings of the vocal part, not to speak of the wild modulations of the orchestra, make the tender folksong so grandiloquent that one longs even for the simplicity of Silcher's setting as a relief. Yet there is one beautiful theme in the work which gives a picture of tranquillity and sadness, and in this Miss Juch's voice was most effective and tender, because unforced.

Philipp Scharwenka's symphonic poem "Fruehlingswogen" was rather too ecstatic and long-drawn out. Such an amount of surging and tempestuous trouble is not generally associated with spring, and there were fierce dissonances that could only picture a New England spring in its early and catarrh-breeding stages. But judged apart from any definite picture, the work showed a deft hand in using orchestral color and a passion for thematic development that was interesting even though it sometimes led to unclearness. The horn calls (played a trifle flat) reminded one of the manner in which Schumann awakened the spring in his B flat symphony. The harp had prominent work to do and Mr. Schuecker played his part clearly and most artistically. I suspect that there is more in the work than appears at a first hearing, and can only say that the primary impression was of vague beauty, excessive length, bold modulation, and modern ecstasy. It formed an excellent foil to Gade's B-flat symphony, and also served to remind one that Gade's singing of spring (he has written two short but glorious cantatas on the topic) was more easily comprehended.

Gade's symphony closed the concert. It may be true that Gade, in his symphonic writing especially, played moon to Mendelssohn's sun, but his treatment is none the less symmetrical and worthy, and he is as concise as heart could wish. Charming it was, after all the excitement of ultra-modern musical spasms and agonies, to hear a logical work with clear relationship of themes and intelligible development. And the violins played the chief theme as they loved it, while the cellos and horns did the same for the second. The pleasant treatment of the two-noted figure ("Mrs. Mendelssohn," cried the German critics,) was well brought out. The whole work received a good reading, save that the finale was made a little too fiery. At times, too, the middle voices which also have independent thoughts to present occasionally, were not heard because of the impetuosity of the violins.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

"The Fencing Master," "Jupiter" and "Fadette."

Miss Emma Juch, Soloist at the Symphony Concert—Cyril Tyler's Farewell Tonight—Rice's Popular at the Park This Evening—Other Attractions, News Notes and Gossip.

An admirably varied programme was performed at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening under the direction of Conductor Arthur Nikisch, the soloist being Miss Emma Juch, soprano.

The selections of the evening included Dvorak's suite for orchestra; Weber's aria, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon"; Philipp Scharwenka's symphonic poem, "Frühlingswogen"; Liszt's song (with orchestra), "Loreley," and Gade's symphony in B flat major.

The appearance of Miss Juch gave her many admirers in this city a welcome pleasure, and she has seldom made a more emphatic success than on this occasion. The great dramatic art from "Oberon," which so severely tests the abilities of the best equipped soprano, was given with splendid breadth and artistic finish, its contrasting movements displaying the admirable vocal gifts of the artist to the best advantage. Miss Juch's delivery of the number was well calculated to call out the commendation of the most critical, and a well merited ovation rewarded the singer as she concluded the selection. Liszt's beautiful "Loreley" is a composition which is seldom heard with full satisfaction, as the demands it makes upon the musical intelligence of the singer are rarely met. Miss Juch is singularly gifted in the intellectual attainments demanded in the proper interpretation of this song, and last evening she fairly disarmed criticism by the admirable fashion in which she realized all its beauties. The sentiment, feeling and intelligence shown in the delivery of the number, the artistic grace which characterized its phrasing, and the purity and correctness of the tones of the singer, combine to make the song a source of keen enjoyment, and to win for the singer another grand demonstration.

The novelty of the evening consisted of the spring poem by Philipp Scharwenka, which was given its first hearing here on this occasion. The composition appeals with rare success to the poetic and sentimental characteristics of the music loving public, the fanciful idea of depicting in true colors the opening of spring being carried out with artistic grace and singularly pleasing realism. The principal theme is elaborated with admirable skill, and the instrumental combination, as well as the working out, gives evidence of the master's hand. Mr. Nikisch brought all his great talent to the successful interpretation of this class of writings to the reading of this true poem, and his performance of the composition gave entire satisfaction.

The sharp contrasting movements of the Dvorak suite were given a delightful interpretation and Mr. Nikisch was a so particularly happy in his reading of the Gade symphony, which has never had a more pleasing production than on this occasion.

The orchestra makes its first occasional tour during the coming week and resumes its home concerts on the 11th of November, when Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist.

—The largest audience of the season assembled for the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, the appearance of Mme. Juch as soloist being somewhat responsible for the crowd. She looked extremely well in black india silk with a groundwork of pink roses. The bodice was of black lace with narrow gold bands of embroidery over a low cut black corsage. Her profusion of blonde hair was simply arranged on her finely shaped head. She sang beautifully and was greeted with unusual applause for a matinee.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third symphony concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, brought the following programme with it:

Dvorak: Suite for orchestra, in D major, Opus 39.
Weber: Recitative and Aria, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," from "Oberon."
Philipp Scharwenka: Symphonic Poem, "Frühlingswogen," in A-flat major, Opus 87.
Liszt: Song with orchestra, "Die Loreley."
Gade: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Opus 20.
Miss Emma Juch was the singer.

The Dvorak suite has been heard here before: it is one of the Bohemian composer's most genial works—bright, sunny, and, except in a few ill-sounding places, musical in spirit and form. Where the music borders dangerously upon the flimsy and the trivial, as it does at times, Dvorak has known how to save it by a certain native charm that is very winning. The closing Furiant is one of the most spirited things of his in this vein that we know of; it carried off the honors of the suite with the audience. The whole suite was admirably played, and the effect it produced left little or nothing to be desired.

Philipp Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen" was given (with some considerable, but very welcome, cuts) for the first time here. The composer calls it a symphonic poem, but it has less definiteness of poetic, or picturesque, purpose than most of the compositions we have hitherto known by that name. It is pleasant-sounding, rather unpretentious music, agreeably scored for full modern orchestra, but totally lacking in genius or distinction of any sort. It might have been written by Fritz Spindler, had that "pianoforte-pupil's best friend" been in the habit of writing for orchestra. There is little to criticize in it, save that it does not in the least fill the requirements of a composition for a serious symphony concert. When one listens to music at such a solemnity, one likes at least to feel one's self in communion with a mind of some distinction, with one that has something to say. Scharwenka shows here that he has exceedingly little to say and that only of the most commonplace sort. It was capitally played.

Gade's ever beautiful and lovely B-flat symphony came like a refreshing shower in the desert. One hears so little by him nowadays, and so much by men who fly with a more heroic, or at least with a more strenuous, wing, that one looks forward to hearing a work of his once more with something of distrust, with a little fear that his whilom charm and fascination may seem a trifle aged and withered; but no, when he is at his best, as he is in this symphony, he is found to be still the same bright, poetic, fascinating Gade, to have lost none of his native charm. Apart from the intrinsic beauty of this symphony, one finds something peculiarly winning in the orchestration; take, for instance, those cantilena passages in the slow movement, where the first violins soar high up above all the other strings in a rare atmosphere of their own, the distance between them and the accompaniment being as it were made less sensible by the melody being doubled by two flutes in octaves; how light, buoyant and sunny this sounds in comparison with the stress of octaves and double octaves between first and second violins and 'celli that more modern composers (especially the French and Russians) employ ad nauseam! What richness, warmth and variety of color Gade obtains, without any overloading or loss of clearness! And, when he does use the more voluptuous lower tones that are now so popular—as in the wonderful conclusion-theme, for horn and 'celli, in the first movement—what absolutely entrancing effects he produces!

The scherzo (the gem of the symphony) was taken a little faster by Mr. Nikisch than we have been accustomed to hear it here. As far as the indications in the score go, there is no objection to be made to this; for, although the movement is marked Allegro, ma non troppo e tranquillamente, it is still marked Allegro, and not Allegretto. We believe this is the first time we have ever complained of Mr. Nikisch for not giving in to the now prevailing fashion of "slow Allegros." Still, in this case, it does seem to us that the peculiarly sly humor of the theme in G minor could be given more point and made more caustic by a slightly more deliberate tempo. This theme always seems to say, as some pretty girl might to a pair of lovers: "Ah! you two trios; you may play the guitar and sing love-songs under my window as much as you please; but if you think to catch me in that way—pooh!" You can actually see it wink and laugh in its sleeve. The performance, with the exception of this one flaw (which is, after all, but a matter of opinion), was admirable in the extreme; it showed the full beauty and grace of the delightful work. It was a rare treat to hear it; and now, if Mr. Nikisch would only give us the E major symphony too (the one with the march-like finale), we should have nothing more to ask on Gade's score.

Miss Juch sang the great "Ocean! du Ungeheuer"—albeit the scene is a trifle large for her—in admirable style. Her voice not being of the very largest calibre, such as Weber had in his mind when writing the scene, forces her to give a rather weak, sentimental tinge to one or two of the more tremendous passages ("Ein Schreck bist du" for instance); but her singing was almost throughout forcible, artistic, and in a finely broad and grand style; in the finale ("Mein Hün! mein Gatte! etc.") she carried everything before her.

Liszt's "Loreley" seems, strange to say, to gain nothing in force or color by its orchestral dress; the original accompaniment is essentially pianoforte writing, and loses more than it gains by being scored for orchestra. Still, in a hall like the Music Hall, the orchestral version is to be preferred for obvious reasons. Miss Juch sang it very beautifully indeed; perhaps one could have wished for a thought more of voluptuous languor in that siren-like melody to the words "Die Luft ist kühl und es dunkelt, etc." One also missed the ring of the pianoforte pedal here; the phrases of the accompaniment sounded too detached. But it was an exceedingly beautiful performance nevertheless. Miss Juch was rapturously applauded and repeatedly recalled after both songs.

The next programme (for Saturday after next, Nov. 12) is: Saint-Saëns, symphony in A minor, opus 55; Ernst, violin concerto in one movement, in F sharp minor; Humperdink, humoresque for orchestra; Beethoven, symphony No. 2, in D major. Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the violinist.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Emma Juch the Soloist and the Programme One of Great Variety.

It was a programme of unusual variety which Conductor Nikisch presented at the third of this season's symphony concerts. There were a suite for orchestra, a symphonic poem, a symphony, and two songs for soprano.

The attendance was of the usual size, a size which severely taxes the capacity of Music Hall. There was also the customary measure of carefully considered applause for the conductor, the orchestra and the soloist.

Miss Emma Juch was the soloist, and her appearance was most welcome. She has long been a favorite here, and deservedly so. There are few American prima donnas—Miss Juch, although of foreign birth, may very properly be considered an American—who are better equipped with voice, presence and dramatic talent for concert or operatic work, and there are still fewer who are more conscientious and ambitious in their efforts to adhere to the higher class of music, regardless of the financial sacrifices which may in consequence be necessitated.

She sang two numbers last evening, the recitative and aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster" from Weber's "Oberon," and Liszt's "Die Loreley," with orchestral accompaniment. The recitative was sung with an effect of simple sincerity and artistic expression, and exactness and purity of tone which have so often been commended in Miss Juch's singing of oratorical music, and which has won for her in that class of music a position of unquestioned prominence.

The aria was sung delightfully, the higher notes were deliciously clear, the lower tones charmingly rich and full, and the difficult staccato passages were executed with ease and artistic finish.

Rare expression and sympathetic interpretation marked her singing of the beautiful "Die Loreley" melody, and the enthusiastic plaudits which three times recalled Miss Juch were thoroughly deserved.

The orchestral accompaniment was praiseworthy in the main, but gentler treatment of certain passages of "Die Loreley" would have been welcome.

The one novelty on the evening's programme was Philipp Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen," a "symphonic poem" in A-flat major. It is an interesting work, full of bright, if not particularly original ideas, breezy and animated from beginning to end, plentiful in melody and rich in elaborate and graceful scoring.

It has been described as a "spring poem in tones." It contains a suggestive of the new life and gayety of springtime, and in its variety of tonal effects it is fanciful and picturesque to a high degree. Short and dainty solos are given nearly all the wind instruments, and these were splendidly played by the members of Director Nikisch's band.

The five movements of Anton Dvorak's suite for orchestra, in D major, were admirably played. This suite is a work that is particularly characteristic of its composer's original, brilliant and forceful style. There are those who still refuse to accept Dvorak's music with any degree of enthusiasm, but the oftener one hears his writings the more one becomes impressed with the great power, originality and depth of musical feeling that he possesses.

Gade's symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, concluded the concert, and was interpreted in a manner that was evidently thoroughly satisfactory to the audience.

The symphony orchestra will be absent from Boston this week. On Nov. 11 and 12 the programme will be as follows:

Symphony in A minor, op. 55.....Saint-Saens Concerto for violin in F sharp minor.....H. W. Ernst Humoresque for orchestra.....E. Humpendink
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven
The soloist will be Mr. T. Adamowski.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

A Singular Preference Shown by Miss Emma Juch.

The Secret Choice of Charles Baudelaire, Wagnerite.

The programme of the third symphony concert was as follows:

Suite for orchestra, op. 39.....Dvorak
"Ocean! thou mighty monster".....Weber Symphonic Poem, "Frühlingswogen".....P. Scharwenka
"Die Loreley".....Liszt
Symphony No. 4, B flat.....Gade

Miss Emma Juch was the singer.

There is a spontaneity in the suite by Dvorak that is thoroughly delightful; that is sought for in vain in later and more ambitious works by him. There is here no groping after an effect, no vague oracular shriek from a Bohemian tripod. The different numbers are not unlike cabinet pictures of folk life. The people are presented frankly in their simplicity and jollity. Such fresh and melodious music is welcome in the close air of Music Hall. The Dvorak volka makes more for musical righteousness than symphonic-poems "in eight mystic devices and three paraphrases" or symphonies that are said to represent the struggle of Man with the Infinite. Nor is the furiant, known of old as the furie, to be despised. Perhaps in time we may become acquainted with the chodovska, the husitska, the Umrlec, the skakava, the strasak, and the baborak; for the Bohemians are a people of many steps, and Alfred Walden, in his "Bohemian National Dances," writes of 136 distinct varieties in the manner of stamping, gliding and leaping into the air.

It was a pleasure to hear again the severe and beautiful symphony of Gade. To be sure it is not great music in the modern sense of the term. Gade is here simply a maker of music; he is not a "tone poet," nor a "seer," nor a "revolutionary." He is a man of musical temperament, who learned the art of expressing himself clearly and often with grace. He has no startling story to shock or confound the hearer; he is agreeable, sympathetic, at times eloquent in speech. In his eloquence he rarely raises his voice, and he never screams. He does not linger, but in hand, with idle repetitions. His leave taking is neither abrupt, nor is it like unto that peculiar parting of two women busied in a social function, the parting that assumes the importance of the death-bed, although it is only for a day. And in this symphony Gade is not so cruelly choked by Mendelssohn as in certain of his other works.

Ten years ago Mr. Philipp Scharwenka was a good-natured man who lived in Berlin, where he relished a jest and was persuaded occasionally by an impatient pupil to give him a lesson in composition. His laziness was then as traditional as his good nature. He still lives in Berlin. That he is still lazy and fond of jesting is revealed by his symphonic poem, "Frühlingswogen," for he shuns the labor of original thinking and plays a musical joke on the hearer. We are informed that the composer has taken "a single, simple idea, the general upheaving or 'billowing' of animate nature at the arrival of spring," out to illustrate this idea he has taken many ideas from predecessors and contemporaries. Nor is he fastidious in his choice—Richard Wagner and Albert Jungmann are held by him in equal esteem. "Siegfried" yeast excites the musical fermentation of Scharwenka; and when he feels himself possessed and gives vent to his own exuberance he sings a saccharine melody that might have been written by Oesten or Chas. Morley. Then he is so garrulous after he has inserted firmly a finger in the button hole! It is possible, after all, that Scharwenka was serious in his intent and felt a personal interest in his interminable platitudes and incongruous quotations, "just as a drunkard who cannot articulate supposes himself oracular."

This symphonic poem was played last week for the first time in Boston. New York listened to it in December, 1891. Chicago wondered at it in the January of this year.

Miss Emma Juch sang the celebrated scene and air of Azzola from "Oberon" in German. Now Weber wrote the music to an English text for an English singer and an English audience. The German translation by In. Bell was not made until the composer had finished the opera with sole view to the musical illustration of the lines of Planché. Mary Anne Paton was the name of the singer who created the part at the Covent Garden Theatre—the beautiful Miss Paton, who was happier afterward as Mrs. Joseph Wood (under which name she was known to Bostonians of a former generation) than when she enjoyed the doubtful honor of a Scotch marriage with Lord William Pitt Lennox. Nor did Weber complain of her nationality, nor did he sigh for the sound of the German guttural. On the contrary, he wrote his wife that Miss Paton "sang divinely." There was not a German in the cast that memorable night of the 12th of April, 1826. (Not until late in December of that year was the opera sung in German, and then at Leipzig.) Furthermore, the patriotic Weber, who worked so earnestly for German art, was loud in his praises of the English singers. And why? Because "they were masters of the Italian school." But this was long before the opinion prevailed that the art of song was merely an affair of the intellect, only to be fully understood by German men and women.

Miss Juch cannot plead in excuse a lack of familiarity with our language. She sings it with rare beauty of enunciation and pronunciation. She has been identified prominently with English opera. She sang last Saturday evening "Die Loreley" in English. The superb opening of the great scene with the setting of the words "Ocean, thou mighty monster," is known to all. Are the following words to be preferred for power of expression or charm of euphony: "Ocean, Du Ungeheuer! Schlangen gleich nachst du umschlungen rund die ganze Welt!" Miss Juch perhaps found a meaning in them that appealed to her, some meaning mystic, wonderful, for she chose them although she sang before an English-speaking audience.

She sang the scene and air with vocal skill and dramatic intelligence, so that she was applauded deservedly and thrice recalled. In Liszt's elaborate setting of Heine's verses she the evening her voice showed the wear and tear that follow, unfortunately, faithful and long-continued work. But in these days when half-taught or ignorant declaimers disdain the true pitch, shout or sob spasmodically, slide carelessly from tone to tone, breathe at random although the phrase cries out in pain, and, in a word, indulge themselves in monstrous jurgulation; in these days when such declaimers are encouraged until they wax bold and vain would shove true singers from the stage, it is a valued pleasure to hold in grateful remembrance the concert career of Emma Juch.

68

The performance of the orchestral numbers was worthy of undiluted praise. In solo work and in ensemble it was fully up to the old and the established reputation of the organization.

Attention is called frequently by the more inflamed disciples of Richard Wagner to the case of Charles Baudelaire, the poet of "Fleurs du Mal." It is true that in 1861 the "sleepless heart and sombre soul" of Mr. Baudelaire were moved mightily by the theories and the music of Wagner, and he aculeved a pamphlet, entitled "Richard Wagner et Tannhauser à Paris," which is now quoted in second-hand book catalogues at seven or eight francs. The world, however, was ignorant of any other views of Mr. Baudelaire concerning music, which, by the way, he treated only from the standpoint of the layman, until Mr. Jules Claretie lately revealed the inner soul of the poet-critic. This revelation deserves a separate paragraph.

"I hear him still telling us, with a grimace not to be forgotten: 'I adore Wagner. But the music I prefer is that of a cat hung up by his tail outside of a window and trying to stick to the panes of glass with its claws. There is an odd grating on the glass which I find at the same time strange, irritating and singularly harmonious.'"

PHILIP HALE.

SWEET SOUNDS FROM BOSTON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Before New York's Culture and Scores a Triumph.

Special Dispatch to The Boston Journal.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3. A large and cultured audience witnessed the triumphant opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season in Chickering Hall to-night. Mr. Nikisch, in arranging his programme, made no effort to excite interest through novelty. Save the opening number, Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," the music was extremely familiar, and this number had been heard here before. The performance of it was thrilling in the intensity of its feeling, the warmth of its tonal color and the energy and precision with which its throbbing rhythms were proclaimed.

In the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony the skill of the Boston players was put to a severer test. The other orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which was finely played. The solo performances were Weber's air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monstre," and Liszt's "Lorely," sung by Miss Emma Juch.

69

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE FIRST CONCERT OF THE SEASON.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH must have been conscious as he faced the large audience in Chickering Hall last Thursday evening that the popularity of his band had not waned since last spring; rather, indeed, that it had waxed. It was literally a gala night and the hall early in the evening displayed the legend "Standing Room Only," for every seat was filled and the walls downstairs and upstairs were fringed with music loving humanity. Indeed, a stranger might have well supposed that this city seldom heard orchestral music, and it seldom does hear the superior mode of playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here is the program that was discussed, a facsimile from Mr. W. F. Apthort's book of the music performed:

- Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet" Tschaikowsky
- Andante non tanto quasi moderato (F sharp minor), 4-4.
- Allegro giusto (B minor), 4-4.
- Moderato assai (B major), 4-4.
- Aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon" Weber
- Miss Juch.
- "Queen Mab" scherzo, from the symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" Berlioz
- Song with orchestra, "Loreley" Liszt
- Miss Juch.
- Symphony in D minor, No. 4 Schumann
- I. Rather slow (D minor), 3-4.
- Lively (D minor), 2-4.
- II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode), 3-4.
- III. Scherzo, lively (D minor), 3-4.
- Trio: the same tempo (B flat major), 3-4.
- IV. Slow (D minor), 4-4.
- Lively (D major), 4-4.
- Soloist, Miss Emma Juch.

This program, ranging from romanticism to ultra-modernity, was one in which the peculiar musical personality of Mr. Nikisch had ample scope and a test one as far as the technic of the orchestra was concerned. Primarily the Boston band is an emotional one, its brilliancy being but a secondary consideration. There is not its counterpart on this continent for crisp, elastic and homogeneous tone. Its responsiveness is marvelous, hence the impression it creates of being one huge, sonorous, exquisitely fashioned instrument played upon exquisitely by its leader. There was little to cavil at on Thursday night either at the mechanism or readings; perhaps a faint suspicion of impurity in the brass, otherwise the performance was almost an ideal one.

The Tschaikowsky overture fantasy is no novelty, and though in form and feeling it is distinctly program music it avoids the vicious realism of music of that class and aims rather at subtle suggestion than mock realistic effects; a superb piece of modern music charged to the full with the intensity, often hysterical and theatric, of this age. It teems with rich harmonies and is almost overlaid with was less successful. It is true that at times during the evening her voice showed the wear and tear that follow, unfortunately, faithful and long-continued work. But in these days when half-taught or ignorant declaimers disdain the true pitch, snout or sob spasmodically, slide carelessly from tone to tone, breathe at random although the phrase cries out in pain, and, in a word, mangle themselves in monstrous jurgation; in these days when such declaimers are encouraged until they wax bold and vain would shove true singers from the stage, it is a valued pleasure to hold in grateful remembrance the concert career of Emma Juch.

The performance of the orchestral numbers was worthy of undiluted praise. In solo work and in ensemble it was fully up to the old and the established reputation of the organization.

Attention is called frequently by the more inflamed disciples of Richard Wagner to the case of Charles Baudelaire, the poet of "Fleurs du Mal." It is true that in 1861 the "sleepless heart and sombre soul" of Mr. Baudelaire were moved mightily by the theories and the music of Wagner, and he achieved a pamphlet, entitled "Richard Wagner et Tannhauser à Paris," which is now quoted in second-hand book catalogues at seven or eight francs. The world, however, was ignorant of any other views of Mr. Baudelaire concerning music, which, by the way, he treated only from the standpoint of the layman, until Mr. Jules Claretie lately revealed the inner soul of the poet-critic. This revelation deserves a separate paragraph.

"I hear him still telling us, with a grimace not to be forgotten: 'I adore Wagner. But the music I prefer is that of a cat hung up by his tail outside of a window and trying to stick to the paper of glass with its claws. There is an odd grating on the glass which I find at the same time strange, irritating and singularly harmonious.'"

PHILIP HALE.

SWEET SOUNDS FROM BOSTON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Before New York's Culture and Scores a Triumph.

Special Dispatch to The Boston Journal.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3. A large and cultured audience witnessed the triumphant opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season in Chickering Hall to-night. Mr. Nikisch, in arranging his programme, made no effort to excite interest through novelty. Save the opening number, Tschaikowsky's overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," the music was extremely familiar, and this number had been heard here before. The performance of it was thrilling in the intensity of its feeling, the warmth of its tonal color and the energy and precision with which its throbbing rhythms were proclaimed.

In the scherzo from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony the skill of the Boston players was put to a severer test. The other orchestral number was Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which was finely played. The solo performances were Weber's air, "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," and Liszt's "Loreley," sung by Miss Emma Juch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE FIRST CONCERT OF THE SEASON.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH must have been conscious as he faced the large audience in Chickering Hall last Thursday evening that the popularity of his band had not waned since last spring; rather, indeed, that it had waxed. It was literally a gala night and the hall early in the evening displayed the legend "Standing Room Only," for every seat was filled and the walls downstairs and upstairs were fringed with music loving humanity. Indeed, a stranger might have well supposed that this city seldom heard orchestral music, and it seldom does hear the superior mode of playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here is the program that was discussed, a facsimile from Mr. W. F. Apthort's book of the music performed:

- Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet" Tschaikowsky
Andante non tanto quasi moderato (F sharp minor), 4-4.
Allegro giusto (B minor), 4-4.
Moderato assai (B major), 4-4.
Aria, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon" Weber
Miss Juch.
"Queen Mab" scherzo, from the symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" Berlioz
Song with orchestra, "Loreley" Liszt
Miss Juch.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4 Schumann
I. Rather slow (D minor), 3-4.
Lively (D minor), 2-4.
II. Rather slow (D minor, Hypodorian mode), 3-4.
III. Scherzo, lively (D minor), 3-4.
Trio: the same tempo (B flat major), 3-4.
IV. Slow (D minor), 4-4.
Lively (D major), 4-4.
Soloist, Miss Emma Juch.

This program, ranging from romanticism to ultra-modernity, was one in which the peculiar musical personality of Mr. Nikisch had ample scope and a test one as far as the technic of the orchestra was concerned. Primarily the Boston band is an emotional one, its brilliancy being but a secondary consideration. There is not its counterpart on this continent for crisp, elastic and homogeneous tone. Its responsiveness is marvelous, hence the impression it creates of being one huge, sonorous, exquisitely fashioned instrument played upon exquisitely by its leader. There was little to cavil at on Thursday night either at the mechanism or readings; perhaps a faint suspicion of impurity in the brass, otherwise the performance was almost an ideal one.

The Tschaikowsky overture fantasy is no novelty, and though in form and feeling it is distinctly program music it avoids the vicious realism of music of that class and aims rather at subtle suggestion than mock realistic effects; a superb piece of modern music charged to the full with the intensity, often hysterical and theatric, of this age. It teems with rich harmonies and is almost overlaid with color, but at bottom it is good music, beautiful music, and some pages of it will rank its composer with the immortals. Tschaikowsky has employed all the resources of our latter day orchestra, and the sweep, virility, almost majesty of his workmanship, in this work at least, should free him from the charge which might be justly brought against some of his contemporaries, i. e., a lack of elevation and dignity of style. He has a great temperament and is tremendously in earnest and his brush paints for us the woe and passion of Shakespeare's lovers. The dramatic situation is sensed finely and fierce pain and passion run riot in the score. Somebody once said that Berlioz' scores smelt of blood; this score of Tschaikowsky smells of love, burning, rapturous love—the love that only asks to live but a day. The prodigality of rhythms, the gorgeousness of instrumentation and the loving attention to detail so characteristic of this master were all brought out by Mr. Nikisch's imperious baton.

The "Queen Mab," that most daring of scherzos, was a veritable technical tour de force—a Meissonier sketch of exceeding and tender delicacy. Of the symphony there need little be said. It is one of Mr. Nikisch's favorites, and while he makes a few radical changes in tempi yet it was well played, the brilliancy of the last movement being most noteworthy. The new arrangement of the orchestra gives forth a most compact and almost formidable tone quality. As to the string department there can be but one verdict—its like is rarely heard. The singer of the evening was Miss Emma Juch, and she was most warmly received indeed. Artistic, musical to a degree, her style shows to advantage in Liszt's charming but slightly artificial "Loreley" (a tender old Volkslied framed in fire gilt). In Weber's great aria she lacked breadth of voice rather than intention. Nature, so generous in its gifts to Miss Juch, has denied her this much, and her performance was but a succès d'estime.

To be frank, soloists at the Boston Symphony orchestral concerts are fifth wheels to the wagon. The orchestra is the soloist, after all. The next concert occurs Thursday evening, December 8.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert at the Music Hall on Saturday evening, with the following programme: Suite by Dvorak; recitative and aria from "Oberon," "Ocean! thou mighty monster," Weber; Symphonie poem "Fruehlingswogen," by Philipp Scharwenka; "Die Loreley," song with orchestra, Franz Liszt; and Gade's B flat symphony. Miss Emma Juch was the soloist. The Scharwenka piece was given for the first time in Boston. One might with truth say that in places it is reminiscent and overlong in the working out, and again that at times the composer becomes decidedly original in his themes and equally happy in the treatment of them. The orchestral scoring is rich and varied and at the same time rational in the employment of the instruments.

The skilful contrapuntist is everywhere evident, and if the composer has not shown great depth of sentiment he has not fallen into the commonplace. The work was somewhat curtailed, which did not injure it in the least, for its greatest weakness consists in its prolixity. Had the work been well played it would have produced an entirely different effect upon the listener. It was given regardless of the author's indications, and thereby robbed of the element of delicacy that should prevail at times, its dolce e tranquillo being turned almost into a stentato e furioso, the "springwaves" of the composer becoming in the efforts of the orchestra the howling blasts of midwinter. But what can be expected of ever so good an army without a competent leader, or a well-manned ship without a skilful skipper? The Dvorak Suite, given in these concerts when Mr. Gericke conducted, is quaint, original, and very interesting.

The clarinet, horn, flute, oboe and English horn are beautifully employed in obligato form during the composition. Being lightly scored, the heavy guns of the orchestra not having an opportunity to get in their work, there was much that was enjoyable in the performance of the piece. The delightful Gade symphony, so full of grace, so gentle and tranquil in the composer's desires, at times so concise and yet complete in its treatment, was besmeared with coarseness in the rendering. It is with pleasure that one observes the artistic grasp that characterizes Miss Juch's musical nature. It is also with regret that one realizes how weak and worn is her voice in the middle range, how coarse in the lower notes, and also how forced and sharp often in the higher tones.

There are a few notes left to tell of what a fine organ she had before its excessive use in the American opera against a large and boisterous orchestra, notes enough to prove its inherent worth, a voice in the cultivation of which she should have possessed a method whereby she could have properly used it, and thereby improved and preserved it; a voice not of great magnitude but of a beautiful and pungent quality which, joined to her musical nature, fine intelligence and undoubted dramatic feeling would have given us a vocal artist of great value and one who could have stood first among the singers of today and one whose career should have been one of triumph and long duration. Aesthetically her rendering of the Weber recitative and aria was all that could be asked. Vocally it was inadequate. It was written to English words and she should have sung it in English.

Miss Juch had fair success with the Liszt song, the beauty of which lies wholly in the orchestral treatment, whether from Liszt's hand or some other one, I know not. Miss Juch, who looked charming, was recalled twice or more after the "Oberon" selection. The accompaniment of the orchestra to Miss Juch's selections was without discretion, the full orchestra being indulged in a loud and coarse performance. The programme for the next concert will be Saint-Saens's Symphony in A minor op. 55 (first time in Boston) concerto in F sharp minor by Ernst; humoresque for orchestra, Humperdink, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 2. Mr. T. Adamoski will be the soloist. There will be no concert next Saturday evening, this programme being given on the evening of Nov. 12. There can be no complaint concerning a lack of novelties in the programmes of this season thus far.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

FOR SALE—Seats floor P 23 and 24, $68 each, for Friday Rehearsals. W., P. O. Box 2216. 37(A) 08

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

FOR SALE—A few End Seats on floor at a low price. Address B. H. T., Transcript Office. 11(A) 011

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Seats sixth row from stage, $50.00, Side balcony $40.00. P. O. Box 1878. 37(A) 08

SYMPHONY

Seats for sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 120 Tremont street Room 97. 10(A) 022

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Good seats for sale by EDWARD E. CLARK, Stationer, No. 41 West street. 57(A) 08

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Two Good Seats in X, for $46.00 each. Address W. P. D., Transcript Office. 20(A) 011

color, but at bottom it is good music, beautiful music, and some pages of it will rank its composer with the immortals. Tschaikowsky has employed all the resources of our latter day orchestra, and the sweep, virility, almost majesty of his workmanship, in this work at least, should free him from the charge which might be justly brought against some of his contemporaries, i. e., a lack of elevation and dignity of style. He has a great temperament and is tremendously in earnest and his brush paints for us the woe and passion of Shakespeare's lovers. The dramatic situation is sensed finely and fierce pain and passion run riot in the score. Somebody once said that Berlioz' scores smelt of blood; this score of Tschaikowsky smells of love, burning, rapturous love—the love that only asks to live but a day. The prodigality of rhythms, the gorgeousness of instrumentation and the loving attention to detail so characteristic of this master were all brought out by Mr. Nikisch's imperious baton.

The "Queen Mab," that most daring of scherzos, was a veritable technical tour de force—a Meissonier sketch of exceeding and tender delicacy. Of the symphony there need little be said. It is one of Mr. Nikisch's favorites, and while he makes a few radical changes in tempi yet it was well played, the brilliancy of the last movement being most noteworthy. The new arrangement of the orchestra gives forth a most compact and almost formidable tone quality. As to the string department there can be but one verdict—its like is rarely heard. The singer of the evening was Miss Emma Juch, and she was most warmly received indeed. Artistic, musical to a degree, her style shows to advantage in Liszt's charming but slightly artificial "Loreley" (a tender old Volkslied framed in fire gilt). In Weber's great aria she lacked breadth of voice rather than intention. Nature, so generous in its gifts to Miss Juch, has denied her this much, and her performance was but a succès d'estime.

To be frank, soloists at the Boston Symphony orchestral concerts are fifth wheels to the wagon. The orchestra is the soloist, after all. The next concert occurs Thursday evening, December 8.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert at the Music Hall on Saturday evening, with the following programme: Suite by Dvorak; recitative and aria from "Oberon," "Ocean! thou mighty monster," Weber; Symphonic poem "Fruehlingswogen," by Philipp Scharwenka; "Die Loreley," song with orchestra, Franz Liszt; and Gade's B flat symphony. Miss Emma Juch was the soloist. The Scharwenka piece was given for the first time in Boston. One might with truth say that in places it is reminiscent and overlong in the working out, and again that at times the composer becomes decidedly original in his themes and equally happy in the treatment of them. The orchestral scoring is rich and varied and at the same time rational in the employment of the instruments.

The skilful contrapuntist is everywhere evident, and if the composer has not shown great depth of sentiment he has not fallen into the commonplace. The work was somewhat curtailed, which did not injure it in the least, for its greatest weakness consists in its prolixity. Had the work been well played it would have produced an entirely different effect upon the listener. It was given regardless of the author's indications, and thereby robbed of the element of delicacy that should prevail at times, its dolce e tranquillo being turned almost into a stentato e furioso, the "springwaves" of the composer becoming in the efforts of the orchestra the howling blasts of midwinter. But what can be expected of ever so good an army without a competent leader, or a well-manned ship without a skilful skipper? The Dvorak Suite, given in these concerts when Mr. Gericke conducted, is quaint, original, and very interesting.

The clarinet, horn, flute, oboe and English horn are beautifully employed in obligato form during the composition. Being lightly scored, the heavy guns of the orchestra not having an opportunity to get in their work, there was much that was enjoyable in the performance of the piece. The delightful Gade symphony, so full of grace, so gentle and tranquil in the composer's desires, at times so concise and yet complete in its treatment, was besmeared with coarseness in the rendering. It is with pleasure that one observes the artistic grasp that characterizes Miss Juch's musical nature. It is also with regret that one realizes how weak and worn is her voice in the middle range, how coarse in the lower notes, and also how forced and sharp often in the higher tones.

There are a few notes left to tell of what a fine organ she had before its excessive use in the American opera against a large and boisterous orchestra, notes enough to prove its inherent worth, a voice in the cultivation of which she should have possessed a method whereby she could have properly used it, and thereby improved and preserved it; a voice not of great magnitude but of a beautiful and pungent quality which, joined to her musical nature, fine intelligence and undoubted dramatic feeling would have given us a vocal artist of great value and one who could have stood first among the singers of today and one whose career should have been one of triumph and long duration. Aesthetically her rendering of the Weber recitative and aria was all that could be asked. Vocally it was inadequate. It was written to English words and she should have sung it in English.

Miss Juch had fair success with the Liszt song, the beauty of which lies wholly in the orchestral treatment, whether from Liszt's hand or some other one, I know not. Miss Juch, who looked charming, was recalled twice or more after the "Oberon" selection. The accompaniment of the orchestra to Miss Juch's selections was without discretion, the full orchestra being indulged in a loud and coarse performance. The programme for the next concert will be Saint-Saens's Symphony in A minor op. 55 (first time in Boston) concerto in F sharp minor by Ernst; humoresque for orchestra, Humperdink, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 2. Mr. T. Adamoski will be the soloist. There will be no concert next Saturday evening, this programme being given on the evening of Nov. 12. There can be no complaint concerning a lack of novelties in the programmes of this season thus far.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

FOR SALE—Seats floor P 23 and 24, $68 each, for Friday Rehearsals. W., P. O. Box 2216. 3t(A) o 8

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

FOR SALE—A few End Seats on floor, at a low price. Address B. H. T., Transcript Office. 1t(A) o 11

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Seats sixth row from stage, $50.00. Side balcony $40.00. P. O. Box 1878. 3t(A) o 8

SYMPHONY

Seats for sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 130 Tremont street Room 97. 1t(A) s 22

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Good seats for sale by EDWARD E. CLARK, Stationer, No. 41 West street. 5t(A) o 8

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Two Good Seats in X, for $46.00 each. Address W. P. D., Transcript Office. 2t(A) o 11

MUSICAL. *SonnetThe Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, was listened to by a very large audience. The programme was: Suite, by Dvorak; Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Symphonic Poem, "Fruehlingwogen," P. Scharwenka (first time here); Song, "Loreley," Liszt; and Symphony, B-flat, Gade. The soloist was Miss Emma Juch. The Dvorak suite was originally brought out here by Mr. Gerike. It is a piquant work, original, brilliant and interesting, and improves on acquaintance. By the way, the programme was very edifying in its notice of Dvorak, especially in connection with the pronunciation of his name, which, we learn, might be phonetically spelled in English, "Dvwhor-zhach," the r being silent. To achieve the phonetic English for Dvwh will make exceedingly entertaining practice for those who are at a loss for some amusement to while away an idle hour. We learn, also, that it is divided: Dv-rak. This is important, because there would naturally be a tendency to divide them: Dv-ora-k. The suite was exceedingly well played. The Scharwenka Symphonic poem is an industrious if not wholly lucid bit of trifling about nothing in particular. It is not quite clear what it is all about, and there is over much groping after cheap thematic development. It is long, but all that it says could have been said in half the space of time without making it any more interesting. There is throughout, a strong suggestion of parlor pianoforte pieces of the "By the Sea," "On the Lake," "Fluttering Leaves" and "Summer Breezes" order. Now and then there is an ambitious outburst of deeper sentiment, but it destroys the general balance. When a thing is essentially and consistently inane, it is scarcely judicious to disturb it by brief, incongruous flights in the direction of comparative sense. As a painful aberration, the music is not without a certain melancholy interest; but as a mixture it becomes unsatisfactory from any point of view. There were some pleasing moments in it, devoted to welcome reminiscences of Wagner, Schumann, Raff, Gounod and Ambrose Thomas. The depressing feature of the work was the apparent unwillingness of the composer to bring it to an end. The elegant, polished and always delightful Gade symphony was heard again with genuine delight. Here the composer knew when he had said all that it was necessary to say, and, artist-like, ended when he had said it. The work of the orchestra was the best of the season thus far. The selection from "Oberon" was the noble scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster." Miss Juch sang it with a full appreciation of its broad dramatic character. The artist's voice sounded worn, and was hardly of the large quality suited to the demands of the work, but the interpretation was wholly intelligent. Curiously enough Miss Juch sang it in German. As it was written in English words and was originally sung in English, it is not easy to understand why it should have been given in any other tongue, especially as the singer is perfectly at home in our language. She was three times recalled at the close of the aria. In "The Loreley" song, she was not as successful as she was in the other. Here, oddly enough, again, she sang in English, when the original is in German. As the translation is miserably bad, there was a good excuse for abandoning it in favor of Helne's own words. The ways of prima donnas, however, are inscrutable. Miss Juch was twice recalled for this song. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in A minor, op. 55, Saint-Saens (first time); Concerto for violin, Ernst; Humoresque, E. Humperdinck, and Symphony No. 2, Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. T. Adamowski.

A KINDLY DEED.

If any holder of a Symphony season ticket is unable or does not care to attend a concert, and if the ticket is forwarded to Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Lang will see that it is used by some deserving musician, who would otherwise be debarred from such pleasure and such education. Mr. Lang will see to it that the ticket is returned speedily to the owner.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

FOR SALE AT

KENDRICK'S,

Traveller Building,

31 STATE STREET.

SWtc[A]

s 24

SYMPHONY TICKETS

At Reasonable Prices. Tickets for All Theatres at

CASHIN'S TICKET OFFICE,

YOUNG'S HOTEL.

St[A]

Telephone 1010.

o 10

SYMPHONY.

A few seats left, in good locations, which we are closing out reasonably, reserving a few to rent as usual. Apply to MISS GOERING, Formerly with Russell, 10 Hamilton place.

to[A]

o 12

SYMPHONY * JOHN R. HEARD,
& THEATRE * 43 West St.
TICKETS. * Telephone 3544.

to[A]

o 10

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Two seats for alternate evenings, front row, second balcony, centre; price $12 each. Also two single seats, first balcony, for season; prices $18 and $20 each. Address H. M. D., Transcript Office.

to[A]

o 12

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

Two (2) Seats for Rehearsals on floor, in "L." Price $44 each. Address P. W. T., Transcript Office.

2t[A]

o 11

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

I have placed two tickets, 2nd row in first balcony, with Miles & Thompson, 13 West street. Price $40 each.

1t[A]

o 12

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Two Seats in first row of First Balcony, facing stage; $36.00 each. Address R. J. M., Transcript Office.

2t[A]

o 11

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Seats sixth row from stage, $50.00. Side balcony $38.00. P. O. Box 1878.

WThSt[A]

o 13

SYMPHONY.

Evening ticket, first balcony, side, good seat, sold cheap, as owner cannot use it. Address H. A. M., Transcript Office.

1t[A]

o 13

SYMPHONY TICKETS

All parts of hall at moderate prices.

CONNELLY TICKET OFFICE,

ADAMS HOUSE.

Telephone 2942.

to[A]

o 11

SYMPHONY

Seats for sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 120 Tremont street Room 97.

to[A]

s 22

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Good seats for sale by EDWARD E. CLARK, Stationer, No. 41 West street.

5t[A]

o 8

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Two Good Seats in X, for $46.00 each. Address W. P. D., Transcript Office.

2t[A]

o 11

MUSICAL.The Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, was listened to by a very large audience. The programme was: Suite, by Dvorak; Aria from "Oberon," Weber; Symphonic Poem, "Frühlingssagen," P. Scharwenka (first time here); Song, "Loreley," Liszt; and Symphony, B-flat, Gade. The soloist was Miss Emma Juch. The Dvorak suite was originally brought out here by Mr. Gerike. It is a piquant work, original, brilliant and interesting, and improves on acquaintance. By the way, the programme was very edifying in its notice of Dvorak, especially in connection with the pronunciation of his name, which, we learn, might be phonetically spelled in English, "Dvwhor-zhach," the r being silent. To achieve the phonetic English for Dvwh will make exceedingly entertaining practice for those who are at a loss for some amusement to while away an idle hour. We learn, also, that it is divided: Dvwhor-zhach. This is important, because there would naturally be a tendency to divide them: Dy-whor-zhach. The suite was exceedingly well played. The Scharwenka Symphonic poem is an industrious if not wholly lucid bit of trifling about nothing in particular. It is not quite clear what it is all about, and there is over much groping after cheap thematic development. It is long, but all that it says could have been said in half the space of time without making it any more interesting. There is throughout, a strong suggestion of parlor pianoforte pieces of the "By the Sea," "On the Lake," "Fluttering Leaves" and "Summer Breezes" order. Now and then there is an ambitious outburst of deeper sentiment, but it destroys the general balance. When a thing is essentially and consistently inane, it is scarcely judicious to disturb it by brief, incongruous flights in the direction of comparative sense. As a painful aberration, the music is not without a certain melancholy interest; but as a mixture it betrays unsatisfactory from any point of view. There were some pleasing moments in it, devoted to welcome reminiscences of Wagner, Schumann, Raff, Gounod and Ambrose Thomas. The depressing feature of the work was the apparent unwillingness of the composer to bring it to an end. The elegant, polished and always delightful Gade symphony was heard again with genuine delight. Here the composer knew when he had said all that it was necessary to say, and, artist-like, ended when he had said it. The work of the orchestra was the best of the season thus far. The selection from "Oberon" was the noble scene, "Ocean, thou mighty monster." Miss Juch sang it with a full appreciation of its broad dramatic character. The artist's voice sounded worn, and was hardly of the large quality suited to the demands of the work, but the interpretation was wholly intelligent. Curiously enough Miss Juch sang it in German. As it was written in English words and was originally sung in English, it is not easy to understand why it should have been given in any other tongue, especially as the singer is perfectly at home in our language. She was three times recalled at the close of the aria. In "The Loreley" song, she was not as successful as she was in the other. Here, oddly enough, again, she sang in English, when the original is in German. As the translation is miserably bad, there was a good excuse for abandoning it in favor of Heine's own words. The ways of prima donnas, however, are inscrutable. Miss Juch was twice recalled for this song. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in A-minor, op. 55, Saint-Saëns (first time); Concerto for violin, Ernst; Humoresque, E. Humperdinck, and Symphony No. 2, Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. T. Adamowski.

A KINDLY DEED.

If any holder of a Symphony season ticket is unable or does not care to attend a concert, and if the ticket is forwarded to Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Lang will see that it is used by some deserving musician, who would otherwise be debarred from such pleasure and such education. Mr. Lang will see to it that the ticket is returned speedily to the owner.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

FOR SALE AT

KENDRICK'S,

Traveller Building,

31 STATE STREET.

SWtc[A]

s 24

SYMPHONY TICKETS

At Reasonable Prices. Tickets for All Theatres at

CASHIN'S TICKET OFFICE,
YOUNG'S HOTEL.

3t[A]

Telephone 1010.

o 10

SYMPHONY.

A few seats left, in good locations, which we are closing out reasonably, reserving a few to rent as usual. Apply to

MISS GOERING,

Formerly with Russell, 10 Hamilton place.

tc[A]

o 12

SYMPHONY * JOHN R. HEARD,
& THEATRE * 43 West St.
TICKETS. * Telephone 3544.

tc[A]

o 10

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Two seats for alternate evenings, front row, second balcony, centre; price $12 each. Also two single seats, first balcony, for season; prices $18 and $20 each. Address H. M. D., Transcript Office.

1t[A]

o 12

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

Two (2) Seats for Rehearsals on floor, in "L." Price $44 each. Address P. W. T., Transcript Office.

2t[A]

o 11

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

I have placed two tickets, 2nd row in first balcony, with Miles & Thompson, 13 West street. Price $40 each.

1t[A]

R. N. LISTER.

o 12

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Two Seats in first row of First Balcony, facing stage; $39.00 each. Address R. J. M., Transcript Office.

2t[A]

o 11

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Seats sixth row from stage, $50.00. Side balcony $38.00. P. O. Box 1878.

WThSt[A]

o 12

SYMPHONY.

Evening ticket, first balcony, side, good seat, sold cheap, as owner cannot use it. Address H. A. M., Transcript Office.

1t[A]

o 12

SYMPHONY TICKETS

All parts of hall at moderate prices.

CONNELLY TICKET OFFICE,
ADAMS HOUSE.

Telephone 2942.

tc[A]

o 11

SYMPHONY

Seats for sale by GEO. W. STEWART, 120 Tremont street Room 97.

tc[A]

s 22

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Good seats for sale by EDWARD E. CLARK, Stationer, No. 41 West street.

5t[A]

o 8

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Two Good Seats in X, for $46.00 each. Address W. P. D., Transcript Office.

2t[A]

o 11

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS. SYMPHONY No. 2, in A minor. op. 55.

- I. Allegro marcato. A minor.
- Allegro appassionato. A minor.
- II. Adagio. E major;
- III. Scherzo; Presto. A minor.
- Un poco meno mosso. A major.
- IV. Prestissimo. A major.

(First time in these Concerts.)

HEINRICH WILHELM ERNST. CONCERTO in one movement for VIOLIN, in F sharp minor, op. 23.
Allegro pathétique. F sharp minor.

E. HUMPERDINK.

HUMORESQUE for ORCHESTRA.
(First time in Boston.)

LUDVIG VAN BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 2.

- I. Adagio molto. D major.—Allegro con brio. D major.
- II. Larghetto. A major.
- III. Scherzo; Allegro. D major.
- Trio; the same tempo. D major.
- IV. Allegro molto. D major.

SOLOIST:

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Artful Simplicity of Camille Saint-Saens.

News and Gossip at Home and Abroad.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony, A minor, Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin, F sharp, Ernst
Humoresque, E. Humperdink
Symphony No. 2, Beethoven

The novelty was the Humoresque for orchestra by Mr. E. Humperdink. Humperdink is a name that suggests Koog-Zaandijk or Zaltbommel as a birthplace, with the scenic accompaniments of dikes and windmills, but it is said that Mr. Humperdink is a Bavarian and the teacher of Siegfried Wagner. That he is a Bavarian is not impossible; that he teaches the son of Wagner is an excuse for ingenious speculation. The questions "How?" and "What?" naturally arise. Siegfried is no longer a boy, and his father did not propose that he should be a musician. The Humoresca, or Humoreske, or Humoresque, is a form of musical entertainment found in the writings of Schumann, Rubinstein, Heller and Grieg, and its name seems to be derived in accordance with the principle of lucus a non lucendo. The piece by Humperdink is no exception, and there is no humor in the idea or the carrying out of the idea. The professional musical jester is apt to be a wet blanket. There are few who can write up to the level of such a title. It is an open question whether music per se, absolute music, can convey a humorous or a laughable idea. There may be an expression of the grotesque, of the bizarre, a noble strain may be burlesqued as in the "Fantastic Symphony" of Berlioz, but the amusement of the hearer is skin deep, and arises chiefly from the fact that he has been previously warned of the impending jest. Then again, humor may seem of different meaning to Mr. Humperdink, for, according to the ancients, melancholy itself, "melancholy, cold and dry, thick, black and sour," is one of the four humors, and analogous to an element and an age of man. Mr. Humperdink has seasoned his melancholy with fluid extracts of Raff and Meyerbeer (if I am not mistaken), and thus aroused a desire in the hearer at table to taste these composers in their full strength; just as frozen puddings whet the appetite of a victim of alcohol and do not quench the raging fire within. The stolidity of the purpose of Mr. Humperdink is no doubt praiseworthy, and his Humoresque shows that he is a safe and a serious companion for a young man. But such compositions, even when they find a publisher in Germany, have no place in a Symphony concert in Boston.

The A minor symphony of Saint-Saens was played for the first time in these concerts. It is a thoroughly delightful and skillfully constructed work. First of all, it is without padding, without vain repetitions. The technical skill shown perhaps most nakedly in the first movement is not that of the pedagogue, but of the well-bred man of the world who by chance finds himself in the society of scientists and enters into the conversation with intelligence and yet with modesty. His knowledge is simply a part of his pleasure in life; he does not exist for its display. Furthermore, please note the amiable ease with which Saint-Saens solves his problems. In the three movements that follow he enjoys himself. The adagio is a temporary fit of contemplation, but the man does not withdraw from the world so completely or for so long a time that he becomes morose or unintelligible. It is a pleasant reverie finely expressed in music. There are no soul-writhings, no violent gesturing, no sullen imprecations that escape the barrier of clenched teeth. This adagio is beautiful and simple music. And in the scherzo and the finale, although there is pronounced melody that dances, although there are effects gained by appeals to the feet and by rhythmic surprises, there is not a touch of the commonplace, not a suspicion of vulgarity. The refinement of the composer is contagious; the instruments are never noisy; they do not interrupt; they each in turn say their say, and each knows how to listen to his neighbor. It is seldom in these days that we are fortunate enough to have an opportunity of finding such a combination of skill, simplicity, grace and beauty. Our modern composers, wish not only to tickle, "they must also chafe. Let a palate become accustomed to black pepper, and it will desire paprika, and then cayenne. Finally these spices, too, will refuse to create an impression," and then aqua-fortis is poured in quantity. But in this work of an eminently modern Frenchman there is a keen appreciation of the value of artistic simplicity.

This symphony was played exceedingly well, and so, in the main, was the symphony by Beethoven. The opening measures of the larghetto of the latter were not sung frankly enough; there was an exaggeration of the nuances, and nervous energy seemed at times misplaced.

Mr. T. Adamowski played the concert patheutique by H. W. Ernst. When Ernst played this concerto in manuscript in 1849, at a concert in Leipzig, there was an overture by Rietz and an aria by Flotow on the programme. It is said that Ernst then made a profound impression by his surpassing skill, but we live under a different dispensation, and Mr. Adamowski is not an Ernst. The piece itself seems intrinsically trivial, and its technical difficulties without genuine purpose. The chief theme is, like many that are found in forgotten salon-compositions, bound up in old-fashioned volumes, between "The Wrecker's Daughter Quickstep" and "Gen. Persifer F. Smith's March." It bears a strong resemblance to tunes popular in the negro minstrel "grand-ohio"; tunes that accompany the verbal statement of a lover's floral tribute or tell of a picture with its face turned toward the wall. The concerto presents great difficulties to the performer; and Mr. Adamowski apparently realized this fact, for his playing was not of the marked excellence that characterized his solo work of last year. His intonation was not always pure, and his tone was at times thin and dry. He was applauded heartily at the close.

It may be remembered that in the spring of 1891 a singer appeared in Boston Music Hall, and her name was Antonia Mielke. She was heard in the music of Beethoven and Wagner. She was Kundry in the private performance of "Parsifal" and when Mr. Lang invited many in May of this year to witness the sight of Parsifal, Amfortas and Klingsor in conventional concert dress and pleasingly combed her, to Mrs. Mielke, took place on the platform. Her performance filled the souls of the devout worshippers of Wagner with exceeding joy; rhapsodies were chanted in her praise; and the word "intellectuality" was on the lips of many. Even then there were doubting Thomases, who admitted that she was a peg higher in the lyric notch than those zealous and destructive declaimers, Miss Marie John and Mrs. Steinbach-Johns, who came to us before her; but they denied vehemently that she was a skillful or wholly pleasing singer. Now, Mrs. Mielke sang a short time ago at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipzig, and the Signale No 57 contains an instructive account of her performance. She sang the great air from "Oberon" and songs by Wagner, Schubert and Jensen. The critic of the Signale writes as follows:

"Mrs. Mielke, a German by birth, who also began her career in Germany, comes from America, i. e. New York, and she is so Americanized that her arrival was preceded by strong puffery. * * * She made a favorable impression, although she did not provoke enthusiasm. Neither her voice nor her employment of it is calculated to awaken enthusiasm. The voice is indeed powerful, but it is without real fullness and sonority, and in the upper register and the forte the tones sound acrid and shrill, as though they had lost their original freshness in consequence of over exertion. Her handling of this organ shows more natural method than rounded technical education, as, for instance, in the wavering and agitation of the tone, the different quality of tone on different vowels, and in the tendency to fall below the true pitch."

The reviewer then applies a soothing lotion by speaking pleasantly, but in moderate terms, of her temperament and knowledge of the proper expression. It is true that there, as here, she was applauded and recalled; but in view of the discriminating words of the kindly disposed German reviewer, is it not possible that the American admirers of German vocalization are more German than the Germans themselves, and are only too madly inclined to indulge in frenetic rapture at the sound of the beloved foreign guitars?

PHILIP HALE

The program of the fourth concert of the Symphony Orchestra, November 12, was as follows:

Symphony, A minor..... Saint Saëns
Concerto for violin, F sharp minor..... Ernst
Humoresque for orchestra..... Humperdink
Symphony No. 2..... Beethoven

The feature of Saturday evening was the symphony by Saint-Saëns, and yet it is doubtful whether the audience appreciated fully this delightful work. Its workmanship is too fine, perhaps; there are no nerve shattering effects; there is no profundity that is akin to bathos. The musician rejoices in the contrapuntal seriousness of the first movement, which is free from pedagogic baldness and severity. Saint-Saëns is too much of a man of the world to insist on his learning, just as he is too well bred to attempt to startle by sensational means. How simple and how beautiful is the short adagio! The scherzo is a charming example of French refinement and piquancy in melody, harmony and instrumentation; the finale is not merely a brilliant signature and flourish; there is something said, something that is worth the remembering. It is true that the work is free from volcanic emotion and the deep intellectuality that is the brother of dull obscurity. It is eminently sane. The thought is often expressed in epigrams.

pils are enticed to begin they are ready. For in the hearer y signed a contract with the hearer ic hall for a salary of $2 gesting in ad made such a slipshod devices.
e question. The contracte second the first year at the salaryent. But ement can give him more when it are that the management and it is he proceeds, for the simple o do so. I am sorry that f music contract because he might and a I waited until he had comiees of ll the rôle of 'Faust' acng. It the instruction he was re:ram of afternoon entertainment.

Exposition, Vienna.—This ber 10 with a deficit of about ole guarantee fund of $60,000 pain.—Richard Strauss must recent indisposition, for he was of the first concert this season

sic. The chief number was the cel, the 'cellist, and Stavenhagen.

cert.—Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" of the Berlin Wagner Society November 21.

agement.—Moran Olden, the

MUSICAL RECORD

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows: Symphony No. 2 in A minor, Saint-Saens; concerto for violin in E-sharp minor, Ernst; humorous for orchestra, E. Humperdink; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Beethoven. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist. The Saint-Saens symphony, which has been heard in Boston only once before, on Dec. 2, 1880, by the Harvard Musical Association Orchestra, is a charming work, masterly, brief, and classically pure in its construction. For so delightful and spontaneous a composition, written 30 to 40 years ago, not to have been heard before at these concerts is strange, and it is to be hoped that it will be given again in due season. It is most exquisitely scored and met with a fair performance at the hands of the orchestra, the delicacy and the refinement of the composition not being rasped and blown apart, as is too often the case in works of a gentle character at these concerts. The humor of Mr. Humperdink was not discovered in his piece, unless it consisted in his presentation of the march theme from Raff's "Leonora" symphony badly disguised.

In selecting the Ernst concerto Mr. Adamowski was not happy for it was beneath the character of the works of higher order that he plays so finely. The piece is trivial and the difficulties tremendous. Mr. Adamowski's tone was no. always evenly good and the difficult passages in octaves were not always in perfect tune, but then more noted players have made sadder havoc with these octaves than he did on this occasion. He was recalled several times, however.

The Beethoven Symphony was played with less of the coarse and noisy effect identical with the performance of the classics by this orchestra, but the monotone of little contrast and of inexpression was nevertheless everywhere apparent. We remember with pleasure the wonderful performance of this symphony under the direction of Mr. Kneisel two seasons ago, when owing to the illness of the incumbent, Mr. Kneisel took the baton, and at once the wonderful perfection of the orchestra that existed during Mr. Gericke's control, was immediately restored, and a rendering of this charming symphony under the artistic, refined, yet firm, direction of Mr. Kneisel, made the critical listeners yearn for a continuance of just such capable conducting so much in contrast to what has been the order of things since Mr. Gericke's departure. The next concert, Nov. 19, will present the following programme: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz, and Liszt's Symphonie Poem, "Tasso." Mr. E. A. MacDowell will be the pianist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

WARREN DAVENPORT.
If any of the subscribers of the symphony concert series will kindly send their tickets to Mr. B. J. Lang when they are not going to use them he will become responsible for them and see that they are returned promptly. By so doing deserving students will be enabled to attend the concerts who otherwise would be deprived of the privilege. It is a gracious act upon the part of Mr. Lang to so interest himself in behalf of these young men and women but it is only one of the many acts of his consideration and kindness. The tickets may be sent to Mr. B. J. Lang at 152 Tremont street.

MUSICAL MATTERS

The Boston Orchestra's Success in Other Cities.

The Boston Symphony orchestra ended its first tour of the present season at Brooklyn last evening, and it is gratifying to local pride to be able to say that the success of the home concerts of this organization has been fully equalled in all the cities visited during the week.

The severity of the tests which the orchestra is put to in visiting the other cities included in these occasional tours can hardly be over stated, and the ready recognition of the merits of the Boston orchestra and its conductor, from both the press and public of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, affords indisputable evidence of its value as a musical organization.

Even in New York city, where the public is well supplied with concerts of a similar character to those given by the Boston orchestra, there was "standing room only" long before the evening of the concert, and a similar condition of affairs existed in Baltimore and Philadelphia, the receipts in these three cities exceeding those of any visit in former seasons. The audience in Philadelphia numbered 3300 by actual count, 700 of these being admission ticket buyers who came early and stood through the programme.

Such results fully justify the estimate put upon value of the Boston orchestra in this city.

hair, 16, Mrs. Mielke, too, stood on the platform. Her performance filled the souls of the devout worshippers of Wagner with exceeding joy; rhapsodies were chanted in her praise; and the word "intellectuality" was on the lips of many. Even then there were doubting Thomases, who admitted that she was a peg higher in the lyric notch than those zealous and destructive declaimers, Miss Marie John and Mrs. Steinbach-Johns, who came to us before her; but they denied vehemently that she was a skillful or wholly pleasing singer. Now, Mrs. Mielke sang a short time ago at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipzig, and the Signale No. 57 contains an instructive account of her performance. She sang the great air from "Oberon" and songs by Wagner, Schubert and Jensen. The critic of the Signale writes as follows:

"Mrs. Mielke, a German by birth, who also began her career in Germany, comes from America, i. e. New York, and she is so Americanized that her arrival was preceded by strong puffery. * * * She made a favorable impression, although she did not provoke enthusiasm. Neither her voice nor her employment of it is calculated to awaken enthusiasm. The voice is indeed powerful, but it is without real fullness and sonority, and in the upper register and the forte the tones sound acrid and shrill, as though they had lost their original freshness in consequence of over exertion. Her handling of this organ shows more natural method than rounded technical education, as, for instance, in the wavering and agitation of the tone, the different quality of tone on different vowels, and in the tendency to fall below the true pitch."

The reviewer then applies a soothing lotion by speaking pleasantly, but in moderate terms, of her temperament and knowledge of the proper expression. It is true that there, as here, she was applauded and recalled; but in view of the discriminating words of the kindly disposed German reviewer, is it not possible that the American admirers of German vocalization are more German than the Germans themselves, and are only too readily inclined to indulge in frenetic rapture at the sound of the beloved foreign gutturals?

PHILIP HALE.

The program of the fourth concert of the Symphony Orchestra, November 12, was as follows:

Symphony, A minor.....Saint Saëns
Concerto for violin, F sharp minor.....Ernst
Humoresque for orchestra.....Humperdink
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven

The feature of Saturday evening was the symphony by Saint-Saëns, and yet it is doubtful whether the audience appreciated fully this delightful work. Its workmanship is too fine, perhaps; there are no nerve shattering effects; there is no profundity that is akin to bathos. The musician rejoices in the contrapuntal seriousness of the first movement, which is free from pedagogic baldness and severity. Saint-Saëns is too much of a man of the world to insist on his learning, just as he is too well bred to attempt to startle by sensational means. How simple and how beautiful is the short adagio! The scherzo is a charming example of French refinement and piquancy in melody, harmony and instrumentation; the finale is not merely a brilliant signature and flourish; there is something said, something that is worth the remembering. It is true that the work is free from volcanic emotion and the deep intellectuality that is the brother of dull obscurity. It is eminently sane. The thought is often expressed in epigrams.

pils are enticed to begin they are ready. For in the hearer y signed a contract with the hearer ic hall for a salary of $2 gesting in ad made such a slipshod devices. question. The contracte second the first year at the salary. But ement can give him more when it are that the management and it is he proceeds, for the simple o do so. I am sorry that music ontract because he might and a waited until he had comieces of ll the rôle of 'Faust' acng. It the instruction he was regram of the instruction he was regram of the instruction he was regram of gain.—Richard Strauss must cent indisposition, for he was of the first concert this season sic. The chief number was the el, the 'cellist, and Stavenagen.

Exposition, Vienna.—This per io with a deficit of about ole guarantee fund of $60,000

cert.—Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" of the Berlin Wagner Society November 21.

agement.—Moran Alden, th

MUSICAL RECORD.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows: Symphony No. 2 in A minor, Saint-Saëns; concerto for violin in F-sharp minor, Ernst; humoresque for orchestra, E. Humperdink; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Beethoven. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist. The Saint-Saëns symphony, which has been heard in Boston only once before, on Dec. 2, 1880, by the Harvard Musical Association Orchestra, is a charming work, masterly, brief, and classically pure in its construction. For so delightful and spontaneous a composition, written 30 to 40 years ago, not to have been heard before at these concerts is strange, and it is to be hoped that it will be given again in due season. It is most exquisitely scored and met with a fair performance at the hands of the orchestra, the delicacy and the refinement of the composition not being rasped and blown apart, as is too often the case in works of a gentle character at these concerts. The humor of Mr. Humperdink was not discovered in his piece, unless it consisted in his presentation of the march theme from Raff's "Leonora" symphony badly disguised.

In selecting the Ernst concerto Mr. Adamowski was not happy for it was beneath the character of the works of higher order that he plays so finely. The piece is trivial and the difficulties tremendous. Mr. Adamowski's tone was no. always evenly good and the difficult passages in octaves were not always in perfect tune, but then more noted players have made sadder havoc with these octaves than he did on this occasion. He was recalled several times, however.

The Beethoven Symphony was played with less of the coarse and noisy effect identical with the performance of the classics by this orchestra, but the monotone of little contrast and of inexpression was nevertheless everywhere apparent. We remember with pleasure the wonderful performance of this symphony under the direction of Mr. Kneisel two seasons ago, when owing to the illness of the incumbent, Mr. Kneisel took the baton, and at once the wonderful perfection of the orchestra that existed during Mr. Gericke's control, was immediately restored, and a rendering of this charming symphony under the artistic, refined, yet firm, direction of Mr. Kneisel, made the critical listeners yearn for a continuance of just such capable conducting so much in contrast to what has been the order of things since Mr. Gericke's departure. The next concert, Nov. 19, will present the following programme: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso." Mr. E. A. MacDowell will be the pianist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

If any of the subscribers of the symphony concert series will kindly send their tickets to Mr. B. J. Lang when they are not going to use them he will become responsible for them and see that they are returned promptly. By so doing deserving students will be enabled to attend the concerts who otherwise would be deprived of the privilege. It is a gracious act upon the part of Mr. Lang to so interest himself in behalf of these young men and women but it is only one of the many acts of his consideration and kindness. The tickets may be sent to Mr. B. J. Lang at 152 Tremont street.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Boston Orchestra's Success in Other Cities.

The Boston Symphony orchestra ended its first tour of the present season at Brooklyn last evening, and it is gratifying to local pride to be able to say that the success of the home concerts of this organization has been fully equalled in all the cities visited during the week.

The severity of the tests which the orchestra is put to in visiting the other cities included in these occasional tours can hardly be over stated, and the ready recognition of the merits of the Boston orchestra and its conductor, from both the press and public of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, affords indisputable evidence of its value as a musical organization.

Even in New York city, where the public is well supplied with concerts of a similar character to those given by the Boston orchestra, there was "standing room only" long before the evening of the concert, and a similar condition of affairs existed in Baltimore and Philadelphia, the receipts in these three cities exceeding those of any visit in former seasons. The audience in Philadelphia numbered 3300 by actual count, 700 of these being admission ticket buyers who came early and stood through the programme.

Such results fully justify the estimate put upon value of the Boston orchestra in this city.

hair, to Mrs. Mielke, too, stood on her performance filled the souls of worshippers of Wagner with exuberant rhapsodies were chanted in her word "intellectuality" was on the lips. Even then there were doubting Thaddeus admitted that she was a peg higher notch than those zealous and claimers, Miss Marie John and Mr. Johns, who came to us before he denied vehemently that she was wholly pleasing singer. Now, Mrs. a short time ago at a Gewandhaus Leipzig, and the Signale No. 57 constructive account of her performance sang the great air from "Oberon" Wagner, Schubert and Jensen. The Signale writes as follows:

"Mrs. Mielke, a German by birth began her career in Germany. America, i. e. New York, and she learned that her arrival was prece puffery. * * * She made a favor sion, although she did not provoke Neither her voice nor her employn calculated to awaken enthusiasm. indeed powerful, but it is without and sonority, and in the upper reg forte the tones sound acrid and shir they had lost their original freshn quence of over exertion. Her hant organ shows more natural method technical education, as, for inst wavering and agitation of the ton ent quality of tone on different vo the tendency to fall below the true

The reviewer then applies a so ly speaking pleasantly, but in me of her temperament and know proper expression. It is true th here, she was applauded and rec view of the discriminating words disposed German reviewer, is it that the American admirers of G zation are more German than themselves, and are only too mad indulge in frenetic rapture at the beloved foreign gutturals?

The program of the fourth orchestra, November 12, was as Symphony, A minor. Concerto for violin, F sharp n Humoresque for orchestra. Symphony No. 2.

The feature of Saturday eve Saint-Saëns, and yet it is doubtpreciated fully this delightful too fine, perhaps; there are i there is no profundity that i cian rejoices in the contrapu movement, which is free from verity. Saint-Saëns is too much insist on his learning, just as he is too well bred to attempt to startle by sensational means. How simple and how beautiful is the short adagio! The scherzo is a charming example of French refinement and piquancy in melody, harmony and instrumentation; the finale is not merely a brilliant signature and flourish; there is something said, something that is worth the remembering. It is true that the work is free from volcanic emotion and the deep intellectuality that is the brother of dull obscurity. It is eminently sane. The thought is often expressed in epigrams.

The composer does not hammer his ideas into the hearer by anxious repetition; he admits frankly that the hearer has intelligence. He is even content with suggesting in certain instances, and leaves the hearer to his own devices. There : no trombones, tuba or harp, and in the second movement the horns, trumpets and drums are silent. But when an instrument speaks it is with reason, and when it is delivered of speech its mission is accomplished and it is silent.

Humperdink is not a familiar name to students of music or concert goers. It is said that he is a Bavarian and a hard student. Like most professedly humorous pieces of music this humoresque is a cheap and dreary thing. It might not be out of place as a stopgap in the program of a German watering place Sunday afternoon entertainment, but it is not humorous in conception or in instrumentation. The suggestion of the march in Raff's "Lenore" is brought into juxtaposition with a reminiscence of Meyerbeer, but there is no point in the piece, and there is no reason why such a composition should be played in a symphony concert.

Mr. Adamowski played the Ernst concerto for violin, and although he was applauded loudly his performance was by no means beyond the reach of criticism. It is true that this vehicle for virtuosoship is a severe strain on the performer, and if the ancient saw is to be commended Mr. Adamowski is to be praised for firing his arrow at the sun. His intonation was not always pure, his tone was often thin and dry, and as a whole the concerto was beyond his capacity. As played by him the concerto seemed hopelessly old fashioned, and at the same time trivial and dull. We are told that Ernst produced a great effect with it, but Ernst was a remarkable violinist and we live under another musical consulship.

The orchestral numbers were played in the main exceedingly well, although a few exceptions might have been taken to the reading of the slow movement of the Beethoven symphony; for the first theme was not given frankly, but with exaggeration in the observance and the interpolation of nuances. Mr. MacDowell will play the solo part of his A minor concerto for piano next Saturday, and the other numbers of the program will be Brahms' third symphony, the "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes" of Berlioz, and Liszt's "Tasso."

The program of the fourth orchestra, November 12, was as Symphony, A minor. Concerto for violin, F sharp n Humoresque for orchestra. Symphony No. 2.

MUSICAL RECORD.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows: Symphony No. 2 in A minor, Saint-Saëns; concerto for violin in F-sharp minor, Ernst; humoresque for orchestra, E. Humperdink; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Beethoven. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist. The Saint-Saëns symphony, which has been heard in Boston only once before, on Dec. 2, 1880, by the Harvard Musical Association Orchestra, is a charming work, masterly, brief, and classically pure in its construction. For so delightful and spontaneous a composition, written 30 to 40 years ago, not to have been heard before at these concerts is strange, and it is to be hoped that it will be given again in due season. It is most exquisitely scored and met with a fair performance at the hands of the orchestra, the delicacy and the refinement of the composition not being rasped and blown apart, as is too often the case in works of a gentle character at these concerts. The humor of Mr. Humperdink was not discovered in his piece, unless it consisted in his presentation of the march theme from Raff's "Leonora" symphony badly disguised.

In selecting the Ernst concerto Mr. Adamowski was not happy for it was beneath the character of the works of higher order that he plays so finely. The piece is trivial and the difficulties tremendous. Mr. Adamowski's tone was no always evenly good and the difficult passages in octaves were not always in perfect tune, but then more noted players have made sadder havoc with these octaves than he did on this occasion. He was recalled several times, however.

The Beethoven Symphony was played with less of the coarse and noisy effect identical with the performance of the classics by this orchestra, but the monotone of little contrast and of inexpression was nevertheless everywhere apparent. We remember with pleasure the wonderful performance of this symphony under the direction of Mr. Kneisel two seasons ago, when owing to the illness of the incumbent, Mr. Kneisel took the baton, and at once the wonderful perfection of the orchestra that existed during Mr. Gericke's control, was immediately restored, and a rendering of this charming symphony under the artistic, refined, yet firm, direction of Mr. Kneisel, made the critical listeners yearn for a continuance of just such capable conducting so much in contrast to what has been the order of things since Mr. Gericke's departure. The next concert, Nov. 19, will present the following programme: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz, and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso." Mr. E. A. MacDowell will be the pianist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

If any of the subscribers of the symphony concert series will kindly send their tickets to Mr. B. J. Lang when they are not going to use them he will become responsible for them and see that they are returned promptly. By so doing deserving students will be enabled to attend the concerts who otherwise would be deprived of the privilege. It is a gracious act upon the part of Mr. Lang to so interest himself in behalf of these young men and women but it is only one of the many acts of his consideration and kindness. The tickets may be sent to Mr. B. J. Lang at 152 Tremont street.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Boston Orchestra's Success in Other Cities.

The Boston Symphony orchestra ended its first tour of the present season at Brooklyn last evening, and it is gratifying to local pride to be able to say that the success of the home concerts of this organization has been fully equalled in all the cities visited during the week.

The severity of the tests which the orchestra is put to in visiting the other cities included in these occasional tours can hardly be over stated, and the ready recognition of the merits of the Boston orchestra and its conductor, from both the press and public of New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore and Washington, affords indisputable evidence of its value as a musical organization.

Even in New York city, where the public is well supplied with concerts of a similar character to those given by the Boston orchestra, there was "standing room only" long before the evening of the concert, and a similar condition of affairs existed in Baltimore and Philadelphia, the receipts in these three cities exceeding those of any visit in former seasons. The audience in Philadelphia numbered 3300 by actual count, 700 of these being admission ticket buyers who came early and stood through the programme.

Such results fully justify the estimate put upon value of the Boston orchestra in this city.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist
Mr. T. Adamowski.

Director Arthur Nikisch has seldom succeeded better in providing an enjoyable evening's entertainment for the patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts than in the selection and arrangement of last evening's programme. It had a symphony at each end, to be sure, but the works, with the intervening compositions, afforded a constant source of pleasure and left a most satisfying impression of the event.

The symphony in A minor, No. 2, op. 55, by Camille Saint-Saëns, made the opening of the programme, the work having had but a single hearing here, years ago, when the Harvard Symphony orchestra was in existence. It is in strong contrast to the latter symphonic writings of this famous French composer, as it is entirely lacking in the quaint conceits and bizarre effects in which he so delights. The second movement is a gem in the way of a romanza, and its graceful measures have a charm which is seldom realized in the more recent works of Saint-Saëns. The odd and original scherzo is equally pleasing in its way, and the prestissimo, which ends the work, affords a brilliant finale to this most enjoyable symphony.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist, and this very popular violinist is to be commended for his choice of Ernst's concerto in F-sharp minor for his annual appearance as a soloist in these concerts. The one movement of which the work consists is built upon a wonderfully melodious theme, which is worked out with constantly fascinating variations, which afford rare opportunities for the skilful soloist, and present ever pleasing and varied tone colorings in the orchestration. The concerto is admirably suited to such a player as Mr. Adamowski, whose pure, true tones, artistic finish and sympathetic characteristics all found a fine display in its performance. The theme was sung in its simplest form, with delicate taste and expression, and its variations were given with faultless skill. Mr. Adamowski commanded the applause of his audience, as he has often done in former years, and he has never more honestly won the commendation of his hearers than on this occasion.

A bright and decidedly captivating "Humoresque" for orchestra, by Humperdink, gave Director Nikisch an opportunity to show the technical skill of his organization to good advantage, and a most satisfying reading of the second of the Beethoven symphonies ended the evening's programme.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Mr. E. A. MacDowell, pianist, and the programme will consist of Brahms' symphony No. 3 in F major, MacDowell's concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in A minor, Berlioz's menuet des Follets and danse des sylphes from "Damnation of Faust," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso."

SYMPHONY SEASON.

Two Novelties at Last Evening's Concert
in Music Hall.

The ensemble proficiency of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra was plainly illustrated last evening by the almost faultless interpretation of the Beethoven second or "perfect" symphony, a work filled with melody and sunshine and not a portrayal of a struggle from darkness to light, like the fifth and ninth.

The theme of the first movement is very simple and harmonious and appeals even to the uneducated ear. This motif is wonderfully worked out and retains its distinctive trait throughout the development of the idea.

Beautifully the orchestra played the number. From the dainty introduction on the strings, through the noble orchestration and more varied themes of the second and third parts up to the capricious finale, their work was deserving of naught but praise, and the effect on the audience was most marked, the selection receiving the heartiest indorsement of the evening.

Saint-Saëns' symphony No. 2 was given for the first time at these concerts. The work was originally scored for a small orchestra, and seems better suited for a smaller body of players than to the Symphony force.

It is a light composition written in a rather unusual manner, one might say it contained "musical surprises," with a lively tarantella for the finale, which was finely given last evening. The piece deviates somewhat from the accepted symphonic form, and is characterized by the author's brilliancy of style and peculiar treatment of the opening theme.

Mr. Adamowski played the Heinrich Ernst concerto in a delightful manner. "Humoresque," for orchestra, proved uninteresting, for which the composer and not the performers are to blame.

The programme for the next rehearsal and concert this week will be Brahms' symphony No. 3 in F major; concerto for piano in A minor, MacDowell; minuet and dance from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." Mr. MacDowell will be the soloist.

—Mr. Adamowski, as soloist, attracted the largest rehearsal audience of the season on Friday. Every seat on floor and balconies was occupied, save Mrs. J. L. Gardner's two and those of Col. Higginson's.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: Symphony, A-minor op. 55, Saint-Saëns; Concerto for violin, F-sharp minor, Ernst; Humoresque, for orchestra, E. Humperdink; and Symphony No. 2, Beethoven. The Saint-Saëns symphony was new to these concerts and the Humperdink work was new to Boston. Of the latter, we can only marvel that it should have found a place on the programmes of the Symphony concerts. As music it does not rise much above the beer-garden level, and as humor it is saddening. In the land of its birth, those who heard it may have rolled from their chairs to the ground in the fit of uncontrollable laughter it aroused; but to those lacking in the volatility and the sprightliness of the German nature, the work is more calculated to draw forth burning tears than expressions of mirth. As far as we could discover, Mr. Humperdink's humor was chiefly confined to the plagiarizing of a few bars of the march theme of Raff's "Lenore." It is dreary fooling. The Saint-Saëns symphony is a charming work, always chaste in style, bright in effect and delightful in the grace that animates it throughout. It is a splendid example of brilliant brevity and masterly modesty. It was finely played from beginning to end, the gem of an adagio especially so. The Beethoven symphony received excellent treatment. The first movement was exceedingly well read and performed. The slow movement was, perhaps, given with over much of rigidity and a little of roughness, but the latter, retation, as a whole, left little to be desired. The first concerto has become irremediably aged. It has weak hams, and its eyes purge thick amber and plum tree gum. The solo part was played by Mr. T. Adamowski, whose intonation was not always true, whose tone was often weak and thin, and whose performance generally was not up to his best standard. He was twice recalled with much heartiness. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte, A-minor, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz; and "Tasso," Liszt. Mr. E. A. MacDowell is to be the soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Saint-Saëns: Symphony No. 2, in A minor, Opus 55.
Ernst: Concerto for violin, in one movement, in F-sharp minor, Opus 23.
Humperdink: Humoresque for orchestra.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 36.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

Saint-Saëns' A minor symphony has not been given here since its first performance in this city by the Harvard Musical Association in 1880. Although written nearly forty years ago it may safely be reckoned as belonging to the modern French school of composition, and goes far—in one way, at least—toward reconciling one to that by no means immaculate school. In spite of the length of the work, its musical character and the modest orchestra for which it is scored point to the composer's probably looking upon it somewhat in the light of a "petite symphonie" as belonging to that domain which lies between chamber-music and grand orchestral writing of the modern sort—the domain to which most of the Haydn and Mozart symphonies are now to be relegated. It is, in one respect, refreshing to find a modern Frenchman writing anything for orchestra that is so purely musical, so unstrident and reserved in expression, as this symphony, and which at the same time is so carefully wrought, which shows so much clever and sincere work. On the other hand, it is a little disappointing and depressing to note how merely superficially his task took possession of the composer, how his cleverness is, in the end, nothing more nor deeper than cleverness, how all the contrapuntal and fugal writing he has put into it seems to have appealed to his fancy rather than an attractive task than to have been the spontaneously chosen form through which a vital and compelling inspiration sought to find outward expression. It is curious that, while the present school of French composers have had probably the best, strictest and most thorough contrapuntal education of any musicians now going, they can so seldom bring themselves to put really their whole heart into contrapuntal work; it is a task of which some of them often acquit themselves admirably well, but still it is a task to them, something to be got through with by dint of skill and cleverness, but not a thing for their whole soul to revel in. At best, they show—as Saint-Saëns has in this symphony—that they find it an attractive task. When Saint-Saëns has got through the exposition of his fugato in the first movement, you do not hear him heave a sigh of relief (as Gounod and Massenet too often are impelled to do in similar cases); the labor has not tired him out, and he is still fresh for more of the same kind. When he calls upon the fugue, he does more than merely leave his card. Still, it is very like a call of ceremony, for all that; not like the visit of a lover to his mistress. To throw aside all simile, clever, charming, aye, learned as Saint-Saëns shows himself in this symphony, and brilliantly as it is written, he never really unbends in it, he preserves throughout a certain air of man-of-the-world correctness of bearing, full of refinement and charm, but not stirring to one's enthusiasm. And here is just the disheartening point: to find that a man like Saint-Saëns, who can do this sort of thing so well, should take so shallow a delight in doing it, should find so little genuine inspiration in it. Only see how differently he goes to work when he has to write a "Phaeton" or a "Danse macabre!" Then the whole man is revealed to you, frankly, outspokenly, full of genuine vivacity and spontaneity; and if, in such moments of expansiveness, something a little coarse and vulgar shines through the polished surface, it is at least real and human. Here, in this symphony, all is polished and refined; but the man's whole heart is not in it, it sounds like something written to show what he could do, as ground.

86
bait to catch some opera director. Still, its charm is undeniable; the little adagio especially is a gem of delicacy and grace.

Of the new "Humoresque" by Humperdink one need only say that it is not worth playing, and certainly not worth talking about.

Beethoven's D major symphony made a glorious close to a programme in which there was much to commend, much that was interesting, if, upon the whole, too little real genius. The symphony was well and spiritedly played, but not with quite the fine finish that we have heard more than once before.

Ernst's F-sharp minor concerto has long been at once the ambition and the terror of aspiring violinists; it has a reputation very like that of Henselt's F minor pianoforte concerto—of being the most difficult thing for the instrument in existence. Whether it is not rather hard-pushed in this respect by some things by Spohr, as the Henselt concerto certainly is by some things by Brahms and others, we are not competent to determine. Certain it is, however, that the style, and especially the key, in which it is written make it an almost inordinately difficult piece of execution. Legends are still whispered from ear to ear of how Ernst himself, when at his best, would excite the wildest enthusiasm with it, and then at other times, when feeling out of sorts, would play it horribly out of tune. To us, apart from its difficulty, it seems almost an unique work of its class; there is much admirable workmanship in it, both the solo instrument and the orchestra are treated with the greatest skill throughout; it does not in the least sound like a concerto written by a great virtuoso to show himself off; it is far too sincere and musician-like for that. Only the thematic material of which it is built is so hopelessly trivial, and, what is more, so antiquated in its triviality, that it is very hard to listen to seriously. It is eminently a work that has had its day. Mr. Adamowski conquered its many difficulties very successfully, only one could not but feel that the exertion of so doing drew rather heavily upon his powers. We have heard him play more soulfully and with more brilliancy of effect on other occasions. Whether or not he could, in any case, have infused musical life and vigor into those trite phrases is perhaps not worth speculating upon; but the work seemed to give him little chance for showing that grace of style and poignancy of sentiment for which he is justly noted. He did much admirable playing, but, as a whole, it was not to be accounted one of his finest efforts. Que diable aussi allait-il faire dans cette maudite galère? It is a desideratum that certain compositions could be proved dead and past the hope of resurrection, so that no one should try henceforth to galvanize them into a semblance of life again. Of course violinists will ask: "What, then, shall we play?" To which not unnatural question, it must be admitted, the answer is not quite self-evident. The impression Mr. Adamowski made upon the audience was all that could have been desired, for he was enthusiastically applauded and twice recalled. And if we cannot quite join in with this enthusiasm with all desirable heartiness, Mr. Adamowski has only his previous playing, of other and better things, to thank for it.

MUSIC. Continued

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert had an ideal appetizer in Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 2 in A minor. Despite the psychical nature of this work is not really symphonic it is replete with charming details, and the harmony of its moods is inimitable. The allegro marcato in A minor has a quaint and somewhat brusque figure which is partially used in the allegro affusinato as the subject of a superbly developed tonal fugue. The adagio is naive in sentiment and quaintly elegiac, its chief theme being refined and poetical on the one hand and impressively dignified on the other. It is treated in free form and yet with a deep spirituality of sentiment that is simply enchanting. A sterling frestissimo concludes the work brilliantly. Aside from the rich invention shown in this symphony no musician will fail to admire its abundant scholarship, its seriousness of purpose, its masterly orchestration and last, but not least the successful effort to give unity to the various movements by a masterly use in the finale of material which had its introduction in at least one of the previous movements. The plan of development shows an ingenious blending of the new spirit that came in with Liszt, Wagner and Saint Saens with the old symphonic methods. The Humoresque for orchestra by E. Humperdink meagrely disguises its intrinsic feebleness and sterility beneath a morbid and puffed up manner that is anything but entertaining.

The Ernst Concerto will hardly stand either now or in the future, though it doubtless may have in the past, on its merits as a musical composition. Such mediocre interest as it creates is quite evenly divided between the orchestra and the solo violin, but a more mortal concerto has seldom been heard in a symphony concert. As a whole it makes the impression of having superficially served the virtuoso's ambition to create furor. The meagre instrumentation that it contains is discreet and becoming while dreadfully unimportant. That refined and highly cultivated technique, that genial subjectivity combined with repose which Mr. Adamowski so invariably exhibits were as usual the characteristics of his performance that constantly charmed. It seems needless to add that the popular violinist was persistently applauded and recalled with intense enthusiasm.

Aside from the Saint Saens' symphony the concert had another feature which all present without regard to musical caste or creed could enjoy. The work, while it is not held in such high favor as several of its associates in the immortal series of nine to which it so worthily belongs, was at the time of its birth of matchless importance to the greatest of tone poets. It was the first work of Beethoven that conquered his adverse critics by grasping more satisfactorily than he had done before the academic forms which had been imposed on music by the scholastics and pedagogues of his time. No consciousness of form is imposed by it upon the hearer. Far from it. Here Beethoven takes full possession of the bountiful inheritance that had been left by Haydn, but with a transcendently warm feeling for art which Haydn seldom attained. The martial attacks in the first allegro were loyally observed by Mr. Nikisch, and without the slightest degree of extravagance, but with an ardor that throughout the opening movement was amply under control. The merry mood and the sparkling wit of the scherzo, the inexhaustible changes in the motives as well as in their connections and transformations were wonderfully well presented. The lorghetto, which despite its length so constantly enraptures, was admirably played and with what Ferdinand Ries calls the second scherzo of the work, namely, the finale in alla breve time, the concert was brought to a triumphant close.

Some Boston Music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. The program of the seventh and eighth concerts was:—

Saint-Saens: Symphony No. 2, in A-minor, Opus 55; Ernst: Concerto for Violin, in one movement, in F-sharp minor, Opus 23; Humperdink: Humoresque for Orchestra; Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D-minor, Opus 36.

The Saint-Saens Symphony had not been performed before for about twelve years. It is a well-written work, and it might be given more often, judging by the favor with which it was received on this occasion. It was a brilliant feature of the program, and was performed in a masterly manner.

A conspicuous failure was the Humperdink "Humoresque." How could so trashy a composition have been placed upon the program?

The grand performance of the Beethoven Symphony was in keeping with the best work of this orchestra, and any further commendation would be quite superfluous.

The Concerto of Ernst is formidable to most violinists. To execute it well needs phenomenal equipment. To say that Mr. Timothie d'Adamowski surmounted its difficulties with a goodly degree of success is but to do him justice. Still, when one has all he can do simply to play it well, the listener cannot expect the finish and ease with which this violinist's performances have generally been characterized. There were passages in which his intonation was not quite true. His warmest admirer can but admit that the selection of this work was not a happy one.

— And now comes from abroad the story that Mrs. Nikisch sang some of Brahms's songs to the composer at Ischl, her husband playing the accompaniments. When all was over, and the fair singer waited to be complimented by the great musician, he said, "the accompaniments were charmingly played." It is then stated that Mrs. Nikisch urged upon Brahms to write her a song, and that he replied, "I shall only have to write an accompaniment." It is evident that the composer lacked in that fine appreciation of Mrs. Nikisch's interpretations of his songs, that was manifested by our Boston musical connoisseurs, and that caused them to applaud her with delirious enthusiasm. Can it really be, after all, that Boston does not know what good singing is?

bait to catch some opera director. Still, its charm is undeniable; the little adagio especially is a gem of delicacy and grace.

Of the new "Humoresque" by Humperdink one need only say that it is not worth playing, and certainly not worth talking about.

Beethoven's D major symphony made a glorious close to a programme in which there was much to commend, much that was interesting, if, upon the whole, too little real genius. The symphony was well and spiritedly played, but not with quite the fine finish that we have heard more than once before.

Ernst's F-sharp minor concerto has long been at once the ambition and the terror of aspiring violonists; it has a reputation very like that of Henselt's F minor pianoforte concerto—of being the most difficult thing for the instrument in existence. Whether it is not rather hard-pushed in this respect by some things by Spohr, as the Henselt concerto certainly is by some things by Brahms and others, we are not competent to determine. Certain it is, however, that the style, and especially the key, in which it is written make it an almost inordinately difficult piece of execution. Legends are still whispered from ear to ear of how Ernst himself, when at his best, would excite the wildest enthusiasm with it, and then at other times, when feeling out of sorts, would play it horribly out of tune. To us, apart from its difficulty, it seems almost a unique work of its class; there is much admirable workmanship in it, both the solo instrument and the orchestra are treated with the greatest skill throughout; it does not in the least sound like a concerto written by a great virtuoso to show himself off; it is far too sincere and musician-like for that. Only the thematic material of which it is built is so hopelessly trivial, and, what is more, so antiquated in its triviality, that it is very hard to listen to seriously. It is eminently a work that has had its day. Mr. Adamowski conquered its many difficulties very successfully, only one could not but feel that the exertion of so doing drew rather heavily upon his powers. We have heard him play more soulfully and with more brilliancy of effect on other occasions. Whether or not he could, in any case, have infused musical life and vigor into those trite phrases is perhaps not worth speculating upon; but the work seemed to give him little chance for showing that grace of style and poignancy of sentiment for which he is justly noted. He did much admirable playing, but, as a whole, it was not to be accounted one of his finest efforts. Que diable aussi allait-il faire dans cette maudite galère? It is a desideratum that certain compositions could be proved dead and past the hope of resurrection, so that no one should try henceforth to galvanize them into a semblance of life again. Of course violinists will ask: "What, then, shall we play?" To which not unnatural question, it must be admitted, the answer is not quite self-evident. The impression Mr. Adamowski made upon the audience was all that could have been desired, for he was enthusiastically applauded and twice recalled. And if we cannot quite join in with this enthusiasm with all desirable heartiness, Mr. Adamowski has only his previous playing, of other and better things, to thank for it.

MUSIC. Continued

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert had an ideal appetizer in Saint-Saëns' Symphony No. 2 in A minor. Despite the psychical nature of this work is not really symphonic it is replete with charming details, and the harmony of its moods is inimitable. The allegro marcato in A minor has a quaint and somewhat brusque figure which is partially used in the allegro affusinato as the subject of a superbly developed tonal fugue. The adagio is naive in sentiment and quaintly elegiac, its chief theme being refined and poetical on the one hand and impressively dignified on the other. It is treated in free form and yet with a deep spirituality of sentiment that is simply enchanting. A sterling frestissimo concludes the work brilliantly. Aside from the rich invention shown in this symphony no musician will fail to admire its abundant scholarship, its seriousness of purpose, its masterly orchestration and last, but not least the successful effort to give unity to the various movements by a masterly use in the finale of material which had its introduction in at least one of the previous movements. The plan of development shows an ingenious blending of the new spirit that came in with Liszt, Wagner and Saint Saëns with the old symphonic methods. The Humoresque for orchestra by E. Humperdink meagrely disguises its intrinsic feebleness and sterility beneath a morbid and puffed up manner that is anything but entertaining.

The Ernst Concerto will hardly stand either now or in the future, though it doubtless may have in the past, on its merits as a musical composition. Such mediocre interest as it creates is quite evenly divided between the orchestra and the solo violin, but a more mortal concerto has seldom been heard in a symphony concert. As a whole it makes the impression of having superficially served the virtuoso's ambition to create furor. The meagre instrumentation that it contains is discreet and becoming while drearily unimportant. That refined and highly cultivated technique, that genial subjectivity combined with repose which Mr. Adamowski so invariably exhibits were as usual the characteristics of his performance that constantly charmed. It seems needless to add that the popular violinist was persistently applauded and recalled with intense enthusiasm.

Aside from the Saint Saëns' symphony the concert had another feature which all present without regard to musical caste or creed could enjoy. The work, while it is not held in such high favor as several of its associates in the immortal series of nine to which it so worthily belongs was at the time of its birth of matchless importance to the greatest of tone poets. It was the first work of Beethoven that conquered his adverse critics by grasping more satisfactorily than he had done before the academic forms which had been imposed on music by the scholastics and pedagogues of his time. No consciousness of form is imposed by it upon the hearer. Far from it. Here Beethoven takes full possession of the bountiful inheritance that had been left by Haydn, but with a transcendently warm feeling for art which Haydn seldom attained. The martial attacks in the first allegro were loyally observed by Mr. Nikisch, and without the slightest degree of extravagance, but with an ardor that throughout the opening movement was amply under control. The merry mood and the sparkling wit of the scherzo, the inexhaustible changes in the motives as well as in their connections and transformations were wonderfully well presented. The lorghetto, which despite its length so constantly enraptures, was admirably played and with what Ferdinand Ries calls the second scherzo of the work, namely, the finale in alla breve time, the concert was brought to a triumphant close.

Some Boston Music.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. The program of the seventh and eighth concerts was:—

Saint-Saëns: Symphony No. 2, in A-minor, Opus 55; Ernst: Concerto for Violin, in one movement, in F-sharp minor, Opus 23; Humperdink: Humoresque for Orchestra; Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D-minor, Opus 36.

The Saint-Saëns Symphony had not been performed before for about twelve years. It is a well-written work, and it might be given more often, judging by the favor with which it was received on this occasion. It was a brilliant feature of the program, and was performed in a masterly manner.

A conspicuous failure was the Humperdink "Humoresque." How could so trashy a composition have been placed upon the program?

The grand performance of the Beethoven Symphony was in keeping with the best work of this orchestra, and any further commendation would be quite superfluous.

The Concerto of Ernst is formidable to most violinists. To execute it well needs phenomenal equipment. To say that Mr. Timothie d'Adamowski surmounted its difficulties with a goodly degree of success is but to do him justice. Still, when one has all he can do simply to play it well, the listener cannot expect the finish and ease with which this violinist's performances have generally been characterized. There were passages in which his intonation was not quite true. His warmest admirer can but admit that the selection of this work was not a happy one.

—And now comes from abroad the story that Mrs. Nikisch sang some of Brahms's songs to the composer at Ischl, her husband playing the accompaniments. When all was over, and the fair singer waited to be complimented by the great musician, he said, "the accompaniments were charmingly played." It is then stated that Mrs. Nikisch urged upon Brahms to write her a song, and that he replied, "I shall only have to write an accompaniment." It is evident that the composer lacked in that fine appreciation of Mrs. Nikisch's interpretations of his songs, that was manifested by our Boston musical connoisseurs, and that caused them to applaud her with delirious enthusiasm. Can it really be, after all, that Boston does not know what good singing is?

MUSICAL MATTERS

The Symphony Concert.

Our symphonic Jasons have returned laden with honors and such press comments as prove the scriptural adage regarding the travelling prophet. As if to make amends for a week's absence, the programme of Saturday contained a double allowance of symphony, and Beethoven and St. Saens were both represented in this large form. The St. Saens symphony in A minor began the programme. This is the only symphony by this composer that Boston has ever heard, but years ago, in the Gerickean epoch, there was full preparation made for presenting the third symphony of the French master, when, at the last moment, the untrustworthy state of the organ in Music Hall forbade. This second symphony is a work of most modest dimensions and conservative scoring, so that if the name of Volkmann had been attached to it, most of the critics would have accepted it as a good specimen of the correct and terse style of the German. In the third symphony, however, St. Saens took ample revenge, and showed, by an employment of the full modern orchestra, with the addition of organ, and a piano part for four hands (as the symphony was inscribed to the memory of Liszt this was peculiarly appropriate), that he could mass the forces, and use the richest tonicolors as well as any Berlioz. But whether with large or small instrumental forces, St. Saens shows a power of orchestral treatment that commands respect, while he can develop a theme better than any living French composer. The present symphony began quite in the old style with a good deal of woodwind work, and in many parts the oboe had a prominence characteristic of the Gallic taste. In the first movement there was also a fine bit of fugato which gave a distinctly classical flavor. The strings gave this admirably and showed commendable balance of power as well as clearness. In the second movement, also, this division of the orchestra charmed by some beautiful playing with mutes (con sordine), and in the finale the solo passages in very high positions were also very well done. The scherzo seemed to have but little to say for itself, although its end, with mysterious pizzicato chords and a brusque change to fortissimo, was a reminder of Beethoven's favorite close.

Now followed the solo number of the concert, which was an Ernst concerto in one movement for violin, played by Mr. T. Adamowski. The work was not an impressive one; its chief theme was not much better than a Balfé sugar-plum, and was in fact reminiscent of "Let all obey," from "The Enchantress." It was music that did not cause one to think any too much, and must have been pure delight to the tune-cravers who do so love music! But the person who held that true musical art should be a blending of the intellectual with the emotional may have been a trifle disappointed. It was probably a new E string that caused a perceptible flattening in the latter part of the work, for the player began with some broad passages finely played on the G string, and his playing of the brilliant embellishments and variations of the theme was artistic, being only marred by the lack of true intonation aforesaid.

Who is Humperdink? And why did he write a "Humoresque" for orchestra? It was to be sure a humoresque without any humor (it might have been called "Humoresque Pathétique" for the matter of that) and therefore it did not conflict with the dignity of the symphony programmes. After all, greater composers have used the misleading title, where they only meant "Capriccio," but even the capricious element was here not very strongly marked. The second theme was prettily pastoral, but there was nothing further to remember in the work.

The concert ended with the second symphony by Beethoven. A great work, but not yet the true symphonic Beethoven, who was only revealed a couple of years later on in the Heroic symphony. Yet there are certain premonitions, coming events that cast their shadows before in this symphony, that are intensely interesting as transitions from the old school to the new; among these are the larghetto in sonata movement form, the scherzo, an entirely new departure for the third movement of a symphony, and the finale, a veritable abolition of the superficial jollity with which Beethoven's predecessors used to wind up their instrumental works — a bad legacy from the gigue which ended the old suite. With all this acknowledged and the beauty of the larghetto and the finale fully recognized, the fact still impresses itself on the auditor, that had Beethoven died at the age that Schubert did, the world would only know him as a most promising successor to Haydn. The reading of the work was an excellent one, and our conductor seems to have discarded all tendency to exaggeration. Especial points of technical ability were discernible in the playing of the chief figure by the contrabasses and cellos in the development of the first movement, and the delicacy of the first violins in the closing theme of the larghetto, but the horn broke in both appearances of this latter theme. The scherzo was given with splendid dash and brio. As above intimated, this is the first symphonic scherzo ever written, and the couple of scherzi composed by Haydn in two of his string quartettes do not invalidate Beethoven's right to be considered the inventor of this form. Yet this scherzo is more of a minuet than the minuet of the first symphony. There is one point in this movement that, spite of the mass of critical analysis, may be freshly commented on; it is the trio, with its square-cut, minuet theme and thoroughly old-fashioned scoring (oboes and bassoons). Is it not possible that Beethoven here intended to show the formality of the minuet which he was replacing by contrasting it with the free, semi-developed vein of the body of the scherzo? Oboes and bassoons played well here, although the bassoon might have had more power and prominence in the contrapuntal support it gave to the theme in the end of the trio.

The finale was capital. It is the gem of the work in any case, and outvalues all the finales that were written before it (possibly excepting Mozart's two last symphonies).

89
 minor and the "Jupiter" and it received just the right spice of resolute power and caprice. The oddity of the closing theme, with its duet between the first violin and bassoon (as if an Ariel and Caliban were holding converse together), was well dwelt upon, and in the long and beautiful coda, the horn began to clarify and make amends for its previous misdeeds.
 LOUIS C. ELSON.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

The audience at the Symphony concert Saturday evening was entertained by Saint-Saens's symphony in A minor; Ernst's concerto for the violin in F sharp minor, Humperdink's orchestral humoresque and Beethoven's symphony No. 2. It was a strange programme, but afforded variety, and was evidently appreciated, judging from the enthusiasm of the audience. The first piece has never been played by the Symphony Orchestra, although it has been once given in Boston. It is a beautiful work, artistic in its composition and affording opportunities for light and shade that were amply improved under Mr. Nikisch's skilful baton. The allegro appassionato was perhaps the most pleasing movement.

Mr. Adamowski was not heard at his best. For some reason he was not in tune with the orchestra, and several instances of false intonation were apparent. In execution, however, he exhibited his usual ability.

The "Humoresque" was heard for the first time in Boston, and was something of a surprise. It is an odd number, not particularly attractive and not likely to become a great favorite.

The Beethoven symphony was rendered in a masterly manner. All the movements were treated artistically, especially the first, and it served as a fitting termination for an excellent concert.

The programme for next Saturday will be symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for the pianoforte in A minor, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz, and "Tasso," Liszt. The soloist will be Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOHANNES BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, op. 90.
 I. Allegro con brio (F major).
 II. Andante (C major).
 III. Poco Allegretto (C minor).
 IV. Allegro (F minor).

E. A. MACDOWELL. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, A minor, op. 15.
 I. Maestoso (A minor)—Allegro con fuoco (A minor).
 II. Andante tranquillo (E major).
 III. Presto (A major).

HECTOR BERLIOZ. TWO MOVEMENTS from "La Damnation de Faust"
 op. 24.
 I. Menuet des Feu-follets: Moderato (D major).
 II. Valse des Sylphes: Allegro, mouvement de valse (D major).

FRANZ LISZT. SYMPHONIC POEM, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo."

SOLOIST:

MR. E. A. MacDOWELL.

the G minor and the "Jupiter") and it received just the right spice of resolute power and caprice. The oddity of the closing theme, with its duet between the first violins and bassoon (as if an Ariel and Caliban were holding converse together), was well dwelt upon, and in the long and beautiful coda, the horn began to clarify and make amends for its previous misdeeds.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

The audience at the Symphony concert Saturday evening was entertained by Saint-Saens's symphony in A minor; Ernst's concerto for the violin in F sharp minor, Humperdink's orchestral humoresque and Beethoven's symphony No. 2. It was a strange programme, but afforded variety, and was evidently appreciated, judging from the enthusiasm of the audience. The first piece has never been played by the Symphony Orchestra, although it has been once given in Boston. It is a beautiful work, artistic in its composition and affording opportunities for light and shade that were amply improved under Mr. Nikisch's skilful baton. The allegro appassionato was perhaps the most pleasing movement.

Mr. Adamowski was not heard at his best. For some reason he was not in tune with the orchestra, and several instances of false intonation were apparent. In execution, however, he exhibited his usual ability.

The "Humoresque" was heard for the first time in Boston, and was something of a surprise. It is an odd number, not particularly attractive and not likely to become a great favorite.

The Beethoven symphony was rendered in a masterly manner. All the movements were treated artistically, especially the first, and it served as a fitting termination for an excellent concert.

The programme for next Saturday will be symphony No. 3, Brahms; concerto for the pianoforte in A minor, MacDowell; "Menuet des Follets" and "Danse des Sylphes," Berlioz, and "Tasso," Liszt. The soloist will be Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOHANNES BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, op. 90.
I. Allegro con brio (F major).
II. Andante (C major).
III. Poco Allegretto (C minor).
IV. Allegro (F minor).

E. A. MACDOWELL. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, A minor, op. 15.
I. Maestoso (A minor)—Allegro con fuoco (A minor).
II. Andante tranquillo (E major).
III. Presto (A major).

HENRI BERLIOZ. TWO MOVEMENTS from "La Damnation de Faust"
op. 24.
I. Menuet des Feu-follets: Moderato (D major).
II. Valse des Sylphes: Allegro, mouvement de valse (D major).

FRANZ LISZT. SYMPHONIC POEM. "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo."

SOLOIST:

MR. E. A. MacDOWELL.

DRAMA AND MUSIC.

The Fifth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

New Bill at the Museum—

"Kerry" and "Nerves."

Sousa's New Marine Band—Notes of Coming Events.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, F major.....Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte No. 1.....MacDowell
Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust".....Berlioz
I. Menuet des Feu-follets.
II. Valse des Sylphes.

"Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo".....Liszt

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the pianist.

The first pianoforte concerto of Mr. MacDowell was played as an arrangement for two pianofortes in concerts given respectively by Mr. Gerrish and Mr. Whelpley during the season of '85-'86. Its first performance with orchestra in this country was at a concerto concert given by Mr. Lang, April 3, 1888, when Mr. Whelpley was the pianist. It has been played in European and American cities (1888-1891) by Teresa Carreno. Its first performance in public by the composer was the performance of last week.

Mr. MacDowell has shown in this concerto greater fidelity to the traditions, or the fetich, or the sane rules of form than in the greater number of his later compositions. This fidelity has not choked spontaneity, nor has it stiffened expression of thought. The themes are melodious and characteristic; nor are they merely agreeable echoes of the tunes of honored composers who guided his steps, or who, years ago, joined the quire invisible. Technical knowledge does not intrude itself; it is ever present, however, ever mindful of the good of the hearer, who does not wish to inquire too thoroughly into the causes of his enjoyment. The most genuine musical stuff is in the first movement; at the same time it would be vain to deny the beauty of the song of the andante, which is full of sentiment that is never sentimental, and romance that is always within the control of the dreamer. Nor is the last movement merely the dashing "Yours truly" with a flourish that is so often the conclusion of the whole matter. The interest is maintained without an anticipation of a climax, and even at the very close there is a suspicion of reserve strength. In this composition the orchestra and the pianoforte are not at war with one another; they unite in a harmonious whole that is alive and glowing with color. Mr. MacDowell is a pianist, and he knows how to write for his special instrument; he also knows the resources and limitations of orchestra instruments; above all, he knows the value of discretion in instrumentation. To speak quietly and in detail of the performance of Mr. MacDowell, the pianist, might be to play the part of churlish Shimei. Perhaps the most characteristic feature of his playing is extreme sensitiveness. In a small hall, where the musical fluid travels quickly, this sensitiveness tells promptly and with effect. In Music Hall it is a more difficult task for the performer to establish intimate relations with the hearer; and a certain exaggeration, which is foreign to the nature of Mr. MacDowell, brings out the contrasts of a work in bolder relief. It is enough to say that Saturday evening Mr. MacDowell gave a refined reading of an eminently poetic work. And not without good reason was he applauded enthusiastically and thrice recalled.

The other numbers are familiar to our concert goers, and need no words of comment. The concert might well have stopped with the delightful dream-fancy of Berlioz. The "Tasso," with its bombastic platitudes spun out to a dreary length, left a bitter taste behind. It is not necessary to dismiss an audience with a roar and a crash, a jingling and a bray. The orchestra played, in the main, exceedingly well. There were ragged passages in the second movement of the symphony, and an occasional lack of precision in the concerto, but the first movement and the last of the symphony were given with infinite spirit and with genuine appreciation, and in the fantastical pranks of Berlioz, as well as in the circus pomp of Liszt, the orchestra was admirable.

The New Marine Band, under the direction of John P. Sousa, gave a concert last evening in Music Hall. The band was assisted by Miss Marcella Lindh, soprano; Antonio Galassi, baritone, and Mr. Liberati, cornet. There was a large audience, and the enthusiasm was great. Each number of the programme stood for two numbers that were played; dances, marches and arrangements of popular tunes were given to the heart's desire of the most insatiate encore fiend. The band is composed of excellent material, and it would be invidious to particularize. The men have been drilled carefully, and the precision is worthy of high praise. There is also an observance of dynamic marks, of gradations of tone that is unusual in bands of this character. The concert reflected credit on the leader and the men. Mr. Sousa does not always ride in the whirlwind and direct the storm; he has a lively appreciation of the value of contrasts, and certain numbers, as the arrangement of the dirge from the "Peer Gynt" suite were played with delicacy and feeling. Miss Lindh sang the scene and aria from "Lucia," and displayed therein more than ordinary agility. Mr. Raffayolo played his concerto for the euphonium, and Mr. Liberati wandered far away from the true pitch in his cornet solo. This band, which is well worth the hearing, will give a concert in Music Hall next Sunday evening.

Two books were published lately that may be recommended heartily to all musicians and lovers of music. One is an enlarged edition of the second volume of Louis Ehlert's musical criticisms, translated by Mrs. Cretbar and published by Chas. F. Bretton, New York. The other is "Student and Singer, or the Reminiscences of Charles Santley," published by Macmillan & Co. Any extended notice of these interesting and valuable volumes must be deferred for a week.

PHILIP HALE.

SCHROEDER.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Echoes from the Symphony Concert.

Sousa's New Band to be Heard in Music Hall Tonight.

Rice's Popular Concert—Grossmith's Novelties—"Continental"—Personal.

The programme provided by Director Nikisch for yesterday's symphony concert was one of the most delightful of the season. It was admirably arranged and although no novelty was offered the selections given were most welcome and received rapt attention from the audience throughout a programme of uncommon length.

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist, and the enthusiastic plaudits which greeted his appearance was pleasing evidence of the high regard which Bostonians very justly have for the talented composer and brilliant pianist.

He played his new concerto, No. 1, A minor, op. 15, in a superb manner. It is a charming composition, full of melodious and original ideas. Full opportunities are given the solo instrument, and the orchestration shows the hand of a master.

Mr. MacDowell has never been heard to better advantage, and he displayed the beauties of his composition with magnificent effect. After the performance he was recalled four times amid tremendous enthusiasm.

Brahms's symphony No. 3, in F major, was finely interpreted by Mr. Nikisch. It was a rare treat for the admirers of Brahms, who are evidently very numerous among symphony patrons, and who have often expressed the wish that Mr. Nikisch would give this composer much greater prominence on the season's programme.

Two movements from Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust," "Menuet des Feu-follets" and "Valse des Sylphes." Both were given with splendid effect. The interpretation of the latter was particularly graceful and dainty. Liszt's familiar but always welcome symphonic poem, "Tasso," concluded the concert, and was given, probably, as brilliant a performance as it has ever received in Boston.

Following is the announcement for the next concert: Dvorak, dramatic overture, "Hussitska;" Davidoff, concerto for violoncello; Svendsen, "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra; Schumann, Symphony No. 2, in C major. Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Mr. E. A. MacDowell.

Sousa's New Band at Music Hall—Rice's Popular Concert—The Debut of George Grossmith—The People's Singing Class—News Notes, Gossip and Comment.

At the fifth of the season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, the soloist was Mr. E. A. MacDowell, and Conductor Arthur Nikisch again displayed his skill as a programme maker, as well as an interpreter of widely varying compositions.

The symphony was the third of the series by Johannes Brahms, a work which goes far to make amends for the shortcomings of the composer in the two preceding efforts in this class by this admired representative of the modern German school. The graceful melodious writing in the second and third movements was given an admirable interpretation by Mr. Nikisch, and the sharply contrasted and always brilliant ideas of the finale were splendidly shown in the reading given this movement. It was an always satisfying performance, and the symphony had a hearty appreciation by the audience.

Mr. MacDowell's performance of his first pianoforte concerto, a work which gained instant recognition as the effort of a born composer and skillful musician, when played at one of Mr. Lang's concerts four seasons ago, revealed all its beauties, and all who heard it were delighted by its well contrasted and ever melodious movements. The player's refinement of style, his delicate pearly touch and pure tone gave an indescribable charm to the andante, and the breadth of treatment given the final presto fairly demonstrated the wealth and ability as an executant possessed by this most satisfying artist. Recall after recall rewarded Mr. MacDowell, and he acknowledged the honors with his usual modesty.

Mr. Nikisch indulged his audience with some of the musical tit bits from Berlioz' "Faust," and fairly captivated his patrons by his faultless playing of the "Menuet des Feu-follets," and the "Valse des Sylphes."

A very brilliant performance of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo" ended this most enjoyable concert. The soloist next Saturday is Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, cello player, and the programme includes Dvorak's dramatic overture "Hussitska," Davidoff's concerto for violoncello, Svendsen's "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, and Schumann's symphony No. 2 in C major.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

Boston may yet become as fond of Brahms as of Browning, judging by the enthusiasm which the performance of that master's third symphony created at the concert of Saturday. Hans Richter once called this symphony the "Heroic," and it certainly presents as much of combat as the Beethoven symphony which carries that name, and, as in that work, the combative, aggressive principle is represented by a short and very simple figure which appears in season and out of season, dominating and ruling everything. It is far more difficult to bring this character home to a general public, than to make them appreciate the pastoral beauties of a tuneful work like the second symphony by the same composer, and the triumph of the work therefore was all the more remarkable. But, as in Beethoven's third symphony the last two movements do not seem essentially heroic, so in this one finds the "Sturm und Drang" only in the first and last movements, while the other two give a well contrasted element of romance. The first movement was taken with enormous power, and one could heartily agree with this reading, but the tenderness of the second theme, in A flat, was lacking in some degree, and the work lost some of its contrast thereby. Brahms, as well as Beethoven, understood the truth of the poet's adage.

"Wo Starkes sich mit Mildem paaret Da giebt es einen guten Klang."

The development of this movement may compare with anything of its kind. Just before his death, Dr. Hiller, most conservative of composers, said to the writer: "We have only one man who can write a true symphonic development at present—Brahms!" and when one hears the vague struggles of the other symphonists to squeeze thematic treatment out of their melodies, one can agree with the above dictum so far as to acknowledge the composer the symphonic giant of this generation.

In the first movement the brasses overblew occasionally, but the antiphonal effects between the wind instruments and the deeper strings in the slow movement were finely rendered. The simply scored and almost Mendelssohnian allegretto was a most effective contrast to the strife and fury of the finale. Yet this finale ends with a coda that is half tranquility and half exhaustion, a most unexpected conclusion that rather unfits the symphony to close a programme, and makes it appropriate as an opening number, as it was used on this occasion.

MacDowell's piano concerto in A minor came next, with the composer himself as soloist. To make a success in such juxtaposition, and to have the orchestration of a native work sound effective, even when sandwiched between Brahms and Liszt, was a triumph indeed. The first movement was fiery in the extreme and so difficult that once or twice the composer found difficulty in controlling the Frankenstein he had evoked. The treatment here, as in fact throughout the work, was essentially modern, and the piano frequently added floriture to the themes appearing on the strings. There was a shade of reminiscence of the composer's teacher in the movement but it was Raff set on fire, and shining in a new and lurid light. In the second movement (Andante tranquillo) the piano daintily embellished a theme on the cello, there was most effective horn passages, some splendid pizzicati on the contrabasses (both of these last touches reminded a trifle of Weber and the effects in his "Freischuetz" overture) and the themes as well as their scoring and treatment were masterly. A series of responses between kettledrum and piano, the latter giving a brilliant preluding of the dimensions of a cadenza, led into the chief theme of the finale, a wild, whirling-dervish sort of a subject. A little of Raff peeped out here in a tonic-dominant figure (two notes only) which was exactly like a passage in the "Im Walde" symphony, but was too transient to constitute more than a suspicion of imitation. The movement was a fine climax to a brilliant work. Mr. MacDowell has more to say in his works than any of our younger American composers, and if he does not fall into the native error of writing too much, may yet be the head of the American school. No less a composer than Massenet spoke enthusiastically of his abilities in 1889. The work and the pianist aroused the audience to a whole succession of recalls.

Berlioz was represented on the programme by two light selections, the elfin music from "The Damnation of Faust." The minuet of the will o' the wisps was rather heavily played, and had not the ethereal lightness of its subject, but the coda with the Mephistophelian theme was brilliant and had perfect ensemble. The waltz of the sylphs was charmingly played, and the muted violins gave the theme with utmost sweetness; nor must Mr. Schuecker's harp playing be passed over without praise.

Liszt's "Tasso" is characteristic enough, even if it does not reach high water mark. It is pleasant to chronicle that the passion was not torn to tatters, and the apotheosis was grand without being over swollen. The bass clarinet, the trumpets and the strings did exceptionally good work in this number. The oboe was also prominent in brilliant work. But, excellent as was the performance, Liszt does not wear well; he always seems a Wagner of lesser potency, with attenuated ideas and intensified vehemence. The very Rheingold figure is to be found in "Tasso," but not with the wonderful harmony with which Wagner made two chords, say as much as an entire theme. The concert, as will be seen from the list (Brahms, MacDowell, Berlioz and Liszt) was entirely a modern one, and it was one in which our orchestra could not fail to shine.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The last Symphony Concert drew a crowded and fashionable audience to Music Hall. Mrs. W. F. Apthorp, fresh and rosy after her summer in the mountains, was conspicuous in the right balcony, sitting between her husband and the fashionable pianist, Clayton Johns. Mrs. Gardner's seat was occupied by Miss Marie Grelaud, looking breezy, pretty, and animated. Mrs. Flske Warren and Mrs. Arthur Foote still being unable to attend the concert, Mrs. Inches and Mrs. Watson were easily the most attractive of the younger matrons present.

The Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Symphony No. 3 in F major, Brahms; concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in A minor, E. A. MacDowell; the minuet of Will-o-the-Wisps, and waltz of Sylpha from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; and Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso." Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist.

The event of the evening was the appearance of Mr. MacDowell and the performance of his concerto for the first time at these concerts. To write of the concerto as a composition, is an agreeable and easy task, for it is a work that ranks among the highest of its class.

It is difficult to imagine a more evenly balanced composition as regards the relations between the solo instrument and the accompanying ones. Throughout the work the themes are melodic and spontaneous and finely contrasted, the different movements displaying the hand of the consummate musician, in which easy grace, judicious employment of means and the inspiration of genius are combined, while the orchestration embraces richness and variety and a most delicate and sensitive employment of effects that enhance the originality of the motives and assist in sustaining an intense interest unflagging to the end.

The virility of the opening movement, the delightful, delicate sentiment of the slow movement, and the brilliancy of the finale, alike ravished the senses of the appreciative listener. It is sufficient to say that the composer possesses a technique that met every demand of the composition. Devoid of the trickery of virtuosity, but replete with the earnestness and grasp of the true artist, he gave a vivid rendering of the solo part, gaining a triumphant success that joined with the success of his composition caused him to be recalled by the enthusiastic audience again and again.

In the slow movement the orchestra followed fairly well with the accompaniment, but in the other movements the need of a competent conductor was felt. To accompany with an orchestra is to put a conductor's ability in the crucible for a test. It is one thing to shout and crack the whip over a herd in driving it to the slaughter-pen, anybody can do that, but to skilfully handle a coach and four over dangerous places and bring safely through the precious souls entrusted to his care requires the competent and skilful driver. The Brahms Symphony and the Liszt piece were played in an exaggerated and rough manner, but the two Berlioz pieces could not have been more delightfully rendered than they were by this same body of players. The next concert will take place Saturday, Nov. 26, when that sterling artist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, will play the concerto for violoncello by Davidoff.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The chief interest of the audience at the fifth Symphony unquestionably attached to Mr. E. A. MacDowell and his pianoforte, in spite of the herculean efforts of Mr. Apthorp in the programme-book to excite enthusiasm for that object of his admiration—one might almost say adoration—Brahms, whose third symphony began the evening. It does no good, in praising this able, but laborious and often abstruse composer, to say that other musicians before him were not liked and appreciated in their times, and that therefore people ought to be advised and to proceed at once to the enshrining of Brahms in their hearts in the same niche with Beethoven. We are all getting to understand his ways a little better than at first, to bear with his ponderousness, his over-elaboration and his complicated textures, and to like what is clear, sweet, simple, strong or eloquent in him. But it is too soon to insist upon his general and entire acceptance. We are living now, not in some future period, when the musical shall (perhaps) have been drawn quite to his ways of thought and expression. Let not the reader imagine, however, that we are hastening to exalt Mr. MacDowell's star above that of Brahms or to proclaim him to be the superior genius. But his ideas are fresh, his intuitions definite, his writing able and often either impressive or captivating, and his personality and performance attractive and commanding. He inclines too much toward the eccentrically-fanciful in his light and humorous moments and his vocal writing is apt to be intricate and almost unsingable. But he has power and independence, he understands his art and its instruments and he does justice alike to the orchestral and solo parts. His concerto is well put together and holds attention from the first bar, the first and last movements being the most characteristic of his peculiar talent in their fiery speed and their urgent spirit. His performance of the piano part was striking in its brilliancy, its defiance of all difficulties and its constant strength, and it showed delicacy when required. There is a pleasant calm in the andante, and this movement was read with gravity and reserve. The remainder of the programme calls for no comment, consisting as it did of the long familiar dances from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and the noisy, splurgy, melodramatic "Tasso" of Liszt, all exceedingly well played.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Symphony No. 3, in F, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte No. 1, in A-minor, E. A. MacDowell; "Menuet des Feu-follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust," Berlioz; and Symphonic Poem, "Tasso," Liszt. Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist. The novelty of the programme was his Concerto, which, if we are not mistaken, had not been heard before at these concerts. The other selections have been long familiar here, and are becoming somewhat tiresome by over repetition. Thus far, this season's programmes have not been especially attractive. It is true that they have presented new works by Humperdink and Scharwenka; but they did not prove to be of an order that imparted to the programmes quite that quality of freshness that is most to be desired. In short, the programmes aforesaid are falling into a dull, humdrum of repetition that is rapidly imparting to these concerts much of the distinguishing characteristic of that soporific realm known as boredom. It was Mr. Samuel Slick of factitious memory, who, if our own memory does not play us false, observed that there were some things, as well as others. It is a wise and incontrovertible aphorism, and it is soothing and comforting to those who, oppressed and depressed by some things, can console themselves with the fact that there really are others. The concerts just now are running in the deep rut ploughed by some things. In other words, they are repeating too much of these same, some things. Under the circumstances, it may not be untimely to suggest a practical illustration of the truth of Mr. Slick's veracious saying. Of course, it is well enough to make the concerts educational, if it be deemed wise to do so; but at present the education is too much in one direction, and while we may be thoroughly, even superfluously educated in certain works of certain composers until we know them backward as well as forward, yet there are other works by other composers that are not wholly unworthy a hearing. The pedagogue who should confine his teaching of arithmetic to the calm and stately multiplication table, admirable in itself as a series of statements that carry their truth on their face, and indispensable as elementary knowledge, would cabin crib and confine his pupils within too narrow limits, and keep them in ignorance of other fully as important branches of the science. A little subtraction would be very useful in the programme, and if such blatant, vulgar pretentiousness as Liszt's "Tasso," or, in fact, Liszt's anything, were subtracted, the gain would be great. As far as addition is concerned, the less-familiar great works that are now neglected would supply that branch of the subject; and for division, if the programmes were more equally divided between the various musical nationalities, that branch of the study would be felicitously represented. Of the playing of the orchestra at this concert there is little but praise to be written. The Brahms symphony was read with exceeding effectiveness, though, perhaps, now and then with over-exaggerated emphasis. The Berlioz selections were given with rare beauty of finish and grace of sentiment. Mr. MacDowell's concerto is an admirable work, steadily brilliant, full of originality, and delightfully free from conventionality. The opening movement is fiery, and holds the attention from beginning to end. The themes are fresh and and effectively contrasted, and the whole movement is worked out in a masterly manner. The work is fairly divided between the solo instrument and the orchestra, and both are combined in a logical and well-balanced whole. The piano does not obtrude, and yet it fulfils the purpose of a concerto which is to provide opportunities for the player to manifest his skill. The orchestration throughout is rich, excellent in its variety and its play of fancy, and always discreet. The andante is charming in the warmth and poetic grace of its leading theme, and in the treatment throughout. The finale overflows with passion, and approaches its conclusion with a succession of well-conceived climaxes that become positively exciting as one overtops the other. The performance of the work by the composer was fine in its fluent technique, its frank honesty, its brilliancy and its genuine artistic sentiment generally. Both the work and the composer-player were an overwhelming success. The applause was the most enthusiastic of the season, thus far, and Mr. MacDowell was obliged to come forward three times to bow his acknowledgements. The programme for the next concert is: Dramatic Overture, "Hussitaka," Dvorak, (first time); concerto for violoncello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, Svenheden, (first time); Symphony, No. 2, C-major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, Opus 90.
MacDowell: Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, in A minor, Opus 15.
Berlioz: Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust":
Menuet des Feu-follets—Valse des Sylphes.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo."
Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the pianist.

A good deal that is not exactly flattering has been said from time to time about Boston audiences; but we believe it has not yet been hinted that a Boston audience will applaud enthusiastically anything that it has not really liked and enjoyed. The thing called "fashion" may prompt people to do this or do that; but it seldom, if ever, invites his devotees to an ebullient outward show of enthusiasm. So, when we find a splendid performance of a great work call forth loud and persistent hand-clapping, we may safely conclude that the audience really enjoyed that work. Few things that have been played here since the Symphony Orchestra was first founded have been more rapturously applauded than Brahms's F major symphony was last Saturday evening. Is Brahms at last becoming popular, then? It looks somewhat like it!

Never before has this third symphony of Brahms seemed so entirely fine and great a work. It has stood the test of study, it has seemed finer and stronger with every successive performance; now it seems great all through. Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra gave it splendidly, with contagious fire and vigor,

The Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Symphony No. 3 in F major, Brahms; concerto for pianoforte No. 1 in A minor, E. A. MacDowell; the minuet of Will-o-the Wisp, and waltz of Sylphs from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz; and Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Tasso." Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist.

The event of the evening was the appearance of Mr. MacDowell and the performance of his concerto for the first time at these concerts. To write of the concerto as a composition, is an agreeable and easy task, for it is a work that ranks among the highest of its class.

It is difficult to imagine a more evenly balanced composition as regards the relations between the solo instrument and the accompanying ones. Throughout the work the themes are melodic and spontaneous and finely contrasted, the different movements displaying the hand of the consummate musician, in which easy grace, judicious employment of means and the inspiration of genius are combined, while the orchestration embraces richness and variety and a most delicate and sensitive employment of effects that enhance the originality of the motives and assist in sustaining an intense interest unflagging to the end.

The virility of the opening movement, the delightful, delicate sentiment of the slow movement, and the brilliancy of the finale, alike ravished the senses of the appreciative listener. It is sufficient to say that the composer possesses a technique that met every demand of the composition. Devoid of the trickery of virtuosity, but replete with the earnestness and grasp of the true artist, he gave a vivid rendering of the solo part, gaining a triumphant success that joined with the success of his composition caused him to be recalled by the enthusiastic audience again and again.

In the slow movement the orchestra followed fairly well with the accompaniment, but in the other movements the need of a competent conductor was felt. To accompany with an orchestra is to put a conductor's ability in the crucible for a test. It is one thing to shout and crack the whip over a herd in driving it to the slaughter-pen, anybody can do that, but to skilfully handle a coach and four over dangerous places and bring safely through the precious souls entrusted to his care requires the competent and skilful driver. The Brahms Symphony and the Liszt piece were played in an exaggerated and rough manner, but the two Berlioz pieces could not have been more delightfully rendered than they were by this same body of players. The next concert will take place Saturday, Nov. 26, when that sterling artist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, will play the concerto for violoncello by Davidoff.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The chief interest of the audience at the fifth Symphony unquestionably attached to Mr. E. A. MacDowell and his pianoforte, in spite of the herculean efforts of Mr. Apthorp in the programme-book to excite enthusiasm for that object of his admiration—one might almost say adoration—Brahms, whose third symphony began the evening. It does no good, in praising this able, but laborious and often abstruse composer, to say that other musicians before him were not liked and appreciated in their times, and that therefore people ought to be advised and to proceed at once to the enshrining of Brahms in their hearts in the same niche with Beethoven. We are all getting to understand his ways a little better than at first, to bear with his ponderousness, his over-elaboration and his complicated textures, and to like what is clear, sweet, simple, strong or eloquent in him. But it is too soon to insist upon his general and entire acceptance. We are living now, not in some future period, when the musical shall (perhaps) have been drawn quite to his ways of thought and expression. Let not the reader imagine, however, that we are hastening to exalt Mr. MacDowell's star above that of Brahms or to proclaim his to be the superior genius. But his ideas are fresh, his intuitions definite, his writing able and often either impressive or captivating, and his personality and performance attractive and commanding. He inclines too much toward the eccentrically-fanciful in his light and humorous moments and his vocal writing is apt to be intricate and almost unsingable. But he has power and independence, he understands his art and its instruments and he does justice alike to the orchestral and solo parts. His concerto is well put together and holds attention from the first bar, the first and last movements being the most characteristic of his peculiar talent in their fiery speed and their urgent spirit. His performance of the piano part was striking in its brilliancy, its defiance of all difficulties and its constant strength, and it showed delicacy when required. There is a pleasant calm in the andante, and this movement was read with gravity and reserve. The remainder of the programme calls for no comment, consisting as it did of the long familiar dances from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" and the noisy, splurgy-melodramatic "Tasso" of Liszt, all exceedingly well played.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Symphony No. 3, in F, Brahms; Concerto for pianoforte No. 1, in A-minor, E. A. MacDowell; "Menuet des Feu-follets," and "Valse des Sylphes," from "La Damnation de Faust," Berlioz; and Symphonic Poem, "Tasso," Liszt. Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the soloist. The novelty of the programme was his Concerto, which, if we are not mistaken, had not been heard before at these concerts. The other selections have been long familiar here, and are becoming somewhat tiresome by over repetition. Thus far, this season's programmes have not been especially attractive. It is true that they have presented new works by Humperdink and Scharwenka; but they did not prove to be of an order that imparted to the programmes quite that quality of freshness that is most to be desired. In short, the programmes aforesaid are falling into a dull, humdrum of repetition that is rapidly imparting to these concerts much of the distinguishing characteristic of that soporific realm known as boredom. It was Mr. Samuel Slick of facetious memory, who, if our own memory does not play us false, observed that there were some things, as well as others. It is a wise and an incontrovertible aphorism, and it is soothing and comforting to those who, oppressed and depressed by some things, can console themselves with the fact that there really are others. The concerts just now are running in the deep rut ploughed by some things. In other words, they are repeating too much of these same, some things. Under the circumstances, it may not be untimely to suggest a practical illustration of the truth of Mr. Slick's veracious saying. Of course, it is well enough to make the concerts educational, if it be deemed wise to do so; but at present the education is too much in one direction, and while we may be thoroughly, even superfluously educated in certain works of certain composers until we know them backward as well as forward, yet there are other works by other composers that are not wholly unworthy a hearing. The pedagogue who should confine his teaching of arithmetic to the calm and stately multiplication table, admirable in itself as a series of statements that carry their truth on their face, and indispensable as elementary knowledge, would cabin crib and confine his pupils within too narrow limits, and keep them in ignorance of other fully as important branches of the science. A little subtraction would be very useful in the programme, and if such blatant, vulgar pretentiousness as Liszt's "Tasso," or, in fact, Liszt's anything, were subtracted, the gain would be great. As far as addition is concerned, the less-familiar great works that are now neglected would supply that branch of the subject; and for division, if the programmes were more equally divided between the various musical nationalities, that branch of the study would be felicitously represented. Of the playing of the orchestra at this concert there is little but praise to be written. The Brahms symphony was read with exceeding effectiveness, though, perhaps, now and then with over-exaggerated emphasis. The Berlioz selections were given with rare beauty of finish and grace of sentiment. Mr. MacDowell's concerto is an admirable work, steadily brilliant, full of originality, and delightfully free from conventionality. The opening movement is fiery, and holds the attention from beginning to end. The themes are fresh and and effectively contrasted, and the whole movement is worked out in a masterly manner. The work is fairly divided between the solo instrument and the orchestra, and both are combined in a logical and well-balanced whole. The piano does not obtrude, and yet it fulfills the purpose of a concerto which is to provide opportunities for the player to manifest his skill. The orchestration throughout is rich, excellent in its variety and its play of fancy, and always discreet. The andante is charming in the warmth and poetic grace of its leading theme, and in the treatment throughout. The finale overflows with passion, and approaches its conclusion with a succession of well-conceived climaxes that become positively exciting as one overtops the other. The performance of the work by the composer was fine in its fluent technique, its frank honesty, its brilliancy and its genuine artistic sentiment generally. Both the work and the composer-player were an overwhelming success. The applause was the most enthusiastic of the season, thus far, and Mr. MacDowell was obliged to come forward three times to bow his acknowledgements. The programme for the next concert is: Dramatic Overture, "Hussitaka," Dvorak, (first time); concerto for violoncello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, Svendsen, (first time); Symphony, No. 2, C-major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 3, in F major, Opus 90.
MacDowell: Pianoforte Concerto No. 1, in A minor, Opus 15.
Berlioz: Two movements from "La Damnation de Faust":
Menuet des Feu-follets—Valse des Sylphes.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso; Lamento e Trionfo."

Mr. E. A. MacDowell was the pianist.

A good deal that is not exactly flattering has been said from time to time about Boston audiences; but we believe it has not yet been hinted that a Boston audience will applaud enthusiastically anything that it has not really liked and enjoyed. The thing called "fashion" may prompt people to do this or do that; but it seldom, if ever, invites his devotees to an ebullient outward show of enthusiasm. So, when we find a splendid performance of a great work call forth loud and persistent hand-clapping, we may safely conclude that the audience really enjoyed that work. Few things that have been played here since the Symphony Orchestra was first founded have been more rapturously applauded than Brahms's F major symphony was last Saturday evening. Is Brahms at last becoming popular, then? It looks somewhat like it!

Never before has this third symphony of Brahms seemed so entirely fine and great a work. It has stood the test of study, it has seemed finer and stronger with every successive performance; now it seems great all through. Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra gave it splendidly; with contagious fire and vigor, with clear coherence, with a true sense of its strength and beauty. There was but one blot on the playing—at several points the wooden wind was well out of tune. If this falling in our orchestra cannot be cured in any other way, one would fain fall back upon the old-fashioned way of having the men tune on the stage; this is, to be sure, rather frowned upon nowadays, but it is in any case better than playing out of tune. But, with this exception, the symphony was given magnificently.

The two selections from Berlioz's "Faust" went less to our liking. We have often before heard them go more effectively. The Minuet seemed to drag a little, and to lack decision of accent; the queer little coda, taken from Méphistophélès's serenade, went too slow—not much too slow, to be sure, but a little difference in a quick tempo like that makes all the difference in the world. The Sylphs' Waltz was decidedly too slow, and in two mechanical a rhythm; it gave no impression of the dainty atomies waltzing off through the air, but suggested rather the automatic rhythmic cadence of the little mechanical figures that jerk round and round in the show-windows of old-fashioned hand-organs. Both tempo and accent, as Mr. Nikisch took the movement, savored a good deal of the old Ländler; but we are much mistaken if, when Berlioz marked the piece Allegro, mouvement de valse, he had not in mind something more nearly approaching the modern waltz. In so far as exquisite delicacy is concerned, the performance left nothing to be desired—the flutes, clarinets and harp were perfect, but somehow it did not sound right.

In Liszt's "Tasso," on the other hand, Mr. Nikisch covered himself with glory. The "Tasso" is not a composition for which one feels any overwhelming respect; still it is better to have as much made of it as possible in performance, and Mr. Nikisch makes a great deal of it. Especially fine was his reading of the Finale. This turbulent movement, from the point marked "Quasi Presto," where the trumpets begin their crackling triplets, and later on, after the "Allegro maestoso," just before the marks "molto animato" and "stretto," has always sounded to us more like the gibbering and chattering of a maniac than like a song of triumph. Mr. Nikisch plays these ticklish passages with a decision of accent, a well-balanced phrasing, and above all with a wise moderation in tempo, that allow the strange and often far-fetched harmonic progressions to impress themselves distinctly upon the ear; as he plays it, the music may sound turgid and harmonically outrageous, if you will, but it at least sounds as if Liszt were really saying something, and saying it articulately and forcibly. It was a grand performance.

Mr. MacDowell's A minor concerto has not been given here before to a large audience. It was played some years ago (whether by the composer or by Mr. Whelpley, we now forget) at one of Mr. Lang's concerto concerts in Chickering Hall; but it was too long ago for us to retain any distinct impression of the work. Last Saturday evening a feeling that has more than once troubled us before grew to the force of a conviction. This is that Mr. MacDowell is at once the most interesting and (as far as we personally are concerned) the most puzzling of contemporary American composers. The man evidently walks with a very sur, gait in what he writes; his compositions have anything but a tentative air; you recognize them at once as distinctly professional work. Moreover, he invariably gives the impression of having something to say. And yet, except in one little fugitive piece for pianoforte, we have never been able to make out exactly what he is driving at; it is like listening to an impassioned poem superbly read in Russian; we feel that, as Mary Anderson once said, it is "somehow splendid," but we don't know what it all means. Energy and seriousness of purpose, warmth of feeling, a wondrous glow of color, are all apparent; only we cannot make out for what purpose, nor what feeling. The fault is undoubtedly in us, as we are beginning to perceive; no man—that is, no sincere man—can speak with that air of decision, and say nothing; and Mr. MacDowell's artistic sincerity is above all doubt. We are already beginning to look upon his compositions in a new light; time was when we could not even find them inviting to study and investigation; now we do find them so—we have progressed so far at least. In the concerto he played last Saturday evening, there were moments of such exalted beauty that no one could fail to be impressed by them; but, as to the coherence and true musical meaning of the work, we are still in the dark. Of course no critic is going to take the trouble to write himself down an idiot in face of a man or a work, unless he feels pretty sure that there is something of real, even exceptional, value in that man or work. And we should not take the trouble to say all we have about Mr. MacDowell were we not convinced that there is something in him that we do not understand, and which is well worth understanding. We mean to study him more, and as hard as we can. As for his playing of the concerto, that was superb! The enthusiasm of the audience was at white heat, and he was recalled at the close oftener than we can remember.

The next programme is: Dvorák, dramatic overture to "Hussitska;" Davidoff, concerto for cello; Svendsen, "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra; Schumann, symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the cellist.

WORSE THAN LATE-COMERS.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The manager of the Symphony Concerts has done all in his power to prevent the true music-lovers from being disturbed by tardy arrivals, but now the annoyance from those who leave the hall before the close of the performance is so great that we must raise our voice in protest. If one must leave before the end, why cannot she go, at least as far as the door, between numbers? One woman even went the whole width of the hall at the last rehearsal, and finding she had forgotten something, hurried smilingly all the way back. People must know that public opinion frowns over this form of selfishness, and that the eye of disapproval is upon them if they disregard it.

A. J.

West Roxbury, Nov. 19.

MUSIC. Continued

THE SYMPHONY.

The compliment may be taken for what it is worth that the fifth Boston Symphony Concert in Music Hall last evening had a programme of as nicely adjusted, balanced and enjoyable parts as it would seem possible to select from the work of Brahms, Berlioz and Liszt.

For any true music lover it was a privilege to be there even to enjoy an orchestral performance so high in standard, so marvellously artistic in its every detail, that it has not been equaled here even to the Boston symphony orchestra. A renewed experience with the symphony No. 3 in F Major by Johannes Brahms does not enhance the more or less favorable impression which a previous hearing of the work created here. Whatever question may arise as to the purely emotional enjoyment to be derived from the music, this is purely a question of taste; but it is a matter for congratulation that the work of at least one of the prominent composers of the present generation is void of all the impure practices which so often beset modern composers who attempt to produce a work in the highest instrumental form while dragging melody down to the veritable cesspool of their abnormal and eccentric ideas and inflated notions. True, the opening movement impresses one as being somewhat hazy and overcrowded with details which do not appear to bear any genial relation to each other; but in this connection we have used the word appear, hoping that that a more familiar acquaintance with the music will remove the impression. The symphony as a whole displays wonderful spirit and intellectuality, yet does not justify the attempts that have been made to place Brahms' art in juxtaposition with the last rays of the Beethoven spirituality. The first movement is not only rich in thematic matter, but wholly interesting, its heroic first theme being followed by a charmingly idyllic second subject. The hymn-like andante with the scholarly variations in attendance upon it, is especially delightful, in its second subject given out by bassoons, and clarinets and supplemented by an episode for strings, and repeated by wood wind.

The concerto by MacDowell with all its symphonic proportion and originality of contour will easily take rank with some of the most brilliant and effective of piano concertos by contemporaneous composers, and is undeniably indicative of its composer's possession of genius. The pianoforte part while it is in the full free and safe custody of the technician's own art, affording him every opportunity of presenting his chosen instrument as a veritable orchestra in miniature, is so exquisitely developed in its relation to the main body of the orchestra that the two elements often combine in a perfect display of artistic feeling. The whole first movement is extremely lavish in passages of piquant beauty. There can be no mistaking the concerto as a genuine and scholarly creation replete with the very best quality of instrumental coloring and just such episodes, side-thoughts and poetic conceptions as are characteristic of a truly classical work. Refinement, purity and dignity in musical art have, indeed, a prominent example in E. A. MacDowell, and there is within him, too, the rich inner soul-life of the true tone-poet.

Seldom has a modern concerto made so favorable an impression here. Its themes are fine and poetical in character on the one hand and entrancingly rhythmical on the other. The logical clearness of their development in a homogenous whole is no less admirable than the varied sentiment that pervades the work—now lyric, calm and full of peace, now all on fire, now with heartfelt tenderness, while interwoven with as captivating fiorituri as can be found in any modern concerto. The andante has a prolific and at the same time sympathetic, thoughtful, and tranquil theme to which the variations closely adhere yet with an abundance of ingenuity and refinement of design that are exceedingly rare. A wide variety of light and shade, an enwarmed conception that rigidly subordinated itself to the technical requirements of the work and a masterly intelligence that held both technique and feeling under perfect control, contributed as a whole a performance so artistically impressive that it would be naught but sapience to state wherein it could have been surpassed. His ecstatic embrace of some of the most uncompromising of technical passages was no less creditable than was the swinging swaying buoyancy of his remarkable technique.

The concert closed with the Liszt symphonie poem "Tasso," which produced no more favorable impression of the why and wherefore of its creation than it has done before. It is turgid and abnormal music against which the strongest objections that can be urged are that it contains little more than a very unwholesome compound of thematic fragments bearing no very logical relation to each other; and being so unvaryingly stimulated and overcharged that the hearer soon wearies and longs for a fresher, healthier and more normal atmosphere which Franz Liszt's ever noisy music is so incapable of affording.

It was on a festive occasion that one young woman confided to another that music was fascinating, of course; but that she for her part, could not keep her eyes from Mr. Nikisch's right cuff. "It kept showing more and more as he waved his baton," she said, "and my mind was entirely given over to wondering if it was slipping down or his coat sleeve slipping up." "What bothered me," returned her companion, "was the man who managed the drums. Whenever he turned the screws I couldn't help thinking of hot and cold water faucets, and it really quite interfered with my enjoyment of the music." "Yes," sighed the other, "and wasn't Emma Juch's Empire gown a good deal like a Mother Hubbard, after all?"

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

A varied programme was given by the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday evening, and, while nearly all the numbers were familiar to the patrons of these entertainments, the selections are always well received. The programme consisted of Brahms' symphony in F, which was rendered effectively, with Mr. Nikisch's peculiar though pleasing reading. Then followed numbers from Berlioz's "Faust," which were evidently enjoyed by the audience, and, indeed, were finished and artistic in their rendering. The closing number was Liszt's familiar "Tasso." The feature of the entertainment was the pianoforte playing of Mr. E. A. MacDowell. He played a concerto of his own, which he gave in a most brilliant style, with taking originality of theme and an artistic working out of musical ideas. All the move-with clear coherency, with a true sense of its strength and beauty. There was but one blot on the playing—at several points the wooden wind was well out of tune. If this failing in our orchestra cannot be cured in any other way, one would fain fall back upon the old-fashioned way of having the men tune on the stage; this is, to be sure, rather frowned upon nowadays, but it is in any case better than playing out of tune. But, with this exception, the symphony was given magnificently.

The two selections from Berlioz's "Faust" went less to our liking. We have often, before heard them go more effectively. The Minuet seemed to drag a little, and to lack decision of accent; the queer little coda, taken from Méphistophélès's serenade, went too slow—not much too slow, to be sure, but a little difference in a quick tempo like that makes all the difference in the world. The Sylphs' Waltz was decidedly too slow, and in too mechanical a rhythm; it gave no impression of the dainty atomies waltzing off through the air, but suggested rather the automatic rhythmic cadence of the little mechanical figures that jerk round and round in the show-windows of old-fashioned hand-organs. Both tempo and accent, as Mr. Nikisch took the movement, savored a good deal of the old Ländler; but we are much mistaken if, when Berlioz marked the piece Allegro, mouvement de valse, he had not in mind something more nearly approaching the modern waltz. In so far as exquisite delicacy is concerned, the performance left nothing to be desired—the flutes, clarinets and harp were perfect, but somehow it did not sound right.

In Liszt's "Tasso," on the other hand, Mr. Nikisch covered himself with glory. The "Tasso" is not a composition for which one feels any overwhelming respect; still it is better to have as much made of it as possible in performance, and Mr. Nikisch makes a great deal of it. Especially fine was his reading of the Finale. This turbulent movement, from the point marked "Quasi Presto," where the trumpets begin their crackling triplets, and later on, after the "Allegro maestoso," just before the marks "molto animato" and "stretto," has always sounded to us more like the gibbering and chattering of a maniac than like a song of triumph. Mr. Nikisch plays these ticklish passages with a decision of accent, a well-balanced phrasing, and above all with a wise moderation in tempo, that allow the strange and often far-fetched harmonic progressions to impress themselves distinctly upon the ear; as he plays it, the music may sound turgid and harmonically outrageous, if you will, but it at least sounds as if Liszt were really saying something, and saying it articulately and forcibly. It was a grand performance.

Mr. MacDowell's A minor concerto has not been given here before to a large audience. It was played some years ago (whether by the composer or by Mr. Whelpley, we now forget) at one of Mr. Lang's concerto concerts in Chickering Hall; but it was too long ago for us to retain any distinct impression of the work. Last Saturday evening a feeling that has more than once troubled us before grew to the force of a conviction. This is that Mr. MacDowell is at once the most interesting and (as far as we personally are concerned) the most puzzling of contemporary American composers. The man evidently walks with a very sure gait in what he writes; his compositions have anything but a tentative air; you recognize them at once as distinctly professional work. Moreover, he invariably gives the impression of having something to say. And yet, except in one little fugitive piece for pianoforte, we have never been able to make out exactly what he is driving at; it is like listening to an impassioned poem superbly read in Russian; we feel that, as Mary Anderson once said, it is "somehow splendid," but we don't know what it all means. Energy and seriousness of purpose, warmth of feeling, a wondrous glow of color, are all apparent; only we cannot make out for what purpose, nor what feeling. The fault is undoubtedly in us, as we are beginning to perceive; no man—that is, no sincere man—can speak with that air of decision, and say nothing; and Mr. MacDowell's artistic sincerity is above all doubt. We are already beginning to look upon his compositions in a new light; time was when we could not even find them inviting to study and investigation; now we do find them so—we have progressed so far at least. In the concerto he played last Saturday evening, there were moments of such exalted beauty that no one could fail to be impressed by them; but, as to the coherence and true musical meaning of the work, we are still in the dark. Of course no critic is going to take the trouble to write himself down an idiot in face of a man or a work, unless he feels pretty sure that there is something of real, even exceptional, value in that man or work. And we should not take the trouble to say all we have about Mr. MacDowell were we not convinced that there is something in him that we do not understand, and which is well worth understanding. We mean to study him more, and as hard as we can. As for his playing of the concerto, that was superb! The enthusiasm of the audience was at white heat, and he was recalled at the close oftener than we can remember.

The next programme is: Dvorák, dramatic overture to "Hussitska;" Davidoff, concerto for cello; Svendsen, "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra; Schumann, symphony No. 2, in C major, op. 61. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the cellist.

WORSE THAN LATE-COMERS.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The manager of the Symphony Concerts has done all in his power to prevent the true music-lovers from being disturbed by tardy arrivals, but now the annoyance from those who leave the hall before the close of the performance is so great that we must raise our voice in protest. If one must leave before the end, why cannot she go, at least as far as the door, between numbers? One woman even went the whole width of the hall at the last rehearsal, and finding she had forgotten something, hurried smilingly all the way back. People must know that public opinion frowns over this form of selfishness, and that the eye of disapproval is upon them if they disregard it. A. J.

West Roxbury, Nov. 19.

MUSIC. Continued

THE SYMPHONY.

The compliment may be taken for what it is worth that the fifth Boston Symphony Concert in Music Hall last evening had a programme of as nicely adjusted, balanced and enjoyable parts as it would seem possible to select from the work of Brahms, Berlioz and Liszt.

For any true music lover it was a privilege to be there even to enjoy an orchestral performance so high in standard, so marvellously artistic in its every detail, that it has not been equaled here even to the Boston symphony orchestra. A renewed experience with the symphony No. 3 in F Major by Johannes Brahms does not enhance the more or less favorable impression which a previous hearing of the work created here. Whatever question may arise as to the purely emotional enjoyment to be derived from the music, this is purely a question of taste; but it is a matter for congratulation that the work of at least one of the prominent composers of the present generation is void of all the impure practices which so often beset modern composers who attempt to produce a work in the highest instrumental form while dragging melody down to the veritable cesspool of their abnormal and eccentric ideas and inflated notions. True, the opening movement impresses one as being somewhat hazy and overcrowded with details which do not appear to bear any genial relation to each other; but in this connection we have used the word appear, hoping that that a more familiar acquaintance with the music will remove the impression. The symphony as a whole displays wonderful spirit and intellectuality, yet does not justify the attempts that have been made to place Brahms' art in juxtaposition with the last rays of the Beethoven spirituality. The first movement is not only rich in thematic matter, but wholly interesting, its heroic first theme being followed by a charmingly idyllic second subject. The hymn-like andante with the scholarly variations in attendance upon it, is especially delightful, in its second subject given out by bassoons, and clarinets and supplemented by an episode for strings, and repeated by wood wind.

The concerto by MacDowell with all its symphonic proportion and originality of contour will easily take rank with some of the most brilliant and effective of piano concertos by contemporaneous composers, and is undeniably indicative of its composer's possession of genius. The pianoforte part while it is in the full free and safe custody of the technician's own art, affording him every opportunity of presenting his chosen instrument as a veritable orchestra in miniature, is so exquisitely developed in its relation to the main body of the orchestra that the two elements often combine in a perfect display of artistic feeling. The whole first movement is extremely lavish in passages of piquant beauty. There can be no mistaking the concerto as a genuine and scholarly creation replete with the very best quality of instrumental coloring and just such episodes, side-thoughts and poetic conceptions as are characteristic of a truly classical work. Refinement, purity and dignity in musical art have, indeed, a prominent example in E. A. MacDowell, and there is within him, too, the rich inner soul-life of the true tone-poet.

Seldom has a modern concerto made so favorable an impression here. Its themes are fine and poetical in character on the one hand and entrancingly rhythmical on the other. The logical clearness of their development in a homogenous whole is no less admirable than the varied sentiment that pervades the work—now lyric, calm and full of peace, now all on fire, now with heartfelt tenderness, while interwoven with as captivating fiorituri as can be found in any modern concerto. The andante has a prolific and at the same time sympathetic, thoughtful, and tranquil theme to which the variations closely adhere yet with an abundance of ingenuity and refinement of design that are exceedingly rare. A wide variety of light and shade, an enwarmed conception that rigidly subordinated itself to the technical requirements of the work and a masterly intelligence that held both technique and feeling under perfect control, contributed as a whole a performance so artistically impressive that it would be naught but sapience to state wherein it could have been surpassed. His ecstatic embrace of some of the most uncompromising of technical passages was no less creditable than was the swinging swaying buoyancy of his remarkable technique.

The concert closed with the Liszt symphonic poem "Tasso," which produced no more favorable impression of the why and wherefore of its creation than it has done before. It is turgid and abnormal music against which the strongest objections that can be urged are that it contains little more than a very unwholesome compound of thematic fragments bearing no very logical relation to each other; and being so unvaryingly stimulated and overcharged that the hearer soon wearies and longs for a fresher, healthier and more normal atmosphere which Franz Liszt's ever noisy music is so incapable of affording.

It was on a festive occasion that one young woman confided to another that music was fascinating, of course; but that she for her part, could not keep her eyes from Mr. Nikisch's right cuff. "It kept showing more and more as he waved his baton," she said, "and my mind was entirely given over to wondering if it was slipping down or his coat sleeve slipping up." "What bothered me," returned her companion, "was the man who managed the drums. Whenever he turned the screws I couldn't help thinking of hot and cold water faucets, and it really quite interfered with my enjoyment of the music." "Yes," sighed the other, "and wasn't Emma Juch's Empire gown a good deal like a Mother Hubbard, after all?"

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

A varied programme was given by the Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday evening, and, while nearly all the numbers were familiar to the patrons of these entertainments, the selections are always well received. The programme consisted of Brahms' symphony in F, which was rendered effectively, with Mr. Nikisch's peculiar though pleasing reading. Then followed numbers from Berlioz's "Faust," which were evidently enjoyed by the audience, and, indeed, were finished and artistic in their rendering. The closing number was Liszt's familiar "Tasso." The feature of the entertainment was the pianoforte playing of Mr. E. A. MacDowell. He played a concerto of his own, which he gave in a most brilliant style, with taking originality of theme and an artistic working out of musical ideas. All the movements were most enthusiastically received. The programme for next Saturday evening will be dramatic overture, "Hussitska," Overak, (first time); concerto for violoncello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, Svendsen, (first time); Symphony, No. 2, C-major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

96

97
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK.

DRAMATIC OVERTURE. "Husitska." op. 67.

Lento ma non troppo. (C major).

Allegro con brio. (C minor).

(First time in Boston.)

KARL DAVIDOFF.

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO, No. 3, one movement.

(First time in Boston.)

JOHAN SEVERIN SVENDSEN. "ZORAHAYDA," LEGEND for ORCHESTRA. op. II.

Moderato. (G minor).

Andantino ma non troppo lento. (B flat major).

Allegro. (G major).

(First time in Boston.)

ROBERT ALEXANDER SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major. op. 61.

I. Sostenuto assai. (C major).

Allegro ma non troppo. (C major).

II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace. (C major).

Trio I: the same tempo. (G major).

Trio II: the same tempo. (C major).

III. Adagio espressivo. (C minor).

IV. Allegro molto vivace. (C major).

SOLOIST:

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

96
ments were most enthusiastically received. The programme for next Saturday evening will be dramatic overture, "Hussitska," Dvorak, (first time); concerto for violoncello, Davidoff; "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, Svendsen, (first time); Symphony, No. 2, C-major, Schumann. The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

97
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK.

DRAMATIC OVERTURE. "Husitska." op. 67.
Lento ma non troppo. (C major).
Allegro con brio. (C minor).
(First time in Boston.)

KARL DAVIDOFF.

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO, No. 3, one movement.
(First time in Boston.)

JOHAN SEVERIN SVENDSEN. "ZORAHAYDA," LEGEND for ORCHESTRA.
op. 11.

Moderato. (G minor).
Andantino ma non troppo lento. (B flat major).
Allegro. (G major).
(First time in Boston.)

ROBERT ALEXANDER SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major. op. 61.

- I. Sostenuto assai. (C major).
Allegro ma non troppo. (C major).
- II. Scherzo; Allegro vivace. (C major).
Trio I: the same tempo. (G major).
Trio II: the same tempo. (C major).
- III. Adagio espressivo. (C minor).
- IV. Allegro molto vivace. (C major).

SOLOIST:

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Sixth Symphony Concert.

While the quality of the music performed at the sixth symphony concert in Music Hall, Saturday evening, might not have attracted the musical hermit from his cell yet with a single exception the ordre du soir was capital.

Dvorak's dramatic overture "Husitska" is chiefly of historical interest, relating as it does to the wars of the Hussites, a religious sect that, theologically speaking, became extinct at the time of the reformation. The old Hussites were passionately fond of their hymn tunes; and these tunes have more or less permeated the Slavonic masterpieces of Dvorak and similar composers, albeit one can not speak so highly of their grandeur and solidity as of the contemporaneous chorals that the great German composers have so frequently adopted as the basis of their art work. Dvorak's overture opens with a lugubrious and somewhat morbid hymn-tune of Hussitean origin, which, however, is developed into something truly musical by what the composer has done for it. The orchestration is rich, piquant and striking, and the work as a whole is a fairly good specimen of Herr Dvorak's style, being somewhat tainted with mannerism it is true, but on the other hand architecturally beautiful and excellent. In brief it is a composition of dignity and vigor, that nowhere sinks to triviality, and nowhere rises to intensity.

The soloist for the concert was one of the orchestra's own members, namely, Mr. Alwin Schroeder. It cannot be said that the violoncello is one of the most popular musical instruments of the day; yet Mr. Schroeder could but have won a few converts to it by the peculiar charm of his tone. His cantabile playing was exquisite, while aside from this, his roudades were evenly and beautifully executed. The bright and emphatic, as well as the tender and melodious phrases of the music were all given out with remarkable expression. The concerto might not be one which a 'cello virtuoso would select for the exhibition of pure and simple virtuosity as such; but, what is far better, it enabled Mr. Schroeder to show himself as a musician, artist and poetical interpreter, and the opportunity was improved in the performer's worthiest manner.

With the Legend for Orchestra by Svendsen came some of the most dreary and dismal programme music that has been heard in Boston for many a day, and wherein its wrenching groans, its shooting pains and melancholy moans were in any respect true to Washington Irving's "Legend of Alhambra" which has been taken by Svendsen as a subject, it would puzzle an Oedipus to determine. 'Tis not a healthful, manly work, but truly soars 'sicklied o'er with but the pale cast of thought."

The interpretation of Schumann's second symphony was perfectly clear, unflagging and elegant from beginning to end. The work itself is not so markedly beyond praise as the imperishable symphony in B flat—Schumann's first and worthiest symphony—but it nevertheless unites in it so much of the Schumann individuality, so much poetic sentiment, and in the adagio such genuine unaffected pathos, and the texture of each movement is so subtle, yet artistic in form, that it easily holds high rank among the few great symphonies that have been written since Beethoven's time. The allegros especially are all strong, clear, glowing and full of fire. Throughout the concert the orchestra had matter challenging its best powers, and it seems superfluous to add that the challenge was responded to with a zeal and loyalty that it has not yet surpassed. At the seventh concert to be given next Saturday evening the repertoire will consist of a suite for string orchestra "Ans Holberg's Zeit" by Grieg; Symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4, Eugen D'Albert; and the "Flying Dutchman" overture by Wagner. There will be no soloist.

C. L. CAPEN.

DRAMA AND MUSIC.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The novelties chosen by Mr. Arthur Nikisch for the programme of the sixth Boston Symphony Orchestra proved to be more numerous than interesting. Of the four numbers given three were new to Boston, although two at least of these have been heard in New York without making any marked sensation. All were kindly received on Saturday evening. The programme was:

Antonin Dvorak. Dramatic overture. "Husitska." op. 67.

Karl Davidoff. Concerto for Violoncello, No. 3, one movement.

Johan Severin Svendsen. "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra. op. 11.

Robert Alexander Schumann. Symphony No. 2 in C major. op. 61.

The Husitska overture seemed like the perfunctory work of a poet laureate. It was composed for the opening of the Bohemian Theatre in Prague. The programme gives the German spelling Pray, which would not probably delight the composer's heart if his dislikes in other things of the nationality run as far as spelling. The phrase taken from Hussitean hymn, which forms the theme of the first movement, is ingeniously, but somewhat uninterestingly worked. Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and did all with the Davidoff concerto that could have been wished, and his playing won a double recall. The Legend of the Alhambra was the subject of the Svendsen composition, and it is a bit doubtful if it was quite Irving's idea, but it proved to be tuneful in parts, if somewhat light. The Schumann Symphony was not only the feature by contrast, but was played with perhaps more spirit than the other numbers, and if the tempi were not as of old they were of as Mr. Nikisch of the new. The next programme has the Grieg suite for string orchestra. The Flying Dutchman overture and, for the first time in America, Eugen D'Albert's Symphony in F major.

"Flying Dutchman."

MUSIC NOTES.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Dramatic overture, "Husitska," op. 67, Dvorak; concerto for violoncello, No. 3, one movement, Davidoff; legend for orchestra, "Zorahayda," Svendsen; and Schumann's symphony No. 2 in C major. The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder. If there is anything of value in the Dvorak overture it was not discovered through the rendering it experienced at the hands of the orchestra. It was played without expression and in a noisy and violent manner. It was war to the knife and knife to the hilt, the combatants getting right down to business at once and fighting to the end. The Svendsen legend proved to be a graceful composition delicately scored and delightfully played.

The programme said that it was played on this occasion for the first time in Boston,—that is a mistake, for it was played by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Carl Zerrahn's baton, April 4, 1883, at the Music Hall. The concerto of Davidoff is a work of little interest, of which fortunately Mr. Schroeder gave us one movement only. This with the long cadenza gave the player the opportunity to display his exceptional gifts so happily that he was twice recalled. The Schumann symphony in many respects was well performed, and could that horrible brass band that is attached to the orchestra been kept within the bounds of reasonable tone production, instead of trying to be heard on Biela's comet, the effect of the performance would have been a most agreeable one.

For the first time this season, the tympanist had his innings, even if he did have to wait until the last measures of the symphony to be heard from. He ought to feel as proud over his achievement as Governor Russell does over his election. The next concert takes place Saturday, Dec. 3, when the programme will embrace the overture to "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; a suite for string orchestra, "From Holberg's Time," Grieg; and Eugen D'Albert's Symphony No. 1, which is announced as "first time in America." This cannot be true, unless New York is not in the land of the free and the home of the brave, for Dr. Damrosch played it in Gotham about five years ago.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Alwin Schroeder.

Sousa's and Levy's Military Bands in Concert Programmes Tonight—Rice's Last—The Damrosch Matinees—Seidl to Give a Big Wagner Afternoon—News Notes, Gossip.

At the sixth of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, leading cello player of the band, was the soloist, his appearance being made in Karl Davidoff's concerto No. 3, one movement, and the success he made fully realized all the pleasant anticipations of those who were familiar with his triumphs in former performances here. He unites in his work breadth of style, fine technical attainments, rare purity of tone, and a delicacy and refinement in his playing, upon occasion, which combine to give him a well deserved prominence among the best cello soloists of the day. The single movement of the concerto gave the player ample opportunity to display his skill, and the hearty and enthusiastic fashion in which his masterly interpretation of its many beauties was recognized proved the audience to be keenly alive to the player's artistic merits.

The Dvorak tendencies of the day were recognized by Director Nikisch, in the placing upon the programme of this composer's "Dramatic Overture," written in 1883 for the opening of a theatre in Prag. It is a notable illustration of the musical fertility of Dvorak, who is seldom guilty of writing without a purpose, or without valuable results. Its leading idea finds expression in a grand hymn-like theme of a solemn character, first introduced by the wood wind section in full harmony. This is shown in strong contrast with a brilliant theme later on, and a fine dramatic climax is worked out with rare skill, the overture concluding with a return to the first theme, which makes a most effective coda.

Another novelty of the evening consisted of Johan Severin Svendsen's "Zorahayda," legend for orchestra, op. 11, a composition full of the odd characteristics of its writer's style, a strikingly beautiful movement, being that for solo violin with pizzicato accompaniment, in which Mr. Kneisel gave his best efforts. It was most admirably played throughout, and afforded much pleasure.

The C major symphony of Schumann ended the concert, and its grand performance was thoroughly appreciated.

Next Saturday's programme consists of Grieg's suite for string orchestra, "From Holberg's Time"; Eugen D'Albert's symphony No. 1, in F major, Op. 4, for the first time in America, and Wagner's overture, "Flying Dutchman."

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Dvorak: Dramatic Overture, "Husitska," Opus 67.
Davidoff: Concerto for Violoncello, No. 3, in one movement.
Svendsen: "Zorahayda," Legend for Orchestra, Opus 11.
Schumann: Symphony No. 2, in C Major, Opus 61.
Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the cellist.

Something in this programme suggested to us to look over the programmes of this season, so far, to see how many novelties they contained. The result of this investigation is as follows: In six concerts we have had nine old and more or less familiar works (not counting songs); four works that have been given here before, but which are by no means familiar to the public; eight absolutely new works. Adding together the last two categories, as we may fairly do—for works like Dvorak's suite in D, or Saint-Saën's symphony in A minor, which have been played here once or twice before at long intervals, are virtually novelties—we find that the six concerts have given us twelve novelties against nine old or familiar works! Now, is not this too much in all conscience? Is not this proportion of four novelties to three familiar works out of all proper balance? Ferdinand Hiller has said:

Men (musicians excepted) prefer hearing what is familiar to what is new. The musician, to be sure, is "also a man, so to speak," and often likes to perform, or have performed, works of which he is fond, over and over again; but that which is new has a peculiar charm for him, inasmuch as it excites his curiosity and makes higher demands upon his apprehensive faculty. The public, on the contrary, prefers to enjoy at ease; and we can hardly turn to reproach an impulse so deeply rooted in human nature.

We have always maintained that the taste of the audience was not too much to be considered in making out symphony programmes; there are certain works which it is well to give now and then purely for their own sake, whether the average audience likes them or not. Still, the public's pleasure ought to be consulted to a certain extent, especially when this can be done without lessening the dignity of the concerts; and we mistake much if the glut of novelties we have recently had is not too much for the endurance even of musicians. Add to this the, to say the least, unfortunate character of some of the novelties we have had, and the argument against the plan adopted is only strengthened. A vast city like Paris, which has three independent organizations to give symphony concerts throughout the season, can well afford to found and support a "Société des Premières Auditions" (or whatever its official style may be); but a city like Boston, which looks to the symphony orchestra for the staple of its orchestral music, cannot afford to have this, its one orchestra, so nearly turned into a "Society for First Performances."

We even feel like quarrelling with the quality and character of some of the novelties given. Against giving things like the Tchaikowsky symphony, or Dvorak's overture "Husitska," we have nothing to urge; it is pretty tough work listening to them, to be sure, but we, as an audience, in a certain sense, owe them that work. Tchaikowsky stands at the head of the Russian school today, Dvorak is in the foremost rank of contemporary composers; both are men of mark, and it is interesting to hear what they have to say; moreover, they have, to a certain extent, earned the right to speak to us and command our attention. But, when it comes to things like Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen," Humperdink's "Humoristique" or Svendsen's "Zorahayda," the game is not worth the candle; who are Scharwenka and Humperdink, that we should be asked to listen to poor stuff of theirs? They are writers of merely local interest, and their locality is not Boston. We owe them nothing. With Svendsen the case is somewhat different; he stands, with Grieg, at the head of the Scandinavian school today; he, too, is a man of mark. Let us then cheerfully listen to some of his important works; but let us not be asked to waste our time with such sheer musical twaddle as his "Zorahayda"! Time and nerves are too valuable to be given to such experiments as that!

To come to last Saturday evening's concert, Dvorak's "Husitska" overture does not seem one of his strong works; much in it is commonplace, much inordinately noisy, and the whole thing is terribly spun out. Svendsen's "Zorahayda" is out of place at a symphony concert; it is pleasant music enough, but it belongs properly to light, "popular" concerts.

Schumann's great C major symphony, on the other hand, is a work of the very first rank; here we have music, and great music, too. The performance was admirable; we can not remember ever hearing the working-out in the first movement so well cured of its generally thin and ragged effect. Schumann's instrumentation at the period when this symphony was written (and notably in this very work) often requires a deal of "management" to make it sound well and clear; and on this occasion it was managed with the greatest skill. The first violins did wonders in the Scherzo, and both strings and wind covered themselves with glory in the Adagio. But Mr. Nikisch's finest triumph was, perhaps, in the Finale; to hear this wonderful movement go with such fire and force, so entirely right, in a word, is a rare delight. It has been objected to this finale that it is deficient in "form;" that it, like some others of Schumann's symphonic movements, departs considerably and even fundamentally from accepted, traditional forms is indubitable; but it is in no wise formless for all that; it emphatically has a form of its own, and its development is finely coherent throughout. It sets out as a rondo, and sticks to this form so far as the return of the first theme; from this point on it is a piece of free thematic development, of the stoutest sort, but not according to symphonic traditions. In a certain sense, it is dramatic, the unravelling of an ideal plot, rather than a symphonic movement of the cyclical sort. Thirty-four pages (almost half its length) are taken up with the coda alone. But one fails to see how these irregularities, or unconventionalities, detract from its greatness; it is no piece of mere formless tone-painting, it is musically coherent and ever growing in strength; it is, in a sense, unique. To us it is the greatest of all Schumann's Finales; the most heroic and dramatic, and at the same time the most beautiful. The way in which it was played was a positive triumph.

Mr. Schroeder played the Davidoff concerto very beautifully indeed; his tone, intonation, phrasing and musical warmth can hardly be praised too highly. Unfortunately the work itself belongs unmistakably to the things that have had their day. Nothing need be said against it save this; that it is dead past revival, it belongs to a bygone period, to an obsolete style. If anything could have given it new life Mr. Schroeder's playing could; but even his playing could not. The time is not far distant when the 'cello must logically follow the flute, oboe and other wind instruments in the orchestra, and stop playing concertos. The form itself is a weak one, it is yearly growing more and more apart from the musical feeling of the present day. For the pianoforte and violin, there are some few great works that can keep it alive; but for the 'cello this is not so. The literature of the instrument comprises almost nothing of real value in this form. And it is to be remembered that an instrument keeps its legitimate place before the world as a solo instrument, not through the ability of the artists that play it, but solely through the musical value of its literature—by what has been written for it. Mr. Schroeder was enthusiastically applauded and recalled.

The next programme is: Grieg, suite for string orchestra, "Aus Holberg's Zeiten"; D'Albert, symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4; Wagner, overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."

MUSICAL OFFERINGS.

Programme of Novelties by the Symphony Orchestra.

Popular Concerts Tonight in the Boston and Park Theatres and Music Hall.

Benefits to George Coes and Others—
"The Continentals"—Gossip.

Novelties predominated on the programme provided by Director Nikisch for the sixth of this season's symphony concerts. A dramatic overture by Antonin Dvorak, a concerto for violoncello by Karl Davidoff, and a legend for orchestra by Johan Severin Svendsen were all played for the first time in Boston, and with the exception of the latter, all proved most acceptable to the audience.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist, and the appearance of this very popular member of Mr. Nikisch's band was heartily welcomed. His solo playing at the symphony concerts a year ago proved him entitled to rank among the first of cellists in America, and established him firmly in the favor of Bostonians.

His playing yesterday more than fulfilled expectations. His style seemed broader and more finished than heretofore, his tone sweeter and purer, his technique freer, and, if possible, more exact.

Davidoff's concerto, No. 3, in one movement, afforded him ample opportunity for a display of his virtuosity. It is a showy composition, fairly bristling with difficult and brilliant passages for the solo instrument, and having a rich and substantial orchestration. After its performance Mr. Schroeder was three times enthusiastically recalled.

The Dvorak dramatic overture, "Hussitska," is a distinctly descriptive piece, and is written in the broad and impressive manner for which the works of this composer are noted. Its subject is the Hussite wars, and the music is most suggestive of fierce and savage warfare. The solemn grandeur of the opening harmony was superbly interpreted by Mr. Nikisch, especially commendable being the work of the wooden wind instruments, and scarcely less effective was the playing of the fiery, martial passages, which add so much to the brilliancy of the second movement.

Johan Severin Svendsen's legend for orchestra, "Zorahayda," did not make a particularly favorable impression. The composer has taken for his subject, Washington Irving's "Legend of the Rose of the Alhambra." So far as suggestiveness in his music is concerned, he might as well have chosen any other subject.

The first of the three movements is the most interesting. In this there are some novel orchestral effects and some brilliant harmonies.

The other two movements, although treated in a scholarly manner, are devoid of originality, and are for the most part colorless and conventional to a degree. An admirable performance was given the composition.

Robert Schumann's Symphony No. 2 in C major was the concluding offering at yesterday's concert. Mr. Nikisch is particularly happy in his reading of Schumann's writings, and it is not remembered that a more satisfactory performance of this noble symphony was ever given in Boston than was the performance last evening.

The programme for the next concert will be as follows:

Suite for string orchestra, from Holberg's Time. Grieg.
Symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4...Eugen d'Albert
(First time in America.)
Overture, Flying Dutchman.....Wagner

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Judging from any such standpoint as would not enforce an individual preference regarding certain music about which even doctors differ the programme for last evening's symphony concert was wisely chosen. The "Hussitska" overture with which the concert opened had its first performance in this city. It was composed by Herr Dvorak for the opening of the Bohemian Theatre at Prague, and he resolved instead of writing the ordinary piece d'occasion, to commemorate in the tone-language a great epoch in the history of his country. So with this end in view he chose the Hussite wars as his subject. Students of musical history are well aware of the significance which attaches to the Hussite hymns and will learn with interest that Dvorak has used a phrase from one of these hymns as the second theme of the introductory adagio of his overture. The theme is characteristic and undergoes numerous metamorphoses. With grotesque effect it is boldly thrown out by the cornets and then dies away to a sigh, but finally calls up in the imagination a vigorous picture of battle. The chief themes of the work are developed with uncommon variety of treatment, and the whole is a richly orchestrated, sonorous composition in regular form; but it is, nevertheless, intensely personal as regards the composer, whom it reveals in perfection not only as regards the scope, depth and height of his genius, but in his mood and habit of thought. Regarding the soloist for the concert, Mr. Alwin Schroeder is especially entitled to a thankful recognition for introducing the 'cello concerto Davidoff, for despite any unfavorable judgment which the work may receive as the result of a single hearing, Mr. Schroeder at least should be the best judge of its technical merits. He must have thought it a masterly work for the cello or he would not have selected it for an important performance. The concerto as a whole was destined to achieve some success at the hands of so finished an artist as Mr. Schroeder, and it was certainly not his fault if no musician will care to hear the work a second time. The poetic justice of the interpretation, the charming delicacy, culture and refinement of his tone shaking, as well as the absolute fidelity of his intonation, were invariably not only in the beautiful cantabile passages, but in the virtuosic roulades and arpeggio, the performance was of entrancing and flawless interest and was so acknowledged by the audience.

Following the concerto the "Zorahayda" legend for Orchestra by Svendsen, was given for the first time in Boston. The most obvious fault of the work as a whole is with its monotonous color and character. It is also kapellmeistermusik pure and simple or as the English writers would quite as aptly call it "organist's music." The attempt at fidelity to Irving's "Legend of the Rose of the Alhambra" is strained and with all its yearning it never succeeds in shaking off its sluggishness. The concert ended with Schumann's symphony in C major, a work which somewhat unworthily follows the immortal symphony in B flat major as it is neither based on lowest depths nor does it tower to transcendent heights. It was performed with all the justice which that perfect balance of parts for which the orchestra is noted and all the refined tonal quality that could be brought in play. Such was the general character of the playing throughout the concert, which however, was perhaps the least interesting of the series thus far.

A striking example of this author's peculiar ideas. The closing number was Schumann's symphony in C major, which was given in the usual masterly manner. The soloist of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, and the number played was Dandoff's concerto No. 3. This was new to Boston and met with appreciation, but was marred in some instances by false intonations. Mr. Schroeder's execution is artistic, and the difficult numbers were well rendered. The seventh concert will be given next Saturday evening at which the following programme will be given: Edvard Grieg, suite for string orchestra, "From Holberg's Time"; Eugen d'Albert, symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4 (first time in America); Richard Wagner, overture, "Flying Dutchman."

NY ORCHESTRA,

NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT.

BER 26, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Hussitska."
(First time in Boston.)

CONCERTO for VIOLONCELLO.

LEGEND for ORCHESTRA.
(First time.)

SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major.

SOLOIST:

SCHROEDER.

104

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH. SUITE in D major.

I. Overture: Grave. D major.—Vivace. D major.

II. Air: Lento. D major.

III. Gavotte I.: Allegro. D major.

Gavotte II.: the same tempo. D major.

IV. Bourree: Allegro. D major.

V. Gigue: Allegro vivace. D major.

EUGEN D'ALBERT.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in F major, op. 4.

I. Moderately fast. F major.

II. Slow, but not dragging. C minor.

III. Very fast. C major.—Moderate. A-flat major.

Passionate. D-flat major.

IV. Moderately slow. F minor.—Lively. F major.

(First time in America.)

RICHARD WAGNER.

OVERTURE, "Der fliegende Hollander," in D minor.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

105

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Frank

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Bach: Suite for Orchestra, in D major.

D'Albert: Symphony No. 1, in F major, Opus 4.

Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."

The Bach suite was a treat indeed. With the exception of the Air, it was finely played, and, if the audience did not appear to enjoy it quite as much as they do some other things, so much the worse for them. But it was a delight to listen to this great, genial, stoutly built music, in which every phrase fits into its place as by a divine right, in which every part has something to say, and every portion is felt to bear some organic relation to every other portion. We have hinted that the Air was less well played than the rest; to our ear, the phrasing of the first violins sounded rather artificial and overdone, a little "Ole-Bullish," in fact—not as a fine singer would have sung it. We know it is no joke to phrase with the bow as one phrases with the voice; and yet the two processes are not entirely dissimilar; the length of stroke of the bow corresponds in a measure to the singer's length of breath at one inhalation; more than this, both singers, when near the end of their breath, and string players, when near the end of their bow, often find it difficult not to end the phrase with a little lunge, with something very like a gasping sforzando—a trick which only good schooling and a fine musical sense can overcome. Being neither a violinist nor a singer, and judging merely from what we have heard, we should say that this difficulty is apparently more easily overcome in the voice than it is in bowing: unless, indeed, the prevalency of this trick among string players is an instance of something not unknown in the history of musical performance, an instance of what is intrinsically a vice or an awkward mannerism, becoming a "school." But if the playing of the Air left something to be desired, the other movements in the suite went finely; Mr. Pierre Müller is especially to be complimented on his playing of the first trumpet part.

The d'Albert symphony was first given in this country by Mr. Damrosch in New York in 1888. It is reported that d'Albert wrote this symphony when only nineteen years old; it is certainly that the work was first performed in public when he was twenty-two. This should not be lost sight of in considering the symphony. It bears many marks of youthfulness. Its length, a certain lack of individuality and homogeneity of style, a tendency on the composer's part to fire off all his guns at once; these are the common characteristics of young writers. The source of the young man's inspiration is not hard to guess at: Brahms and Wagner evidently haunted his mind when he wrote it. Admirable influences, both of them, only not very easily reconcilable. The predominating influence is plainly Brahms; not only does the character of many of the themes recall him, but there is not a little in the working-out that reminds one of his style. But every now and then one comes upon very Wagnerish bits of harmony, which sound strangely enough in their Brahmsian surroundings. Be it said at once, too, that d'Albert has been decidedly happier in following Brahms's lead than Wagner's—quite apart from the fact that the former master's style and methods are eminently more symphonic than those of the tone-poet of Bayreuth. What of Brahms, d'Albert has here given us may not always be very good Brahms; but what he has caught from Wagner is often little better than a caricature. Wagner by no means minced matters when he wrote complicated chromatic harmony; but in this symphony d'Albert has written some combinations of notes that are positively hair-raising—and written them, too, with a thoroughness of conviction that makes one smile a little. But, with and in spite of all this, there is a great deal in the symphony to excite admiring respect and wonder. Earnestness of purpose, a noble disdain of triviality and mere display, the most wholehearted, conviction show themselves throughout; some of the tasks the young composer has set himself are no child's play, and he often gets through with them with great credit. Personally we liked the first two movements best; but this may have been mainly because they came first, and we were less worn out. The performance was excellent.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture was grandly played; here Mr. Nikisch scored another triumph in "interpretation." The work is, at best, not very coherently written; but if anything could make it seem coherent, it was the way Mr. Nikisch conducted it, while all its strong emotional and dramatic features were made the most of.

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Dec. 16, and Saturday evening, Dec. 17) is: Beethoven, symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93; Beethoven, symphony No. 9, in D minor (choral), opus 125. The solo parts will be sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn. There will be no symphony concert this week.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

G. W.

The Symphony Concert.

It was just like dear old Boston not to neglect the symphony concert Saturday evening, but to put on its best bib and tucker and occupy just as many seats as usual, and all this, to be sure, out of love and admiration for the heavenly maid music—for herself alone.

Yes, if there is any place on this earth where music is worshipped for its own sake, is experienced as a lofty revelation, to which Satan is a bitter enemy: where the much vaunted brilliancy of the show-virtuoso no longer with his radiant yet polluting smiles allures and dazzles the public as of yore—that place is our own Athens. So just as of old a Pythagorean spirit prevails, and it would seem as though music and geometry were on the very verge of being taught here as at the foundation of the universe.

Now, "to return to our mutton," the programme for Saturday evening began with the Bach suite for orchestra in D major; it went on with a symphony by D'Albert in F major, op. 4; and ended with the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman."

The Bach suite has not been given here for several years, possibly not since Mr. Gericke was here, although it is vastly important that the music by Bach in this form should be kept before the public. The solemn and dignified opening and close of the overture were given by the orchestra with some breadth. The intervening vivace was not so clearly given out by Mr. Nikisch as cheerful expression of a massive mind, but the performance was all too sombre and unrobust.

The adagio so well known as the Bach air on the G string was played with delicacy, if not with sentimentality conspicuous by its absence. The graceful gavottes, bourees and gignees as usual pleased the audience immensely. Throughout the playing of the suite there was a lack of breadth—except the opening grave—force and volume of tone which is so essential for an adequate experience with Bach's music; yet in point of shading there was an exuberance of it. The gigue was somewhat jerkily played. The whole interpretation was of the feminine gender.

Any musician will appreciate that in designating as a quasi-important symphony the work of Eugen d'Albert produced at this concert, not the slightest disrespect is intended. After a single hearing the writer may perhaps best express his opinion of it by partially quoting what he has already given out in the columns of an esteemed contemporary.

The work is not without certain great excellencies, but on the other hand it has many mannerisms, is incoherent and desultory in statement; but portions of it are masterly. The composer's originality appears to be in the result of critical conclusions drawn from an examination of traditional methods. As has been stated, the work is quite as remote from genius as oratorical fluency, intermixed with scholasticism, is from the imperishable gift of poesy. The concert ended with an excellent performance of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture. C. L. CAPEN.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Notable Orchestra Concerts the Coming Week.

Herr Seidl to Give an Illustrative Wagner Programme—First of the Damrosch Symphony Series—The Handel and Haydn Season—Peoples' Singing Class—News Notes, Gossip.

In making the programme of the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's present home season, Mr. Arthur Nikisch gave prominence to Eugen d'Albert's first symphony in F major, op. 4, a work which was planned as a novelty of last season, if memory serves.

Gratified curiosity must be taken as the largest result obtained in this performance. The work is eminently conservative in its construction, it is a scholarly effort, and the composer shows a masterly acquaintance with orchestral combinations, but, unfortunately, he uses all these abilities in presenting in various colors phrases of little musical value, and in working out indefinite thoughts rather than well formed musical ideas. The symphony is decidedly interesting as an orchestral study, but as an evidence of the genius of D'Albert as a composer it is decidedly disappointing. The final movement is by all odds the best, but the merits of this portion of the work are hardly sufficient to win a permanent place for the symphony in the repertoire of the day. The performance of the symphony by the orchestra was calculated to give its meritorious features their due prominence, and whatever interest was lacking was caused by the weakness and deficiencies of the composition.

A thoroughly delightful performance of the suite in D major, by J. S. Bach, was the opening number of the evening's programme, and the excellent work done by the string players, especially by Mr. Kneisel in the lento movement, was the cause of genuine pleasure to all.

The glorious "Flying Dutchman" overture came with revivifying effect after the symphony, and Mr. Nikisch gave this popular selection from the Wagner repertoire a magnificent reading, the brass section of the band being used in a grand, broad fashion that gave the strong contrasts demanded with inspiring results.

The orchestra goes on its second occasional tour this week, and the regular series will be resumed on the 17th inst., when both the eighth and ninth of the Beethoven symphonies are announced, the chorus organized by Mr. Nikisch appearing for the first time in the latter work, assisted by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

D'Albert's First Symphony Finely Played.

Anton Seidl to Offer a Treat for Wagner Lovers at the Boston.

Coming of Damrosch's N. Y. Symphony Orchestra—Other Events.

The feature of the seventh of this season's symphony concerts was the performance for the first time in America of Eugen D'Albert's symphony No. 1, in F major, op. 4. So great is the reputation of this composer as a pianist, and so cordial has been the favor accorded the few of his compositions heard here, that there was naturally a great deal of interest felt in the performance of his most pretentious composition. Consequently Music Hall was more than ordinarily crowded, both at the Friday rehearsal and at last evening's concert.

The symphony received splendid interpretation from Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, and it was evident that the beauties of the work were fully displayed. It is an exceedingly voluminous composition, and it is possible that its great length accounted in a measure for the lack of enthusiasm awakened by its performance. It is certainly an interesting work, and displays musical intelligence of a very high order.

It is not particularly notable for originality, neither is it strikingly beautiful in the variety or melodiousness of its themes. But it is treated in a thoroughly scholarly manner; the scoring is vigorous, rich and highly colored and very elaborate in ornamentation.

There are four movements, and they approach the old, true, symphonic form much more closely than do the average works of modern composers. The first movement presents three pleasing themes, which are worked out in regular form, and the movement is brought to a close by a short, but effective, coda. The second or slow movement is, perhaps, the most interesting of the four. It is written mainly for the strings and the wood wind, and is most delightful in its melodic effects.

The scherzo is unconventional in treatment, and some very pleasing results are attained. The finale is brilliant and forceful, an uncommonly grand effect being gained by free use of the brasses.

Bach's suite in D major and "The Flying Dutchman" overture were the other offerings on the programme. The five short movements of the Bach suite were played with much expression and evidently gave a great deal of pleasure to the audience, even to those of its members who do not always find much delight in listening to the works of this old master.

The Wagner overture was played in the same effective style which has in the past characterized Mr. Nikisch's presentation of this beautiful series of tone pictures. The Symphony orchestra will be away on its travels this week, so that the next concert will be given on Dec. 17, when two of Beethoven's symphonies, the eighth and ninth, will be performed, with the assistance of Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn as soloists, and the Boston Symphony chorus.

MUSIC NOTES.

The Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall on Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Suite in D major, Bach; Symphony No. 1 in F major, Op. 4, Eugen D'Albert; overture to the "Flying Dutchman," Wagner. There was little to commend in the playing of the Suite or the Wagner overture. Mr. Kneisel played the "Air" in the Bach number in his usual high y artistic manner. The novelty of the evening was D'Albert's symphony, a work so vague, purposeless, unmelodic and at times so grossly discordant, that comment upon its construction, ana itically, would be a waste of space. The programme maker would have the public believe that this symphony was played for the "first time in America" on this occasion.

For the benefit of those who may care to know, it was first played in America in New York, Nov. 25, 1887, Friday afternoon, by the New York Symphony Orchestra, Walter Damrosch, conductor, at the Metropolitan Opera House, and was repeated on Saturday evening, Nov. 26, under the same auspices. The rest of the programme on that occasion embraced an introduction and serenade by Lalo; an aria from "Don Juan," and a ballade, "Siegfried's Sword," by L. Damrosch, sung by Max Alvary; and the unusual occurrence of three overtures played in succession, to wit: "Der Freyschutz" of Weber, "Flying Dutchman" of Wagner and "The Corsair" of Beilios.

There will be no concert next Saturday evening, but on Saturday evening, Dec. 17, the unwelcome ordeal of sitting through the performance of two symphonies will be offered the patient public, Beethoven's Symphony, No. 8 and his ninth (choral) symphony, with Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn as soloists, and the Boston Symphony Chorus, which makes its first bow at these concerts on this occasion.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Seventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Reminiscences of Charles Santley, Baritone.

An Interesting Volume of Anecdotes and Counsel.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite, D major.....Bach
Symphony No. 1, F major.....d'Albert
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

The performance of the suite was too often ragged and untuneful. The air, as played by Mr. Kneisel, was an agreeable relief, although one might with justice have asked for a fuller tone and a broader delivery. The symphony by Eugen d'Albert was first played in the United States November 26, 1887, by the Symphony Society of New York, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch. When this symphony was first heard in European cities it attracted attention, chiefly on account of the comparative youth of the composer-virtuoso. But when it was heard in January of this year in Berlin, even Otto Lessmann, the warm admirer of d'Albert, protested against its appearance in a concert hall. The symphony showed five years ago the considerable command of the composer over orchestral resources, and it is said that since the first production d'Albert has applied the file to his score. It is not worth the while to review the work at length. Having heard the symphony of the pianist, let us rather remember pleasantly and gratefully the pianist himself. Instead of pointing out Brahms, Wagner and other members of the noble army of martyrs, who at times rise above the sullen billows of d'Albert's music, let us consider the words of Charles Avison, organist in Newcastle a century ago—the Avison treated so singularly by Robert Browning. Master Avison speaks as follows:

"In these vague and unmeaning pieces we often find the bewildered composer either struggling with the difficulties of an extraneous modulation or tiring the most consummate patience with a tedious repetition of some jejune thought, imagining he can never do enough till he has run through every key that can be crowded into one movement, till at length, all his force being exhausted, he drops into a dull close where his languid piece seems rather to expire and yield its last than conclude with a spirited and well-tuned cadence."

Music Notes.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the evening of the 3d inst., was the dullest in the season's series, thus far, which is saying much, for since these concerts were instituted the programmes have not been so uninteresting as they have been this year. The performances opened with Bach's familiar Suite in D, which was read weakly, and was played in a slovenly manner that was positively discreditable. In the vivace the attack was loose throughout, and in the Bourree there were moments when the strings were quite at loggerheads in respect to unity and emphasis. It was a species of go-as-you-please performance, and toward the end of the Gigue there was so much confusion in an apparent effort of some of the instruments to "be in first," that it was a relief, and something of a surprise, when they ended together. The Air was given in a flimsy sugary manner from which "jerkiness" was not wholly absent, and the performance of the work as a whole left almost everything to be desired in regard to style and character. In other words, it was unworthy the conductor and the orchestra. It fell flat with the audience. D'Albert's Symphony No. 1 in F, op. 4, followed. It is a wearisome work, extremely modern, distinctly soporific, and exceedingly wanting in individuality. From beginning to end it suggests a composition for the pianoforte that has been adapted to orchestral performance. Of music pure and simple, it contains little, and at every stage the composer seems to have been moved to show how much he knew of harmony, counterpoint and instrumentation rather than to exemplify an irresistible inspiration to write a symphony. Why the work was performed it is not easy to decide. D'Albert, though a fine pianist, has no standing as a composer, and this effort will do little if anything toward winning for him such standing. The symphony has had no success elsewhere that imperatively called for its presentation here, and it could well have been passed by in favor of a work by some better known composer; let us say, for example, a work by Professor Paley, or by M. Chadwick, or by Mr. Foote, who have a certain deserved recognition as writers for the orchestra. It is probable that they may be heard later in the season, but that is no excuse for boring a symphony audience with such a boyish failure as is this D'Albert symphony. The concert ended with a fiery performance of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture. This evening there will be no concert, the orchestra being away on one of its periodical tours. For next Saturday evening the programme is to consist of two symphonies by Beethoven—No. 8 and No. 9. The solo parts in the latter will be sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

The novelty introduced by Mr. Nikisch at the Symphony concert at Music Hall was Symphony No. 1 in F major, the work of Eugene D'Albert. Mr. D'Albert is a young man who has attained eminence as a pianist and also as a composer. The symphony in question being one of his most ambitious works. It has an element of interest from its orchestral combinations, some of which are exceedingly unique and surprisingly well worked out in so young a composer. The theme with which the symphony begins and terminates is a lofty one and all the movements are ably handled, but it cannot be termed a thoroughly enjoyable work. The third movement is the best, with its light and shade. It was rendered in a masterly manner by the orchestra, Mr. Nikisch giving a comprehensive reading of the score.

Bach's suite in D major was attentively listened to and heartily appreciated. It is somewhat familiar to Boston concert-goers, and is always received with pleasure. The second movement in the strings was admirably given, especially the work of the first violin. The programme closed with the overture of "The Flying Dutchman."

TIGHT BINDING

MUSIC. Continued

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

So far from anything of orchestral importance being lost by not performing the Grieg suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit" at the Symphony concert last evening there was a welcome gain in the substitution of the great D major suite by Bach. The suite by Grieg which Mr. Nikisch had selected but had wisely concluded not to have performed is well known to pianoforte teachers as a very serviceable teaching piece; but is as pianoforte music pure and simple, and would not prove effective if given by string orchestra. The Bach suite in D was well known to our grandparents in the days of the well-remembered Harvard concerts. If our memory serves us correctly, Conductor Gerike had it performed here several times; but it was then interpreted in a far more Bachian spirit than characterized the performance last evening. One good healthy fortissimo from the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be agreeable for a change and just such a dynamic quality was invariably lacking whenever it was required of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the Bach suite, which was smoothly and refinedly played, but nevertheless in a manner that was at once sterile and ineffective.

The novel feature of the concert was with Eugen d'Albert's symphony of 4. It is easy to err in judgment when attempting to speak ex cathedra after a single hearing of a work so elaborate, lengthy and pretentious as this new symphony, but a few impressions if not character tainted with pinchbeckism may well be given. The chief fault of the symphony would appear to be with certain mannerisms; and there is an inexplicable mixture in it also of masterly passages, of the quasi-fugue style, of one excellent fugue also having two subjects on the one hand and on the other of puerile weaknesses, of bold phrase now and then followed by a certain lack of individual resources and warm imagination. Portions of the second movement are involved in just such dryness as the amateur might naturally mistake for classicity, while it is not classicity, but more like pedantry. The form of it is very peculiar and even grotesque at times. As a whole, it appears not to be the work of an essentially personal, self-evolved composer.

D'Albert's originality as shown in this work appears to be the result of critical conclusions drawn from an examination of past methods. It is all in all as remote from genius as oratorical fluency intermixed with scholasticism from the divine gift of poesy.

The concert ended with a surprisingly fine performance of the overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer," by Wagner. The next concert will not take place until Saturday evening, Dec. 17, Beethoven's birthday, when the eighth and ninth symphonies will be performed. The Boston Symphony chorus will make its debut, and the soloists for the symphony will be Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

Music Hall.

N 1892-93.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT.

JANUARY 21, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

RE. "In the Spring."

TO FOR VIOLIN AND ORCHESTRA.

NY. "Im Walde."

LOIST:

ENRI MARTEAU.

The Seventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Reminiscences of Charles Santley, Baritone.

An Interesting Volume of Anecdotes and Counsel.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert was as follows:

Suite, D major.....Bach
Symphony No. 1, F major.....d'Albert
Overture, "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

The performance of the suite was too often ragged and untuneful. The air, as played by Mr. Kneisel, was an agreeable relief, although one might with justice have asked for a fuller tone and a broader delivery. The symphony by Eugen d'Albert was first played in the United States November 26, 1887, by the Symphony Society of New York, under the direction of Mr. Walter Damrosch. When this symphony was first heard in European cities it attracted attention, chiefly on account of the comparative youth of the composer-virtuoso. But when it was heard in January of this year in Berlin, even Otto Lessmann, the warm admirer of d'Albert, protested against its appearance in a concert hall. The symphony showed five years ago the considerable command of the composer over orchestral resources, and it is said that since the first production d'Albert has applied the file to his score. It is not worth the while to review the work at length. Having heard the symphony of the pianist, let us rather remember pleasantly and gratefully the pianist himself. Instead of pointing out Brahms, Wagner and other members of the noble army of martyrs, who at times rise above the sullen billows of d'Albert's music, let us consider the words of Charles Avison, organist in Newcastle a century ago—the Avison treated so singularly by Robert Browning. Master Avison speaks as follows:

"In these vague and unmeaning pieces we often find the bewildered composer either struggling with the difficulties of an extraneous modulation or tiring the most consummate patience with a tedious repetition of some jejune thought, imagining he can never do enough till he has run through every key that can be crowded into one movement, till, at length, all his force being exhausted, he drops into a dull close where his languid piece seems rather to expire and yield its last than conclude with a spirited and well-tuned cadence."

Music Notes.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the evening of the 3d inst., was the duller in the season's series, thus far, which is saying much, for since these concerts were instituted the programmes have not been so uninteresting as they have been this year. The performances opened with Bach's familiar Suite in D, which was read weakly, and was played in a slovenly manner that was positively discreditable. In the vivace the attack was loose throughout, and in the Bourree there were moments when the strings were quite at loggerheads in respect to unity and emphasis. It was a species of go-as-you-please performance, and toward the end of the Gigue there was so much confusion in an apparent effort of some of the instruments to "be in first," that it was a relief, and something of a surprise, when they ended together. The Air was given in a flaccid sugary manner from which "jerkiness" was not wholly absent, and the performance of the work as a whole left almost everything to be desired in regard to style and character. In other words, it was unworthy the conductor and the orchestra. It fell flat with the audience. D'Albert's Symphony No. 1 in F, op. 4, followed. It is a wearisome work, extremely modern, distinctly sophomoric, and exceedingly wanting in individuality. From beginning to end it suggests a composition for the pianoforte that has been adapted to orchestral performance. Of music pure and simple, it contains little, and at every stage the composer seems to have been moved to show how much he knew of harmony, counterpoint and instrumentation rather than to exemplify an irresistible inspiration to write a symphony. Why the work was performed it is not easy to decide. D'Albert, though a fine pianist, has no standing as a composer, and this effort will do little if anything toward winning for him such standing. The symphony has had no success elsewhere that imperatively called for its presentation here, and it could well have been passed by in favor of a work by some better known composer; let us say, for example, a work by Professor Paley, or by M. Chadwick, or by Mr. Foote, who have a certain deserved recognition as writers for the orchestra. It is probable that they may be heard later in the season, but that is no excuse for boring a symphony audience with such a boyish failure as is this D'Albert symphony. The concert ended with a fiery performance of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture. This evening there will be no concert, the orchestra being away on one of its periodical tours. For next Saturday evening the programme is to consist of two symphonies by Beethoven—No. 8 and No. 9. The solo parts in the latter will be sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

The novelty introduced by Mr. Nikisch at the Symphony concert at Music Hall was Symphony No. 1 in F major, the work of Eugene D'Albert. Mr. D'Albert is a young man who has attained eminence as a pianist and also as a composer. The symphony in question being one of his most ambitious works. It has an element of interest from its orchestral combinations, some of which are exceedingly unique and surprisingly well worked out in so young a composer. The theme with which the symphony begins and terminates is a lofty one and all the movements are ably handled, but it cannot be termed a thoroughly enjoyable work. The third movement is the best, with its light and shade. It was rendered in a masterly manner by the orchestra. Mr. Nikisch giving a comprehensive reading of the score.

Bach's suite in D major was attentively listened to and heartily appreciated. It is somewhat familiar to Boston concert-goers, and is always received with pleasure. The second movement in the strings was admirably given, especially the work of the first violin. The programme closed with the overture of "The Flying Dutchman."

TIGHT BINDING

MUSIC.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

So far from anything of orchestral importance being lost by not performing the Grieg suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit" at the Symphony concert last evening there was a welcome gain in the substitution of the great D major suite by Bach. The suite by Grieg which Mr. Nikisch had selected but had wisely concluded not to have performed is well known to pianoforte teachers as a very serviceable teaching piece; but is as pianoforte music pure and simple, and would not prove effective if given by string orchestra. The Bach suite in D was well known to our grandparents in the days of the well-remembered Harvard concerts. If our memory serves us correctly, Conductor Gericke had it performed here several times; but it was then interpreted in a far more Bachian spirit than characterized the performance last evening. One good healthy fortissimo from the Boston Symphony Orchestra would be agreeable for a change and just such a dynamic quality was invariably lacking whenever it was required of Mr. Nikisch's reading of the Bach suite, which was smoothly and refinedly played, but nevertheless in a manner that was at once sterile and ineffective.

The novel feature of the concert was with Eugen d'Albert's symphony of 4. It is easy to err in judgment when attempting to speak ex cathedra after a single hearing of a work so elaborate, lengthy and pretentious as this new symphony, but a few impressions if not a character tainted with pinchbeckism may well be given. The chief fault of the symphony would appear to be with certain mannerisms; and there is an inexplicable mixture in it also of masterly passages, of the quasi-fugue style, of one excellent fugue also having two subjects on the one hand and on the other of puerile weaknesses, of bold phrase now and then followed by a certain lack of individual resources and warm imagination. Portions of the second movement are involved in just such dryness as the amateur might naturally mistake for classicality, while it is not classicality, but more like pedantry. The form of it is very peculiar and even grotesque at times. As a whole, it appears not to be the work of an essentially personal, self-evolved composer.

D'Albert's originality as shown in this work appears to be the result of critical conclusions drawn from an examination of past methods. It is all in all as remote from genius as oratorical fluency intermixed with scholasticism from the divine gift of poetry. The concert ended with a surprisingly fine performance of the overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer," by Wagner.

The next concert will not take place until Saturday evening, Dec. 17, Beethoven's birthday, when the eighth and ninth symphonies will be performed. The Boston Symphony chorus will make its debut, and the soloists for the symphony will be Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

Music Hall.

N 1892-93.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

NIKISCH, Conductor.

CONCERT.

JANUARY 21, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

RE. "In the Spring."

TO FOR VIOLIN AND ORCHESTRA.

NY. "Im Walde."

LOIST:

ENRI MARTEAU.

112

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

Ludwig van Beethoven, born December 17, 1770.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major. op. 93.

- I. Allegro vivace e con brio. F major.
- II. Allegretto scherzando. B flat major.
- III. Tempo di menuetto. F major. Trio: same tempo. F major.
- IV. Allegro vivace. F major.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 9, in D minor. (CHORAL)
op. 125.

ORCHESTRAL PART.

- I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso. D minor.
- II. Molto vivace. D minor. Presto. D major
- III. Adagio molto e cantabile. B flat major.

CHORAL PART. (Text from Schiller's "Ode to Joy.")

- IV. Presto. D minor. Allegro assai, D major.
- Presto. D minor. Recitative; Baritone. D minor.

SOLOISTS:

MISS PRISCILLA WHITE,

MISS LOUISA LEIMER,

MR. WILLIAM J. WINCH,

MR. HEINRICH MEYN,

AND

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CHORUS.

113

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, Opus 83.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, in D minor (Choral), Opus 125.

Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn were the singers.

A wonderful programme! Here was a chance to drink one's fill of great music unmingled with baser stuff. There are still some people left, to be sure, who do not like the finale of the Ninth Symphony; and it must be admitted that many of the arguments advanced against it are both pertinent and true. The voices are treated with all Beethoven's recklessness; much of the contrapuntal writing is singularly unvocal in character; it may be even doubted whether any chorus ever has been or ever will be brought together really able to sing the choral parts thoroughly well. The work is not essentially impossible, but a thoroughly fine performance of it is virtually impracticable. One can even say that, looked at from the highest artistic point of view, it is in a sense an aesthetically immoral work: to treat singers and their voices with this cruelty has undeniably a tinge of artistic immorality. But, with and in spite of all this, it is a great and glorious work. As far as we are concerned, all the arguments against it appeal to our reason only; they have never had the slightest convincing force over our feelings. We understand them, we are bound to admit their theoretical validity, but they do not lessen our delight in the work one whit! To us it is still the most enjoyable, thrilling and emotionally inspiring composition in existence—the one which carries us away more than any other. Say as much as you please about the monstrosity of Beethoven's high writing for the voices, of the impossibility of his voice-parts being well sung; to our ear the effect of these high passages, even when only approximately well sung, is so superb, so incomparably thrilling, that we would not have one of them changed or struck out. No other work reduces us so completely to the mental attitude of the mere irresponsible amateur, whose only reply to professional objections is: "It may be all wrong, but it gets there all the same!" We have already said that this finale is an immoral work. But when objections take the shape of asserting the want of distinction or the "vulgarity" of the theme to the "Hymn to Joy," then we deny their validity in toto. We say right out that, both to our instinctive and to our reflective musical sense, this melody is one of the most superb Beethoven ever wrote; there is genius in every measure of it. It is simple without poverty, exalted in character without turgidity, it exactly befits the state of feeling into which Schiller's poetry throws one. The development of this glorious theme, first in the orchestra, then in the voices, has all the splendor, the beauty, artistic symmetry and elevation, in a word all the "Heiterkeit" of a Greek frieze. And how absolutely individual in manner it all is! The working up of the theme in three and four parts for strings and a single bassoon shows a wholly new departure in counterpoint; both in respect to harmony and to the leading of the parts it is unprecedented as it is still unimitated. Another striking point in this finale is the composer's superb confidence in himself. Beethoven must have known perfectly well that he was here doing many things in a way that, in other hands, had heretofore shown itself to be trivial and undignified; but he had the great genius's complete assurance of his own dignity, the certainty that, do what he would, he could not be undignified. He thus wrote with aristocratic simplicity and directness as the Greek tragic poets did—and with immense dignity of result, in spite of the frequent homeliness of his expression, and the exuberance of animal spirits to which he allowed himself to give way.

The performance of the whole Ninth Symphony last Saturday evening was in most respects magnificently fine. The orchestra evidently laid itself out to do its best. The first movement and the scherzo were two of the finest pieces of conducting we have yet had from Mr. Nikisch. In some passages of the first movement he, to be sure, did not quite succeed in obtaining the true Beethovenish even pianissimo (without the suggestion of a swell) from his violins; some of those alternating G-flats and G-naturals were a little too emotionally swelled before the real crescendo set it. But in other parts of the work, notably in the adagio and portions of the finale, the violins did better piano playing of expressive cantilena than we have heard them do for some time. It even seemed to us, in the contrapuntal working-up of the "Joy" theme, that the damping effect of the surrounding chorus singers had not been made quite enough allowance for, and that the strings played a trifle too softly to hold their own against the bassoon. The great adagio was beautifully played, no slight credit being due to the fourth horn—his low C and G (real E-flat and B-flat) were beautifully smooth and rich, and he played the famous solo passage exquisitely. We felt at moments that Mr. Nikisch was taking the tempo slower than any music whatsoever ought to go; but this sort of thing is quite consonant with the modern taste. The chorus sang admirably well—always considering the music. The weak part of the performance was the solo quartet. Here one had a fine example of how much depends on Mr. Nikisch himself in the fine performances he gives; the four solo singers were the only ones on the stage who were placed with their backs to the conductor, and could not see his beat. He placed too great confidence in them, for the result was that the quartet dragged, or tended to drag, behind his beat all through. No doubt, Mr. Nikisch took things at a pretty brisk pace, and singers do not feel very comfortable while singing so fast; but it can be done. The only really satisfactory part of the solo singing was Mr. Meyn's recitative; that was splendid! But, with the exception of the solo quartet, the performance of the whole symphony was unusually fine, with but very few flaws, and often truly magnificent. The ever-delightful Eighth Symphony was admirably played.

We still cannot like Mr. Nikisch's two tempi in the third movement. There are two ways of taking this much debated "Tempo di Menuetto": each one has much to say for itself, and we do not care very much whether the movement be taken according to Mendelssohn or according to Wagner. Only, to take it in both ways, to play the minuet with Mendelssohnian vivacity, and the trio with Wagnerish deliberation, is singularly disturbing. No matter how much idealized it may be, a dance-form is and remains a dance-form, and unity of tempo is one of its prime factors. But this is the only structure we have to make; all the rest was admirable.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, Symphony No. 4, in A major, opus 90 ("Italian"); Tchaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G major; Lalo, overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." Miss Eugenia Castellano will be the pianist.

The Symphony Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening, with a performance of the Eighth and Ninth Symphonies of Beethoven. The singers engaged in the latter work were Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louise Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn. The chorus organized to appear with the Symphony Orchestra at intervals made its first appearance in The Choral Symphony on this occasion, after a course of rehearsal under the direction of Mr. Arthur Foote.

The concert was a long and tedious affair, the programme being in keeping with that questionable dispensation that has marked the inability of the present incumbent of the conductor's position in this direction.

The playing of the orchestra was in its accustomed style, a manner that under its present regime has fallen to the level of an orchestral patois, above which it only occasionally rises.

It would be useless to speak critically of the vocal soloists on this occasion, the folly of the composer having rendered it needless. The chorus, of limited numbers, was crowded in about the orchestra and overpowered in its efforts. Why the Symphony Orchestra should step without its provence to daily in attempts with choral works, I cannot understand. The excuse of wanting to give the Ninth Symphony may be offered in this case, but it is not to stop at this point, for attempts with other vocal works are in anticipation. The Handel and Haydn Society, the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club can fill this demand, and with success also, and there is no call for such digressions upon the part of the Symphony Orchestra. It would be better to make the effort instead to restore the latter to its former point of orchestral perfection, and expend some judgment and discretion in designing programmes of a more unique description than are now offered the patrons of these concerts.

As regards the Ninth Symphony, many discriminating, considerate, able and progressive musicians have been iconoclastic enough to believe that it should long ago have been laid up in the archives of musical failures; curiosities (or monstrosities when the Finale is considered), there to remain secluded, to be pointed out only to the inquirer of succeeding generations as the abnormal effort of a great genius, the production of which marked the end of his usefulness in the field of symphonic writing. Many musicians of great name have argued in defence of this last effort of Beethoven, who, had it been the work of any other than its immortal author would undoubtedly have condemned it at once.

The struggles of such in their efforts to make clear the mysteries they pretend are concealed within its pages, are akin to the effort of the able advocate in his endeavor to make the best of a bad and hopeless case, and thus, if possible, prove his client an innocent and honest man. To be sure, in the first three movements of the Symphony, there are some wonderful periods, but prolixity diminishes their value, and the listener becomes wearied with the unmercifully monotonous dragging out, especially in the Adagio, which on this occasion was played in a sickly, sentimental manner, and at a very slow pace, that added still more to its wearisome monotone. As for the Finale, it is hideous in its struggles.—The programme next Saturday evening will be Symphony in A major, "Italian," Mendelssohn; Concerto for piano, No. 2, in G major, Tchaikowsky, and the overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo. Miss Eugenia Castellano will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

A thrilling picture could be painted of the "Collapse of an Orchestral Conductor," if somebody present in the dressing room at Music Hall the other night had only brought along a kodak to fix the scene on the spot. Unfortunately, it is only hearsay who can be the artist, for the fainting conductor who had led his band to a musical Waterloo in the performance of the Ninth symphony can never repeat the tableau, because, let us trust, there will never again be an occasion to give it as it was given then in Boston. Shade of the great Beethoven! What wonder that this glorious masterpiece of yours went to pieces! No, the surprise is, your bronzeness was not shattered, and that you, too, did not take it out in a swoon behind the scenes.

THE SYMPHONY.

BEETHOVEN'S BIRTHDAY

DULY RECOGNIZED

And Appropriately Celebrated at Saturday's Concert—Two of the Master's Symphonies, the Eighth and Ninth Produced—The Most Playful Used as a Foil to the Grandest.

Beethoven's birthday was most appropriately celebrated at Saturday's concert by the performance of two of his symphonies. It is always a problem how to introduce the ninth symphony in a concert programme. It is sure to dwarf anything that is placed in itself to constitute the entire concert. Since it is, in a large degree, a tone-poem of liberty, such a work as the "Egmont" overture might precede it to advantage (of course no musical work dare follow it), or, because it is the most dramatic instrumental work in symphonic form, the most dramatic of overtures, "Leonora," No. 3, might fittingly usher it in. On this occasion, however, our conductor's great love of contrast led to a different arrangement. The shortest of the nine was given as offset to the vastest, the most playful symphony became a foil to the grandest. If ever a work deserved the title of "the humorous symphony," Beethoven's eighth does. Yet Beethoven's humor was not of the dainty Mendelssohnian order, and there is much of brusqueness and bizarrie in the work. These points were splendidly brought out in the performance. The odd caperings of the bassoon, the quaint figure on the kettle-drums in the last movement, the dialogue between the violins and the contrabasses in the second movement, the sudden and intentionally prosaic end of the same allegretto, and the grotesque skip from flute to contrabass (from garret to cellar of the orchestra) in the finale, were all perfectly executed. But one did not feel just in the mood for grandeur after so much of playfulness, although the breadth of the contrast was undeniable. Yet in one point the eighth symphony approaches the ninth; in both, the composer has given the humbler instruments some prominence; the contrabasses become obbligato instruments and the kettle-drums have great prominence in both symphonies.

The ninth symphony had points of great merit and important defect in this performance. The first movement came with almost the force of a revelation. In previous performances in Boston our conductors have refined too much in this portion of the work and have polished the rugged grandeur of the composition away altogether. This time all the virility was intact, and the massive character of the movement never had better inter-retation. No symphony in the world shows more clearly what a great composer can do with rhythm, and, as if to accentuate this fact, Beethoven uses the simplest possible figures in the first two movements; in the first movement the figure is an empty fifth (and it may be here mentioned that Wagner has used precisely the same figure, inverted, as the motif of "The Flying Dutchman"), and in the scherzo the simplest figure possible, an octave, is used as the chief thematic material. The peculiar beginning of the first movement, where the auditor wanders in a fog, not recognizing any definite key, and only hearing a rhythmic figure, was excellently performed, and the powerful entrance of the chief theme, finally establishing the key of D minor, was like a sunburst. The contrast of the second theme, with its more delicate wood wind work, was equally successful, and the force of the closing theme was quite in place. But the greatest effect of this allegro was made in the coda, where that wonderful crescendo, chiefly of strings and bassoons, a chromatic surging like an ocean storm, was performed in a noble style. The horn did excellent work in the coda, and in fact each and every player seemed inspired by the beauty and loftiness of the work. The scherzo deserved praise for its spirited manner, and it is safe to say that it has never had a more dashing performance here. But the balance of parts was not perfect, and the marked three-noted figure (the octave aforesaid) was by no means always audible where it should have been, only the kettle-drum giving it forth with a startling emphasis, that at least restored the average. As this figure is frequently the key to the coherency of the work, particularly where it punctuates the three and four-barred rhythms, and where it forms a drone-bass to the theme, its obliteration, even occasionally, was a serious fault. But the performance of the wind instruments in the Trio was magnificent in spite of the almost impossible tempo which was taken, and the sudden and impetuous ending of the Coda was given with commendable unity.

The brilliancy of the performance here atoned for the shortcomings noticed above. Not so, however, in the adagio, where the first theme was sentimentalized in a manner that spoiled the finest part of the work. The tempo was taken too slow, and a tropical languor hung over everything in a manner that was anything but the style of Beethoven.

The finale had some serious faults. The fierce and dissonant cry with which it begins was finely presented. It seems a few decades too late to give a commentary on Beethoven, yet one may venture to question whether Berlioz understood what the master intended in this introduction to the choral part of the work. Schiller's words, which he used, may give us the clue to the secret. Beethoven is here picturing, or is about to picture, the era of universal love and brotherhood; before he begins this tone-poem of joy however, he heightens the effect by contrast; the fierce dissonance which begins the work, and which Berlioz characterizes as a "cry of wrath," is but the cry of agony of a tortured world; the crime, suffering, and misery of mankind are in it. The contrabasses rebuke the tumult as if the voice of a higher power were promising relief;—the most wonderful instrumental dialogue in the whole realm of instrumental music. Of course the contrabass passages also serve to prepare for the entrance of the choral and solo parts, and the very phrase which appears on the contrabasses afterwards is given to the solo bass-singer. But the Berlioz suggestion that when this bass voice succeeds the final dissonances of the introduction with "Let us sing pleasanter songs," Beethoven meant "by a queer caprice to calumniate instrumental music," is one of the silliest commentaries in the history of musical criticism. He meant to bid adieu to strife and contention and wretchedness, and herald a newer and brighter epoch. Before the epoch of joy he pictures the era of sorrow,—that is all.

One may earnestly remonstrate with the spirit which led to a sweetening and retarding of the passages for the contrabasses (the noblest passages ever written for the instrument) for these phrases, scarcely less than the voice of a redeemer, became rather the gentle sentences of a lover. The chief theme, on which the subsequent variations are founded, was well given by the contrabasses and cellos. It bears a distinct resemblance to an American melody, and one can coincide with the remark of an eminent Bostonian, made on the occasion of the first performance of the work in this city: "That the ninth symphony! Why its only glorified 'Yankee Doodle'!" The point was well taken, for the melody is not unlike our own, but it has one characteristic which is not present so clearly in "Yankee Doodle." It is almost wholly in conjunct movement, moving by single steps, and not by skips—a characteristic of "God Save the Queen" and almost every other truly national theme. It could readily be sung by thousands of untutored singers, as was Luther and Franck's hymn, "Ein Feste Burg," and, in fact, in its sacred metamorphosis into "Rise my soul and stretch thy wings" in modern hymnals, it is found one of the most singable of themes. But in the subsequent variations it is anything but singable, and truth demands the statement that it was very raggedly sung. The quartette, consisting of Misses Priscilla White and Louisa Leimer and Messrs. William J. Winch and Heinrich Meyn, were generally adequate, although at times the soprano was spasmodic in execution, but the chorus was a continual blur. Two points may here be pleaded in extenuation; the work is emphatically unvocal, and the pitch of today is higher than when Beethoven wrote his merciless high passages. Two lined C in 1823-4 had about 512 vibrations, whereas now, even in our international (lowered) pitch, it has 517 3-10 vibrations. In summing up, then, one can state that the two last movements have been better given, but the scherzo may be classed as successful, while the first movement was overwhelmingly great.

It is always an event for Boston to hear the ninth symphony, and it should be an especially welcome work in America, for liberty and human equality were glowing ideals in Beethoven's soul, and the result of his yearnings toward these were the finale of the Egmont overture, the Heroic symphony, and finally this lofty song of universal happiness. Louis C. Elson.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Chorus Heard in Beethoven's Ninth.

"Wang" and "Robin Hood" Bound for Boston—The Wolff-Holman Triumph—A Second Recital—Gilmore's Band Concerts—"The Messiah"—News Notes.

The feature of the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, at Music Hall last evening, was the first appearance of the chorus organized for the present season as an adjunct to the band.

It was a symphony concert in fact as well as name, the programme being made up of the eighth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven, a choice which probably appealed to the taste and judgment of a portion of those present.

The readings of the instrumental movements of the two symphonies were in keeping with traditional interpretations in the main, and gave general satisfaction. An especially enjoyable performance was given of the lovely allegretto of the eighth symphony, and the brilliant allegro "Vivace" of the same work was delightfully given.

The preparations for the performance of the final movement, made necessary by the limited space available for the singers, caused so much confusion that the continuity of the interpretation was sadly interrupted, and much of the pleasure usually attending a hearing of this finale was missed. The solo singers selected to assist were Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, all of whom proved amply equal to the demands made upon them. Miss White made her first prominent appearance here on this occasion, and the rare quality of her voice as well as her admirable skill as a singer was effectively shown in the trying passages for the soprano voice. Mr. Meyn delivered the opening recitative in a thoroughly artistic fashion, and Mr. Winch sang the tenor solo in his usually finished style.

Evidently the aim in the organization of the chorus has been to get competent singers, and the work of its members last evening must have amply rewarded Messrs. Nikisch and Foote for their labors in this direction. The chorus sang with a degree of confidence and certainty that was delightful, and followed the intelligent direction of their conductor with always admirable results. The good work of all the musical forces of the evening was highly enjoyed by the immense audience present, which was fully up to the legal limit put upon the attendance in this hall.

Next Saturday evening the soloist will be Signorina Eugenia Castellano, pianist, and the programme will consist of Mendelssohn's symphony in A major, "Italian," Tschaiikowsky's concerto for pianoforte No. 2, in G major, and Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys."

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Eighth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The "Ninth Symphony" Considered as a Stumbling Block.

Notes of Interest and Programmes of Coming Concerts.

The Programme of the eighth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 8, op. 93 }
Symphony No. 9, op. 125 } Beethoven

The orchestra was assisted by the Boston Symphony Chorus, which made its first appearance as an organization, and by Miss Priscilla White, soprano, Miss Louisa Leimer, contralto, Wm. J. Winch, tenor, and Heinrich Meyn, bass. Music Hall was crowded.

The programme book of the concert states that Beethoven was born Dec. 17, 1770. It is a pleasure to find a long-disputed point definitely and quietly settled here in our own town. To be sure the patient and accurate Victor Wilder, who had the advantage of the fruits of the labor of Alexander Wheelock Thayer, is more cautious in the matter. He only "permitted" himself to draw from certain facts "the inference" that Beethoven was born the 16th of December and baptized the 17th. The facts are these: First, Beethoven was baptized in the Church of Saint Remy in Bonn Dec. 17. Second, before the French Revolution such civil records as marriages and births were only preserved in the parish registers. "In the eyes of the church the child did not enter into life until he was a Christian, and so only the date of baptism was recorded." It was the custom at Bonn to bear the child to the baptismal font the day after its birth.

The cautious Hugo Riemann says that Beethoven was born, "in all probability," the 16th. But it seems that in Boston we are cock-sure of the 17th as the birthday.

The programme-book contains the passage from Wagner's "Beethoven," and it is printed at length, in which Wagner tells how Beethoven "in the fullness of his own plenipotency" changed Schiller's word "streng" (sternly) to "frech" (impudently), and then exclaims, "Can anything be more significant than this act of passionate violence on the artist's part? We think to see before us Luther in his wrath against the Pope."

Of course the word "frech" appealed irresistibly to the vain and arrogant Wagner. Unfortunately, however, he erred in the premises. Beethoven made no such change. In the autograph copy he wrote "streng." A copyist made the foolish blunder that seemed to Wagner an inspiration of Beethoven.

We are all familiar with the performance of the Eighth Symphony by the orchestra under the present administration. To again deplore the lack of delicacy in the treatment of the allegretto, the too frequent anticipation of the climax in other movements, the tendency to tear subdued passion to tatters, is perhaps an unnecessary task. On the other hand, it would be unjust to deny the legitimate effect of certain readings of the conductor.

But the Ninth Symphony is not so familiar to our concert goers. Its last performance in this city before the concert of Saturday evening was, if I am not mistaken, April 23, 1888, under the direction of Mr. Gericke. The singers on that occasion were Mrs. Kaitsch-Lehmann, Miss Louise Meisslinger, and Messrs Kaitsch and Fischer.

The difficulties of this symphony are known to all. They are so great that the question often arises, "In view of the almost inevitable failure, is the attempt of performance worth the while?"

When the Ninth Symphony was given in 1841 at a concert of the Paris Conservatory, Rossini on leaving the hall said to Ferdinand Hiller: "I know nothing more beautiful than the scherzo of this symphony. I could not have made a scherzo like it." For this speech, the tribute of one genius to another, Rossini has stood as the target for sneers; and why? Because he added these words: "The rest of the symphony is wanting in charm; the music does not 'get there.'" And if we were not under the spell of a great name, would we not agree in substance with Rossini?

Let us suppose, for instance, that an American musician, or an unknown Frenchman, should write the finale of the Ninth Symphony and bring it to a conductor of to-day, and that it should be seen for the first time. Would any conductor in this country put it in rehearsal? Is it not probable that he would look with pity on the young composer and say unto him, "My dear young friend, you must first learn the art of writing for the human voice. There are no singers who could possibly bring out the effects that you demand, and I am not sure that your effects would all be worth the trouble if giant singers were trained expressly for your purpose. The passage, 'Before God the cherub stands,' with its fermata is noble, and I admit that here and there are evidences of great talent if not absolute genius. But your chief theme strikes me as unworthy, and no better than any joyous ditty of the Salvation Army. Your march does not impress me. Your quick movements, if the indicated pace must be maintained, will bring rack and ruin to choral dignity or choral effect of any kind. Nor do I find the instrumentation of this finale in any way remarkable. I advise you to study the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th symphonies of Beethoven."

And yet what songs of blind adoration have been chanted at the mere mention of this finale! We are told that "excellence of the highest kind without obscurity cannot exist." We are told that only an absolutely deaf genius could have heard such marvellous strains. It is true that Beethoven was so deaf that he could only see the stormy applause that greeted him when this symphony was first produced. This performance was in 1824. But he was deaf in 1802 when he wrote his pathetic "Will," in which he spoke of the tortures inflicted upon him by his physical infirmity. The "Heroic" symphony, the C minor, the Pastoral, the 7th, were also the work of a deaf man.

Some warm admirers of this finale say: "It is true that the vocal passages are almost unsingable, and the actual performance is almost always a terror to the ear, but you must imagine how gloriously they would sound if they could be sung."

Others agree with the painter, Eugene Delacroix: "In presence of these grand and singular productions, still obscure and perhaps destined to remain so for ever, artists, men of the profession, hesitate in pronouncing a fit judgment, but if you remember that the works of the second period of Beethoven were at first regarded as undecipherable and are now acknowledged masterpieces, I should say that he were right, even though it were against my opinion, and I should again believe that it is always safe to bet on genius." That is to say, if out of the collection of Beethoven's compositions you happen to find anything that appears disagreeable, trivial or incomprehensible, you should nevertheless bet that it is sublime, for Beethoven was a genius. Now, this is rank tetchism.

The performance Saturday evening of the first three movements of the symphony was in many respects highly creditable to the conductor and the orchestra. There was a praiseworthy attempt in the first movement to preserve the sustained pianissimo which, as played by the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, excited the admiration of Wagner to such a degree that he preserved the memory of his wonder in his pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren." The lightness and the elasticity of the scherzo were admirably brought out by the strings, and the performance of the scherzo was all in all the feature of the evening. On the contrary, the adagio seemed devoid of genuine feeling, and the work of the wood-wind could not always be commended for its purity or precision. It may be said of the instrumental members that a sincere attempt to realize grand effects was often crowned with success. Whether the effects of the composer are really grand—that is another question so far as the first, third and fourth movements are concerned.

The finale was a vocal failure. Of the solo singers Mr. Meyn acquitted himself bravely of his stentorian task. The others made an heroic struggle. The chorus was drowned in the waves of orchestral fury. Here and there a soprano head appeared, gasping above the billows. To judge of the character of the Boston Symphony Chorus from the performance of Saturday evening would be unfair, even if it were possible. Nor would it be just to speak in detail of the singing of Miss White or of Miss Lemmer. The task that was presented to the chorus and the quartette was one that strikes terror to the stoutest singer.

The programme of the rehearsal and the concert of this week will be as follows: Symphony, A major, Mendelssohn; concerto for piano, No. 2, G major, Tchaikowsky; overture, "Le Roi d'Ys." Miss Eugenia Castellano will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday night, the 17th inst., was listened to by one of the largest audiences ever gathered in Music Hall. The programme was: Symphony No. 8 and Symphony No. 9, Beethoven, the solos in the latter being sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. H. Meyn. It was scarcely wise to precede the long Choral symphony by another symphony, to say nothing of the fact that the work selected to open the performances was by no means the most advisable one that could have been chosen to put the hearer in a proper frame of mind to enjoy the work that closed them. An overture would have been more desirable, if only for the reason that it would have left the audience fresher to listen to the great symphony. Two large symphonies, and one of them the choral, is over much for one concert, if full and unfatigued enjoyment is to be experienced. However, by this time it has become so patent that programme-making is not among the talents of the conductor of these concerts, that it is as superfluous as it is unprofitable to dwell on the subject. The performances throughout were far from satisfying. The eighth symphony was read capriciously.

ly and and was played with considerable coarseness. The delightful allegretto scherzando was painfully bungled, and its delicate piquancy was smothered in the rough and ragged interpretation it received. In fact, the reading and playing of the work throughout was reprehensibly careless and misrepresenting. As for the ninth symphony, we have rarely if ever listened to so inadequate a performance of it. The conductor seemed to look on it as if it were a bit of sensationism. The first movement was given in a more creditable manner than was the rest of the work; but even here liberties were taken with the time; every emphasis was unduly exaggerated, and the effect of the whole was flighy, spasmodic and cloudy. The scherzo was taken at a pace so rapid that the movement frequently became a mere jumble of sound in which the players were more concerned in getting their notes than they were in phrasing, accent or clearness. The trio was turned into a mere travesty, the pastoral character of the music completely disappearing under the tasteless and impudent treatment. The adagio was given in a drawing, colorless manner, and with a sickly, sugary sentimentality that disguised it almost beyond recognition. By this time the conductor had succeeded in making the symphony dreadfully tiresome; but this feeling was intensified by the pause that was made before the finale, in order that the singers might be brought forward and marshalled into place. The arrangement was very clumsy, and the interruption fairly cut the work in two, and destroyed the continuity that was necessary for the production of the most desirable effect. Of the wretched almost disgraceful performances of the last movement it is difficult to write with becoming reserve. It is, of course, understood that the vocal work offers nearly insuperable difficulties to the singers, and it can scarcely be expected that it shall be sung in a wholly satisfying manner. On this occasion, however, it was sung much worse than we can remember to have ever heard it sung before, and with an absence of rhythm and tunefulness that made confusion worse confounded. But if the singing was bad the work of the orchestra was no less so. Such scraping and banging, such unmeaning noise, such a lack of unity of feeling between the conductor and the performers, such muddiness and such a wild scrambling and ear-tearing cacophony as resulted, cannot easily be described. It was discreditable alike to the players and the conductor. It was made clearly evident that the latter is not equal to an interpretation of this work; that, if his reading of it is to be taken as evidence, he does not even understand it. We have so often discussed the temperamental shortcomings of the conductor, his fondness for innovating readings of standard classical works, simply for the sake of innovation; his tendency to glorify himself at the expense of the music he selects for interpretation, that we have become somewhat weary of it. We cannot, however, reflect on this puerile and inadequate reading of the Choral symphony without entering a strong word of indignant protest against it; and when we recall earlier performances of the work by this orchestra, we cannot refrain from a sigh for the past, even the past of Mr. Henschel in the days of his novitiate. We insist now, as we always have insisted, that a great composer's clearly expressed intentions are of far more importance than are the views of a conductor regarding what those intentions should have been. The choral symphony has been in existence for many years, and it has been often performed here under conductors of deserved eminence. Never before, however, has it been read in so thoroughly revolutionary a manner, or played so tastelessly as it was on this occasion. In view of the painful results, we are not inclined to believe that all the other conductors were wrong, and that the conductor in question was right. We are more inclined to believe that the work is wholly beyond and above his capacity to interpret. In any case, we trust that another such unpardonably bad reading and performance of the choral symphony may never again be heard here.

—Mr. Nikisch led his odd picked musicians at the first of probably the finest and most exclusive series of private musicales ever given in New York. Friday night, in Mrs. Havemeyer's spacious ball room. The company of subscribers, each of whom pay $100 for the series, was the most brilliant gathered this season in that city.

DECEMBER 18, 1892.

MUSICAL HAPPENINGS.

Symphony Orchestra Offers Beethoven Programme.

Second Week of "Miss Helyett" and "Ta-ra-ra"—Gilmore's Band.

Wolff-Hollman Recitals—Pianist Paderewski—Other Events.

Mr. Nikisch offered a Beethoven programme at the ninth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra, the works selected being No. 8, known as the "little symphony," and the ninth or choral symphony. In the latter composition the orchestra was assisted by the newly-organized chorus and Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, soloists.

The charming eighth symphony appeals strongly to the popular taste, for its melodic form and delicate instrumentation is simpler than in the ninth, and to an uncultivated musical ear the former work is really the more enjoyable.

The first movement is of a sweet and gentle character, which is suddenly interrupted by a sad motif breaking in upon the joyous song.

The second, allegretto scherzando, introduces a crisp dialogue, as it were, between the violins and basses, an effect whose beauty has few if any equals in orchestral writing. A dainty minuet follows and a lively finale closes the composition, a peculiar and, to many, a commonplace ending being given to the piece, as if Beethoven had finished the work in haste and without a revision.

The magnificent work of the string contingent was noticeable in this number and the "conversation" between the woodwinds, basses and violins in the second movement was not only played artistically, but its quaintness brought an involuntary smile to the face of every auditor.

The ninth, the grandest of all the master's compositions, is peculiar in being a combination of vocal and instrumental music. Prior to writing this last symphony Beethoven had written a choral fantasia in which a chorus was employed in the finale; but the ninth is on a much grander scale, and this musical poem is universally conceded to be the most magnificent expression of the great musician's genius.

The vocal finale is founded upon Schiller's "Ode to Joy," and Beethoven is said to have had the idea of writing a score from this poem in his mind for 30 years.

The symphony is a masterpiece, a combination of the gentlest emotions and powerful climaxes of the human soul. It typifies the despair which at that time had settled upon Beethoven and is a reflection of his melancholy and hopelessness.

The first movement resembles nothing previously written by the composer. It is majestic, sombre, and so curiously orchestrated as to be turbulent without being indistinct, a veritable conflict of emotions. The whole effect of this number is profoundly tragic, and many of the chords are dissonant and harsh. The scherzo which follows is genial, pleasant and melodious, and the closing adagio is a hymn of joy as pure and gladsome as musical literature can show.

The chorus is introduced by discordant phrases, and then the hymn of rejoicing deals forth.

The almost perfect "team" work of the orchestra was plainly apparent throughout this difficult composition. Some of the in-harmonious measures were ear-splitting, but as they produced the effect intended by the composer criticism is silenced.

The audacious harmony of the first movement, with its intervening cross phrases, was played with electrical effect, strings, woodwinds and brasses performing the various parts with clearness and individuality of sentiment. The grand peroration by the brasses, accompanied by the tremolo of the strings, was also beautifully rendered.

In the lighter moods of the scherzo vivace the freshness and brilliancy of the performance was marked, and the finale was played with infinite grace and dreamy expression.

The introduction to the chorus was, as written, chaotic and, as was said before, probably correctly interpreted.

The strange introduction for the double basses in the earlier part of the choral is a stumbling-block as a rule, and the rapid variation given to these instruments are almost unplayable. The men succeeded well, though, even if they did not attain the impossible.

The chorus was excellent, and sufficiently powerful to meet the demands of the composition, except when the whirlwind of dissonance furnished an accompaniment.

Miss White's soprano was clear and very true, and Mr. Meyn sang the barytone numbers very acceptably. Mr. Winch was not in perfect voice, but his artistic interpretation is not to be questioned. Miss Reiner's light contralto was pleasing, and she sang satisfactorily.

It was a grand performance of a great programme.

The next concert, Dec. 24, will be made up of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, concerto No. 2, in G minor, Tchaikowsky and overture "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo.

Notes and Items.

In the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philadelphia Academy of Music on Dec. 7, Mr. Ferruccio Busoni was the solo pianist, and his performances were thus considered by the Public Ledger:

Mr. Busoni played Liszt's second concerto in a way that stirred the audience to a decided enthusiasm. The prodigious difficulties of the composition appeared as almost simplicity itself to him, the clearness of his phrasing in the most intricate and rapid fingering was most admirable, and he had a corresponding beauty of tone and warmth of color. In response to repeated recalls he played Liszt's fantasia on "Lucrezia Borgia," with the same excellent power he had displayed on the concerto. Mr. Busoni came with much less preliminary trumpeting than other pianists have been favored with, and has made a deeper impression than most of them.

—Signorina Eugenia Castellano made a most profound impression by her playing at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week. At the former she was a most attractive picture in rose-pink, a color most becoming to her rich dark Spanish beauty.

Others agree with the painter, Eugene Delacroix: "In presence of these grand and singular productions, still obscure and perhaps destined to remain so for ever, artists, men of the profession, hesitate in pronouncing a fit judgment, but if you remember that the works of the second period of Beethoven were at first regarded as undecipherable and are now acknowledged masterpieces, I should say that he were right, even though it were against my opinion, and I should again believe that it is always safe to bet on genius." That is to say, if out of the collection of Beethoven's compositions you happen to find anything that appears disagreeable, trivial or incomprehensible, you should nevertheless bet that it is sublime, for Beethoven was a genius. Now, this is rank leetichism.

The performance Saturday evening of the first three movements of the symphony was in many respects highly creditable to the conductor and the orchestra. There was a praiseworthy attempt in the first movement to preserve the sustained pianissimo which, as played by the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory, excited the admiration of Wagner to such a degree that he preserved the memory of his wonder in his pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren." The lightness and the elasticity of the scherzo were admirably brought out by the strings, and the performance of the scherzo was all in all the feature of the evening. On the contrary, the adagio seemed devoid of genuine feeling, and the work of the wood-wind could not always be commended for its purity or precision. It may be said of the instrumental movements that a sincere attempt to realize grand effects was often crowned with success. Whether the effects of the composer are really grand—that is another question so far as the first, third and fourth movements are concerned.

The finale was a vocal failure. Of the solo singers Mr. Meyn acquitted himself bravely of his stentorian task. The others made an heroic struggle. The chorus was drowned in the waves of orchestral fury. Here and there a soprano head appeared, gasping above the billows. To judge of the character of the Boston Symphony Chorus from the performance of Saturday evening would be unfair, even if it were possible. Nor would it be just to speak in detail of the singing of Miss White or of Miss Leimer. The task that was presented to the chorus and the quartette was one that strikes terror to the stoutest singer.

The programme of the rehearsal and the concert of this week will be as follows: Symphony, A major, Mendelssohn; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G major, Tschaiakowsky; overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Miss Eugenia Castellano will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday night, the 17th inst., was listened to by one of the largest audiences ever gathered in Music Hall. The programme was: Symphony No. 8 and Symphony No. 9, Beethoven, the solos in the latter being sung by Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. H. Meyn. It was scarcely wise to precede the long Choral symphony by another symphony, to say nothing of the fact that the work selected to open the performances was by no means the most advisable one that could have been chosen to put the hearer in a proper frame of mind to enjoy the work that closed them. An overture would have been more desirable, if only for the reason that it would have left the audience fresher to listen to the great symphony. Two large symphonies, and one of them the choral, is over much for one concert, if full and unfatigued enjoyment is to be experienced. However, by this time it has become so patent that programme-making is not among the talents of the conductor of these concerts, that it is as superfluous as it is unprofitable to dwell on the subject. The performances throughout were far from satisfactory. The eighth symphony was read capricious-ly and and was played with considerable coarseness. The delightful allegretto scherzando was painfully bungled, and its delicate piquancy was smothered in the rough and ragged interpretation it received. In fact, the reading and playing of the work throughout was reprehensibly careless and misrepresenting. As for the ninth symphony, we have rarely if ever listened to so inadequate a performance of it. The conductor seemed to look on it as if it were a bit of sensationalism. The first movement was given in a more creditable manner than was the rest of the work; but even here liberties were taken with the time; every emphasis was unduly exaggerated, and the effect of the whole was high y, spasmodic and cloudy. The scherzo was taken at a pace so rapid that the movement frequently became a mere jumble of sound in which the players were more concerned in getting their notes than they were in phrasing, accent or clearness. The trio was turned into a mere travesty, the pastoral character of the music completely disappearing under the tasteless and impetuous treatment. The adagio was given in a drawing, colorless manner, and with a sickly, sugary sentimentality that disguised it almost beyond recognition. By this time the conductor had succeeded in making the symphony dreadfully tiresome; but this feeling was intensified by the pause that was made before the finale, in order that the singers might be brought forward and marshalled into place. The arrangement was very clumsy, and the interruption fairly cut the work in two, and destroyed the continuity that was necessary for the production of the most desirable effect. Of the wretched almost disgraceful performances of the last movement it is difficult to write with becoming reserve. It is, of course, understood that the vocal work offers nearly insuperable difficulties to the singers, and it can scarcely be expected that it shall be sung in a wholly satisfying manner. On this occasion, however, it was sung much worse than we can remember to have ever heard it sung before, and with an absence of rhythm and tunefulness that made confusion worse confounded. But if the singing was bad the work of the orchestra was no less so. Such scraping and banging, such unmeaning noise, such a lack of unity of feeling between the conductor and the performers, such muddiness and such a wild scrambling and ear-tearing cacophony as resulted, cannot easily be described. It was discreditable alike to the players and the conductor. It was made clearly evident that the latter is not equal to an interpretation of this work; that, if his reading of it is to be taken as evidence, he does not even understand it. We have so often discussed the temperamental shortcomings of the conductor, his fondness for innovative readings of standard classical works, simply for the sake of innovation; his tendency to glorify himself at the expense of the music he selects for interpretation, that we have become somewhat weary of it. We cannot, however, reflect on this puerile and inadequate reading of the Choral symphony without entering a strong word of indignant protest against it; and when we recall earlier performances of the work by this orchestra, we cannot refrain from a sigh for the past, even the past of Mr. Henschel in the days of his novitiate. We insist now, as we always have insisted, that a great composer's clearly expressed intentions are of far more importance than are the views of a conductor regarding what those intentions should have been. The choral symphony has been in existence for many years, and it has been often performed here under conductors of deserved eminence. Never before, however, has it been read in so thoroughly revolutionary a manner, or played so tastelessly as it was on this occasion. In view of the painful results, we are not inclined to believe that all the other conductors were wrong, and that the conductor in question was right. We are more inclined to believe that the work is wholly beyond and above his capacity to interpret. In any case, we trust that another such unpardonably bad reading and performance of the choral symphony may never again be heard here.

—Mr. Nikisch led his odd picked musicians at the first of probably the finest and most exclusive series of private musicales ever given in New York. Friday night, in Mrs. Havemeyer's spacious ball room. The company of subscribers, each of whom pay $100 for the series, was the most brilliant gathered this season in that city.

DECEMBER 18, 1892.

MUSICAL HAPPENINGS.

Symphony Orchestra Offers Beethoven Programme.

Second Week of "Miss Helyett" and "Ta-ra-ra"—Gilmore's Band.

Wolff-Hollman Recitals—Pianist Paderewski—Other Events.

Mr. Nikisch offered a Beethoven programme at the ninth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra, the works selected being No. 8, known as the "little symphony," and the ninth or choral symphony. In the latter composition the orchestra was assisted by the newly-organized chorus and Miss Priscilla White, Miss Louisa Leimer, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, soloists.

The charming eighth symphony appeals strongly to the popular taste, for its melodic form and delicate instrumentation is simpler than in the ninth, and to an uncultivated musical ear the former work is really the more enjoyable.

The first movement is of a sweet and gentle character, which is suddenly interrupted by a sad motif breaking in upon the joyous song.

The second, allegretto scherzando, introduces a crisp dialogue, as it were, between the violins and basses, an effect whose beauty has few if any equals in orchestral writing. A dainty minuet follows and a lively finale closes the composition, a peculiar and, to many, a commonplace ending being given to the piece, as if Beethoven had finished the work in haste and without a revision.

The magnificent work of the string contingent was noticeable in this number and the "conversation" between the woodwinds, basses and violins in the second movement was not only played artistically, but its quaintness brought an involuntary smile to the face of every auditor.

The ninth, the grandest of all the master's compositions, is peculiar in being a combination of vocal and instrumental music. Prior to writing this last symphony Beethoven had written a choral fantasia in which a chorus was employed in the finale; but the ninth is on a much grander scale, and this musical poem is universally conceded to be the most magnificent expression of the great musician's genius.

The vocal finale is founded upon Schiller's "Ode to Joy," and Beethoven is said to have had the idea of writing a score from this poem in his mind for 30 years.

The symphony is a masterpiece, a combination of the gentlest emotions and powerful climaxes of the human soul. It typifies the despair which at that time had settled upon Beethoven and is a reflection of his melancholy and hopelessness.

The first movement resembles nothing previously written by the composer. It is majestic, sombre, and so curiously orchestrated as to be turbulent without being indistinct, a veritable conflict of emotions. The whole effect of this number is profoundly tragic, and many of the chords are dissonant and harsh. The scherzo which follows is genial, pleasant and melodious, and the closing adagio is a hymn of joy as pure and gladsome as musical literature can show.

The chorus is introduced by discordant phrases, and then the hymn of rejoicing peals forth.

The almost perfect "team" work of the orchestra was plainly apparent throughout this difficult composition. Some of the inharmonious measures were ear-splitting, but as they produced the effect intended by the composer criticism is silenced.

The audacious harmony of the first movement, with its intervening cross phrases, was played with electrical effect, strings, woodwinds and brasses performing the various parts with clearness and individuality of sentiment. The grand peroration of the brasses, accompanied by the tremolo of the strings, was also beautifully rendered.

In the lighter moods of the scherzo vivace the freshness and brilliancy of the performance was marked, and the finale was played with infinite grace and dreamy expression.

The introduction to the chorus was, as written, chaotic, and, as was said before, probably correctly interpreted.

The strange introduction for the double basses in the earlier part of the choral is a stumbling-block as a rule, and the rapid variation given to these instruments are almost unplayable. The men succeeded well, though, even if they did not attain the impossible.

The chorus was excellent, and sufficiently powerful to meet the demands of the composition, except when the whirlwind of dissonance furnished an accompaniment.

Miss White's soprano was clear and very true, and Mr. Meyn sang the barytone numbers very acceptably. Mr. Winch was not in perfect voice, but his artistic interpretation is not to be questioned. Miss Reiner's light contralto was pleasing, and she sang satisfactorily.

It was a grand performance of a great programme.

The next concert, Dec. 24, will be made up of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, concerto No. 2, in G minor, Tschaiakowsky and overture "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo.

Notes and Items.

In the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Philadelphia Academy of Music on Dec. 7, Mr. Ferruccio Busoni was the solo pianist, and his performances were thus considered by the Public Ledger:

Mr. Busoni played Liszt's second concerto in a way that stirred the audience to a decided enthusiasm. The prodigious difficulties of the composition appeared as almost simplicity itself to him, the clearness of his phrasing in the most intricate and rapid fingering was most admirable, and he had a corresponding beauty of tone and warmth of color. In response to repeated recalls he played Liszt's fantasia on "Lucrezia Borgia," with the same excellent power he had displayed on the concerto. Mr. Busoni came with much less preliminary trumpeting than other pianists have been favored with, and has made a deeper impression than most of them.

—Signorina Eugenia Castellano made a most profound impression by her playing at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week. At the former she was a most attractive picture in rose-pink, a color most becoming to her rich dark Spanish beauty.

122
The eighth Symphony concert was the gala night of the current season. The artistic eye was gratified to see that the white fur rug had given place an Eastern rug of warm tone. During the choral portion of the Ninth Symphony, the little conductor was "built up" so high that he almost rivalled Beethoven in height, if not in genius. If the attention of the audience wandered, it had a chance to study Mrs. Apthorp, who, in a stunning ball gown of blue tulle, listened to the music, on her way to Mrs. Amory's dance, or to a beautiful girl among the contraltos, whose perfect features might put to shame the Boston belles. Mrs. Robert C. Winthrop, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Bradley, Dr. and Mrs. Ince, Miss Stackpole, Mr. William Blake, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. W. C. Lovering, Miss Lovering, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Hubbard, Mrs. Robert Grant, Mr. Theodore Chase, Mr. Thornolke, Prof. Royce, Mr. R. H. Dixey, Mr. J. M. Dorr, Miss Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Lemson, Mr. J. E. Priest, Miss Hunt and Miss Andrew were a few of those noticed in the great crush.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Just why the eighth and ninth symphonies of Beethoven should have constituted the programme for the eighth Symphony concert, the exhausted musicians and hearers at that two-hours stretch of nerve and ear, will probably never know. If the ninth seemed to grow out of the eighth in any way or to have any other relation than that of numerical and temporal sequence, one could understand such a choice; but there is no such derivation or connection. If the idea were to make a contrast, some briefer work might just as well have occupied the early part of the evening. The playing of the eighth had its excellences, but on the other hand it had a good many faults, which were chiefly due to the rough and independent playing which the graceful indefiniteness of the conductor's beat often invites. The favorite allegretto scherzando was especially disappointing in its almost lumbering heaviness; Boston has heard it better played scores of times. But the orchestra made ample amends in the first two movements of the ninth symphony, the second being as fine a bit of work as has been done this season. The third movement was smooth and serene in the strings, but there was comparatively little depth of feeling in it—as if the players were already getting tired and had all that they could do in giving the notes and the mere dynamic coloring. The last movement gave, as it almost necessarily must, but very little pleasure. One cannot help feeling about it as about the Indian idol of the story—"He is very ugly, but then he is so great!" Is it really worth while to persuade or hire singers to defy fortune and do violence to nature in attempting to sing the unsingable? We are getting a bit case-hardened to this in Wagner, where the unvocal prevails in the vocal parts, but in Beethoven it is not easy to become reconciled to it, and we are almost heretical enough to suggest that this symphony should be given without its last movement or with the vocal parts arranged in some fashion for instruments. Ideally this music is sublime and splendid—practically, it is quite the reverse and its central theme is a thin and trivial little tune. The continuity of the performance was broken and the effect deteriorated by the long delay incident upon rearranging the orchestra and getting the singers into place. Of the result, the least said is the soonest mended. The amateur chorus, split in halves by the mass of the orchestra and not guided and sustained by any positive and helpfully systematic beat, got along as best they could and fought to keep their throats above the orchestral sea, with not much more insuccess than usually befalls the singers of those pages. The solo artists did their best; but the frightfully high and exacting range of the parts was against them all. Mr. Meyn was most successful in keeping himself audible, and Miss Priscilla White's light, clear soprano tones rose distinct occasionally; Mr. W. J. Winch gave earnest and honest effort and Miss Leimer appeared to keep steadily at the contralto music.

Tonight will be played Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony and Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture, Signorina Eugenia Castellano—a new name—putting the second Tschaiowsky piano concerto between them.

The serial publication of Berlioz's writings continued in the programme-bulletin, something like eight pages being derived from him. Really this kind of thing has gone far enough (especially as the compiler in one place speaks of Berlioz as "inaccurate, as usual") and the tediousness and pedantry of the other notes, added to the monotony of the main selections, have passed beyond a joke and come to weigh heavily on the public. The long scientific foot-note, for instance, in regard to the dissonances in the ninth symphony, is utterly out of place in a programme pamphlet, and the ten pages of dogmatic essay from some laborious German about "The Two Beethovens," a pompous and long-winded dissertation, is not worth the space it occupies. An editor should learn to edit even a programme book, not according to his idiosyncracies and hobbies, but according to the tastes, wishes and aptitudes of the readers for whom it is chiefly intended.

Note.

Owing to the crowded state of our columns, the criticism of the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening last will be deferred until tomorrow's issue; also a reply to the communication of Mr. Grant Edmands regarding the Traveller's criticism of the eighth concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

A CHAPTER ON CRITICISM.

From an Admirer of the Symphony Orchestra.

Editor of the Traveller.

In reading the account of the last Symphony concert in your issue of the 19th inst, we were astonished and disgusted at the audacity and unfairness of the critic in his disparagement of orchestra, conductor, programme and composer. Indeed, scarcely anything suits him, although he does have to admit that there are some wonderful periods in the first three movements of the Ninth Symphony. If the science of musical criticism leads to such a lack of appreciation of such immortal works as Beethoven's Eighth and Ninth Symphonies, there certainly may be such a thing as too much learning in this branch.

How a music lover can fail to be uplifted in soul by such superhuman themes as those in the wonderful adagio of the latter is beyond the comprehension of an humble listener, who has not yet reached that stage where he picks flaws in every detail. The critic speaks of its wearisome monotone, made more so by the sickly, sentimental manner and slow time in which it was played. But this movement is not only great but intensely religious, and appeals in a certain degree to the religious as well as musical faculty. Without such appreciation the religious element may be regarded as sentimentality. There may be differences of opinion as to the proper tempo of this movement, but as played Saturday night, the religious element was overpowering and inspiring.

But our critic would add his name to those who would consign this symphony entire to the archives of musical failures. If this work be a failure or the product of a disordered brain, there is certainly method and melody in its madness, which cannot be said of many of our modern compositions, which struggle on through intricate themes but never reach a conclusion or tell us anything.

But the unjust attack upon conductor and orchestra should not go unchallenged. To call their playing a mere orchestral patois is simply a libel upon a matchless band of musicians led by a director with a soul as well as with musical skill.

As an attendant of the Symphony concerts for years we believe the majority of the musical portion of its patrons, both professional and amateur, will agree with us that the concert of

123
Saturday night was one of the most notable in the history of the organization.

M. GRANT EDMANDS.

Brookline, Mass., Dec. 20, 1892.

MUSICAL MENTION.

In Response to a Critic.

An admirer of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Grant Edmands, in a communication to the Traveller last Tuesday, undertook to censure me for my criticism upon the programme and performance of the 8th concert of this organization, expressing his "astonishment and disgust at the audacity and unfairness" of my critique on the occasion. He also was disturbed deeply because I spoke of the playing of the adagio of the ninth symphony as a wearisome monotone, made more so by the sickly, sentimental manner and slow time in which it was given. My estimate of the value of the ninth symphony was also distressingly obnoxious to him. But worst of all was the "unjust attack," as he designates it, upon the conductor and orchestra where my criticism referred to the playing of the orchestra, as having "fallen under the present regime to the level of an orchestral patois, above which it only occasionally rises." In order that our readers may judge of the fairness of my critique a few excerpts from the opinions of other critics are given below.

Concerning the adagio of the ninth symphony, Mr. Elson, in the Advertiser, says: "The first theme was sentimentalized in a manner that spoiled the finest part of the work. The tempo was taken too slow, and a tropical languor hung over everything in a manner that was anything but in the style of Beethoven."

Mr. Hale of the Journal says: "The adagio seemed devoid of genuine feeling and the work of the wood wind could not always be commended for its purity or precision." Concerning the playing of the eighth symphony, Mr. Hale writes: "We are all familiar with the performance of the eighth symphony by the orchestra under the present administration. To again deplore the lack of delicacy in the treatment of the allegretto, the too frequent anticipation of the climax in other movements, the tendency to tear subdued passion to tatters, is, perhaps, an unnecessary task."

Mr. Ticknor of the Beacon remarks concerning the adagio of the ninth symphony: "The third movement was smooth and serene in the strings, but there was comparatively little depth of feeling in it—as if the players were already getting tired and had all that they could do in giving the notes and the mere dynamic coloring.” And yet Mr. Edmonds’s soul was aglow with a religious emotion and stirred to its very depths by the sentimental drag with which the orchestra perverted the composer’s intention concerning the rendering of the eighth symphony. Mr. Ticknor says, “it had its excellences, but, on the other hand, it had a good many faults, which were chiefly due to the rough and independent playing which the graceful indefiniteness of the conductor’s beat often invites. The favorite allegretto scherzando was especially disappointing in its almost lumbering heaviness; Boston has heard it better played scores of times.”

124

I will add but one more quotation from the able and discriminating pen of Mr. Woolf of the Gazette. I wish his criticism entire might be printed for the edification of just such listeners as Mr. Edmonds. Mr. Woolf writes concerning the playing of the orchestra, that was so mildly referred to by the Traveller’s critic as an orchestral patois, as follows:

The eighth symphony was read capriciously and was played with considerable coarseness. The delightful allegretto scherzando was painfully bungled, and its delicate piquancy was smothered in the rough and ragged interpretation it received. In fact, the reading and playing of the work throughout was reprehensibly careless and misrepresenting. As for the ninth symphony, we have rarely if ever listened to so inadequate a performance of it. The conductor seemed to look on it as if it were a bit of sensationalism. The first movement was given in a more creditable manner than was the rest of the work; but even here liberties were taken with the time; every emphasis was unduly exaggerated, and the effect of the whole was flighty, spasmodic and cloudy. The scherzo was taken at a pace so rapid that the movement frequently became a mere jumble of sound in which the players were more concerned in getting their notes than they were in phrasing, accent or clearness. The trio was turned into a mere travesty, the pastoral character of the music completely disappearing under the tasteless and impertinent treatment.

But observe what this eminent critic has to say of the adagio, the rendering of which so completely overwhelmed Mr. Edmonds, touching his tenderest and most sensitive chord. That it had altogether a different effect upon the competent critic the following will show: “The adagio was given in a drawling, colorless manner, and with a sickly, sugary sentimentality that disguised it almost beyond recognition.”

Of the playing of the finale Mr. Woolf says:

Of the wretched, almost disgraceful, performances of the last movement it is difficult to write with becoming reserve.

Such scraping and banging, such unmeaning noise, such a lack of unity of feeling between the conductor and the performers, such muddiness and such a wild scrambling and ear-tearing cacophony as resulted, cannot easily be described. It was discreditably alike to the players and the conductor. It was made clearly evident that the latter is not equal to an interpretation of this work; that, if his reading of it is to be taken as evidence, he does not even understand it.

When the extracts given above are taken into consideration, it must be admitted by all fair-minded readers that the critic of the Traveller was quite considerate in estimating the short comings of conductor and orchestra on the occasion in question. Mr. Edmonds is welcome to his opinion, but until he can show better discrimination in judging of orchestral performances and less ignorance of the capacity of a conductor and the value of music performed, it would be better that he dispenses his opinions in private rather than through the columns of a daily newspaper.

The reason that the critic of the Traveller so sincerely desires the return of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke to the direction and control of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is because he could and would at once rehabilitate the orchestra and restore the high standard of performance formerly identical with the playing of this organization, but which under the present incumbent has fallen, as the Traveller justly says, to level of an orchestral patois. It would also create a better taste as regards orchestral playing by offering a model of refinement in contrast to the vulgarity and coarseness of performance that exists today, and thereby enable such listeners as Mr. Edmonds and his like to better judge of what is artistic and acceptable in the highest degree.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC. Continued

BEETHOVEN’S BIRTHDAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The observance of Beethoven’s birthday at the symphony concert last evening was not so wholly appropriate as it should have been made. The composer’s eighth symphony, with which the concert opened, has long been known as the “Kleine Sinfonie,” or to state the plain English of it, unfair and irreverent though it may sound, it is “the little symphony”—yet its littleness is often noble. Not all nobility is of huge proportions. Art is quality, not quantity. True enough this “little” eighth symphony is as full of life and genius, aye ’tis e’en as full of humor as though it were a poem by Holmes. It is as clear an inspiration, as light and buoyant, as bright and full of grace as anything by Mozart or Haydn. It is the shortest and while never cloying, it is the sweetest of the “Nine.” Here, too, is Beethoven’s “clock” symphony. The allegretto has a swing so pendulum-like that even by the tick, tick, tick of the accompaniment it recalls that quaint old-time piece, the andante of the “clock” symphony, by Haydn. It seems inexplicable how a work so full of melody, so fairly ear catching in its every bar, yet in the truest sense of the term a work of art, could have dated from the master’s saddest period, namely after he became deaf.

The culmination of Beethoven’s deafness was at this time; but here surely there can be found not the slightest evidence that the master did not retain, and without the slightest diminution, that genius and creative power, that incomparable capacity for taking pains, and that mastery of his tone-art, which were all Beethoven’s, aye though all save death, and e’en the world, the flesh and the devil did assault and try in vain to tear them asunder. But the handwriting was on the wall; the cold “blast of the breath of His displeasure” had been heard, and the dawn of the Day of Doom that included the ninth symphony was at hand. The master was being impelled to his ultimate goal even by his bodily constitution; the sins of the father had paid their damning visit. His deafness slowly but mercilessly separated him from mankind; he was as one banished.

When the ninth symphony was first performed in Vienna May 7, 1824, the Mass in D was also performed.

Umlauf was the conductor. Mlle. Ungher, afterwards Mme. Sabatier, sang one of the solo parts. It would have been historically appropriate of Mr. Nikisch to have reproduced the programme of this concert and to have substituted for the eighth symphony the Mass in D.

The second performance of the work was at the Philharmonic concert in London, March 21, 1825, when Mme. Caradori, Miss Goodhall, Mr. Vaughn and Mr. Phillips were the singers and Sir George Smart conducted.

Alexander Teetgen’s estimate of the choral (?) symphony would appear after all to be the correct one. True enough. Beethoven’s design for the work was colossal grand; “he wished to strive to paint what painting could not, and what sculpture could not,” but it is difficult not to believe that the pessimism of his later years worked a fatal amount of disaster. Despite what was said concerning the eighth symphony, when he came to write the “ninth” he betrayed a certain poverty of spirit. It betrayed itself in tones. True he retained his technique and manifested it in the richness of his orchestral effects, and in a flexible management of modulations, but further in what else? No one can gainsay the fact that rude, and detestable violence has been done the vocal parts of the ninth symphony, came not from the talented and perspiring singers who struggled so eagerly to accomplish the impossible last evening. Far from it. Treason and sacrilege though it may be to say as much, the culprit in chief has been and ever will be Beethoven. It is he who has been the first and among the greatest to wage war with the vocal elements of art. His vocal bass is naught but a bassoon; his tenor is a cello; his contralto, a viola; his soprano almost anything but a vox humana. Poor, rich Beethoven; yes and happy Beethoven, for he was made deaf before he heard (?) the performance of his choral symphony. In what part of this colossal piece of pessimism is the composer of Adelaide? The Eroica is in some measure responsible for it all. The form of the work is cast in much the same mould; but a heart enshrouded with gloom, an individualism permeated with despair, and what is more unfortunate for any work of art a veritable soul-cynicism that is simply garrulous in its mode of expression; all this cannot easily be mistaken, as lying at the basis of as lugubrious and prolix a symphony as ever a master penned. Truly “it was Beethoven’s hand that guided it, but not his genius.” The performance of the work last evening was creditable to the chorus; but the impossible did not happen and the effect of ensemble singing as a whole was but slightly less horrible than it has been on former occasions with the same symphony. The basses whenever an opportunity presented itself for natural vocalism gave forth an uncommonly rich and sonorous quality of tone; while the altos, tenors and sopranos were simply faithful and heroic in their attempt to master the vocal impossibilities of the score. The attempt was a dismal, dreary failure; and the verdict must again be rendered that the vocal parts of the ninth symphony are hopelessly unsingable.

125

Of the soloists Miss Priscilla White has naturally the voice of a light soprano and while creditably painstaking and energetic in her attempt to overcome the manifold difficulties of the part so unwisely assigned her she was by no means successful. Mr. William Winch and Heinrich Meyn both sang admirably, and the contralto, Miss Louisa Leimer, was excellent. Mr. Nikisch’s interpretation of the work was intensely dramatic and the dynamic suggestions of the score were quite evenly exaggerated throughout the performance.

The eighth symphony was played in a coarse and slovenly manner that was immeasurably below the standard of the orchestra’s best work.

feeling in it—as if the players were already getting tired and had all that they could do in giving the notes and the mere dynamic coloring.” And yet Mr. Edmunds’s soul was aglow with a religious emotion and stirred to its very depths by the sentimental drag with which the orchestra perverted the composer’s intention concerning the rendering of the eighth symphony. Mr. Ticknor says, “it had its excellences, but, on the other hand, it had a good many faults, which were chiefly due to the rough and independent playing which the graceful indefiniteness of the conductor’s beat often invites. The favorite allegretto scherzando was especially disappointing in its almost lumbering heaviness; Boston has heard it better played scores of times.”

I will add but one more quotation from the able and discriminating pen of Mr. Woolf of the Gazette. I wish his criticism entire might be printed for the edification of just such listeners as Mr. Edmunds. Mr. Woolf writes concerning the playing of the orchestra, that was so mildly referred to by the Traveller’s critic as an orchestral patois, as follows:

The eighth symphony was read capriciously and was played with considerable coarseness. The delightful allegretto scherzando was painfully bungled, and its delicate piquancy was smothered in the rough and ragged interpretation it received. In fact, the reading and playing of the work throughout was reprehensibly careless and misrepresenting. As for the ninth symphony, we have rarely if ever listened to so inadequate a performance of it. The conductor seemed to look on it as if it were a bit of sensationalism. The first movement was given in a more creditable manner than was the rest of the work; but even here liberties were taken with the time; every emphasis was unduly exaggerated, and the effect of the whole was flighty, spasmodic and cloudy. The scherzo was taken at a pace so rapid that the movement frequently became a mere jumble of sound in which the players were more concerned in getting their notes than they were in phrasing, accent or clearness. The trio was turned into a mere travesty, the pastoral character of the music completely disappearing under the tasteless and impertinent treatment.

But observe what this eminent critic has to say of the adagio, the rendering of which so completely overwhelmed Mr. Edmunds, touching his tenderest and most sensitive chord. That it had altogether a different effect upon the competent critic the following will show: “The adagio was given in a drawling, colorless manner, and with a sickly, sugary sentimentality that disguised it almost beyond recognition.”

Of the playing of the finale Mr. Woolf says:

Of the wretched, almost disgraceful, performances of the last movement it is difficult to write with becoming reserve.

Such scraping and banging, such unmeaning noise, such a lack of unity of feeling between the conductor and the performers, such muddiness and such a wild scrambling and ear-tearing cacophony as resulted, cannot easily be described. It was discreditable alike to the players and the conductor. It was made clearly evident that the latter is not equal to an interpretation of this work; that, if his reading of it is to be taken as evidence, he does not even understand it.

When the extracts given above are taken into consideration, it must be admitted by all fair-minded readers that the critic of the Traveller was quite considerate in estimating the short comings of conductor and orchestra on the occasion in question. Mr. Edmunds is welcome to his opinion, but until he can show better discrimination in judging of orchestral performances and less ignorance of the capacity of a conductor and the value of music performed, it would be better that he dispenses his opinions in private rather than through the columns of a daily newspaper.

The reason that the critic of the Traveller so sincerely desires the return of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke to the direction and control of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is because he could and would at once rehabilitate the orchestra and restore the high standard of performance formerly identical with the playing of this organization, but which under the present incumbent has fallen, as the Traveller justly says, to level of an orchestral patois. It would also create a better taste as regards orchestral playing by offering a model of refinement in contrast to the vulgarity and coarseness of performance that exists today, and thereby enable such listeners as Mr. Edmunds and his like to better judge of what is artistic and acceptable in the highest degree.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC.

BEETHOVEN'S BIRTHDAY AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The observance of Beethoven's birthday at the symphony concert last evening was not so wholly appropriate as it should have been made. The composer's eighth symphony, with which the concert opened, has long been known as the “Kleine Sinfonie,” or to state the plain English of it, unfair and irreverent though it may sound, it is “the little symphony”—yet its littleness is often noble. Not all nobility is of huge proportions. Art is quality, not quantity. True enough this “little” eighth symphony is as full of life and genius, aye ’tis e’en as full of humor as though it were a poem by Holmes. It is as clear an inspiration, as light and buoyant, as bright and full of grace as anything by Mozart or Haydn. It is the shortest and while never cloying, it is the sweetest of the “Nine.” Here, too, is Beethoven's “clock” symphony. The allegretto has a swing so pendulum-like that even by the tick, tick, tick of the accompaniment it recalls that quaint old-time piece, the andante of the “clock” symphony, by Haydn. It seems inexplicable how a work so full of melody, so fairly ear catching in its every bar, yet in the truest sense of the term a work of art, could have dated from the master's saddest period, namely after he became deaf.

The culmination of Beethoven's deafness was at this time; but here surely there can be found not the slightest evidence that the master did not retain, and without the slightest diminution, that genius and creative power, that incomparable capacity for taking pains, and that mastery of his tone-art, which were all Beethoven's, aye though all save death, and e’en the world, the flesh and the devil did assault and try in vain to tear them asunder. But the handwriting was on the wall; the cold “blast of the breath of His displeasure” had been heard, and the dawn of the Day of Doom that included the ninth symphony was at hand. The master was being impelled to his ultimate goal even by his bodily constitution; the sins of the father had paid their damning visit. His deafness slowly but mercilessly separated him from mankind; he was as one banished.

When the ninth symphony was first performed in Vienna May 7, 1824, the Mass in D was also performed.

Umlauf was the conductor. Mlle. Ungher, afterwards Mme. Sabatier, sang one of the solo parts. It would have been historically appropriate of Mr. Nikisch to have reproduced the programme of this concert and to have substituted for the eighth symphony the Mass in D.

The second performance of the work was at the Philharmonic concert in London, March 21, 1825, when Mme. Caradori, Miss Goodhall, Mr. Vaughn and Mr. Phillips were the singers and Sir George Smart conducted.

Alexander Teetgen's estimate of the choral (?) symphony would appear after all to be the correct one. True enough. Beethoven's design for the work was colossal grand; “he wished to strive to paint what painting could not, and what sculpture could not,” but it is difficult not to believe that the pessimism of his later years worked a fatal amount of disaster. Despite what was said concerning the eighth symphony, when he came to write the “ninth” he betrayed a certain poverty of spirit. It betrayed itself in tones. True he retained his technique and manifested it in the richness of his orchestral effects, and in a flexible management of modulations, but further in what else? No one can gainsay the fact that rude, and detestable violence has been done the vocal parts of the ninth symphony, came not from the talented and perspiring singers who struggled so eagerly to accomplish the impossible last evening. Far from it. Treason and sacrilege though it may be to say as much, the culprit in chief has been and ever will be Beethoven. It is he who has been the first and among the greatest to wage war with the vocal elements of art. His vocal bass is naught but a bassoon; his tenor is a cello; his contralto, a viola; his soprano almost anything but a vox humana. Poor, rich Beethoven; yes and happy Beethoven, for he was made deaf before he heard (?) the performance of his choral symphony. In what part of this colossal piece of pessimism is the composer of Adelaide? The Eroica is in some measure responsible for it all. The form of the work is cast in much the same mould; but a heart enshrouded with gloom, an individualism permeated with despair, and what is more unfortunate for any work of art a veritable soul-cynicism that is simply garrulous in its mode of expression; all this cannot easily be mistaken, as lying at the basis of as lugubrious and prolix a symphony as ever a master penned. Truly “it was Beethoven's hand that guided it, but not his genius.” The performance of the work last evening was creditable to the chorus; but the impossible did not happen and the effect of ensemble singing as a whole was but slightly less horrible than it has been on former occasions with the same symphony. The basses whenever an opportunity presented itself for natural vocalism gave forth an uncommonly rich and sonorous quality of tone; while the altos, tenors and sopranos were simply faithful and heroic in their attempt to master the vocal impossibilities of the score. The attempt was a dismal, dreary failure; and the verdict must again be rendered that the vocal parts of the ninth symphony are hopelessly unsingable.

Of the soloists Miss Priscilla White has naturally the voice of a light soprano and while creditably painstaking and energetic in her attempt to overcome the manifold difficulties of the part so unwisely assigned her she was by no means successful. Mr. William Winch and Heinrich Meyn both sang admirably, and the contralto, Miss Louisa Leimer, was excellent. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of the work was intensely dramatic and the dynamic suggestions of the score were quite evenly exaggerated throughout the performance.

The eighth symphony was played in a coarse and slovenly manner that was immeasurably below the standard of the orchestra's best work.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

At the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening, Mr. Nikisch introduced a novelty in the Boston Symphony chorus. The programme was quite long, and the two symphonies of Beethoven, No. 6 in F major and No. 9 in D minor, were just a little wearisome and monotonous. The reading of the various movements was generally satisfactory, the allegretto scherzando in the eighth symphony being delightfully played, with delicacy and finish, and was the gem of the evening.

The chorus showed that Mr. Nikisch has brought together a remarkably strong body of singers, capable of doing admirable work under more favorable circumstances. Saturday evening both singers and musicians were huddled together and under these disadvantages it is not strange that the work was at times unsatisfactory. There was something lacking toward making the choral feature of the programme a success. The soloists were in good voice and are worthy of high praise. Mr. Meyer sang with great spirit, his enunciation being very distinct, while his pure voice was handled in a most artistic manner. Miss Priscilla White acquitted herself most brilliantly. Her high notes were well sustained, and she created a favorable impression. Mr. Winch was also good in the numbers assigned him. Mr. Nikisch's equanimity must have been severely tested during the choral part of the ninth symphony. Perched on top of several boxes, he was called upon to exercise his greatest skill to keep his musicians together. Under many conductors his forces would have gone to pieces, but Mr. Nikisch's work has always been of such high order that one is not surprised to see him do almost impossible things. It is to be hoped that the Symphony Chorus may be heard again in connection with the Symphony Orchestra in the near future.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

EDOUARD LALO.

OVERTURE, "Le Roi d'Ys."

a) CHOPIN.

SOLI FOR PIANO.*

b) CHOPIN.

NOCTURNE in E minor. (op. posthumous).

c) MARTUCCI.

SCHERZO in B minor.

ETUDE DE CONCERT.

RICHARD WAGNER.

"WALDWEBEN" from "Siegfried."

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY. SYMPHONY, No. 4, in A major, "Italian."

- I. Allegro vivace. A major.
- II. Andante con moto. D minor.
- III. Con moto moderato. A major.
- IV. Saltarello: Presto. A minor.

SOLOIST:

SIGNORINA EUGENIA CASTELLANO.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

*The Tschaikowsky Concerto announced for today's concert is necessarily withdrawn on account of the incorrect Orchestral parts provided.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

At the eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening, Mr. Nikisch introduced a novelty in the Boston Symphony chorus. The programme was quite long, and the two symphonies of Beethoven, No. 8 in F major and No. 9 in D minor, were just a little wearisome and monotonous. The reading of the various movements was generally satisfactory, the allegretto scherzando in the eighth symphony being delightfully played, with delicacy and finish, and was the gem of the evening.

The chorus showed that Mr. Nikisch has brought together a remarkably strong body of singers, capable of doing admirable work under more favorable circumstances. Saturday evening both singers and musicians were huddled together and under these disadvantages it is not strange that the work was at times unsatisfactory. There was something lacking toward making the choral feature of the programme a success. The soloists were in good voice and are worthy of high praise. Mr. Meyer sang with great spirit, his enunciation being very distinct, while his pure voice was handled in a most artistic manner. Miss Priscilla White acquitted herself most brilliantly. Her high notes were well sustained, and she created a favorable impression. Mr. Winch was also good in the numbers assigned him. Mr. Nikisch's equanimity must have been severely tested during the choral part of the ninth symphony. Perched on top of several boxes, he was called upon to exercise his greatest skill to keep his musicians together. Under many conductors his forces would have gone to pieces, but Mr. Nikisch's work has always been of such high order that one is not surprised to see him do almost impossible things. It is to be hoped that the Symphony Chorus may be heard again in connection with the Symphony Orchestra in the near future.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

EDOUARD LALO

OVERTURE, "Le Roi d'Ys."

*) CHOPIN.

SOLI FOR PIANO.*

*) CHOPIN.

NOCTURNE in B minor. (op. posthumous)

*) MARTUCCI.

SCHERZO in B minor.

ETUDE DE CONCERT.

RICHARD WAGNER.

"WALDWEBEN" from "Siegfried."

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY. SYMPHONY, No. 4, in A major.
"Italian."

I. Allegro vivace. A major.
II. Andante con moto. D minor.
III. Con moto moderato. A major.
IV. Saltarello: Presto. A minor.

SOLOIST:

SIGNORINA EUGENIA CASTELLANO.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

*The Tschaiikowsky Concerto announced for today's concert is necessarily withdrawn on account of the incorrect Orchestral parts provided.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Nocturne, E-minor (posthumous), Chopin; Scherzo, B-minor, Chopin; Etude de Concert, Martucci; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Symphony No. 4 (Italian), Mendelssohn. It was a curious jumbling of composers; a thing of shreds and patches; almost touchingly naïve as an example of programme-making, and, on the whole, chillingly uninteresting. The soloist was Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a new comer here, with a profusion of black hair, not Paderewskially, or Hollmanically suggestive of a garden of luxuriant weeds growing wildly at random, but arranged in glossy curls. She was to have played Tschalkowsky's second concerto; but, according to the programme, that composition was withdrawn on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided, and the pieces named were substituted. They were scarcely up to the dignity of a Symphony concert. The little woman has a brilliant and facile technique, a beautiful touch, and she plays with precision, ease and fluency. The piano has evidently no difficulties of which she is not the master, and her performances were wholly admirable in their finger play. Beyond this they were not especially interesting, except, perhaps, for the graceful refinement of method she brought to bear on them. We have, however, ravaged and glutted on technique, and difficult technique has become so much easier than is easy technique, that we have ceased to wonder at it, and refuse to be comforted by it in the absence of other more intellectual essentials. The Chopin pieces were clearly and cleverly played, but they were not interpreted with any marked skill or special individuality of style, and frequently there was a confusing absence of rhythm. The artist was heard to best advantage in the Martucci selection, a severe technical exercise, bristling with exacting passages, and not unmelodious. Musically, it is not worth much; but it enabled the player to display her finger ability in its fullest development. It excited the audience to a pitch of great enthusiasm, and after two recalls, the artist responded with another brilliant finger exercise, of the same order, which again excited the audience to recall the player twice more, and to insist on another encore. This was granted, and the concert assumed the aspect of a piano recital. On this last occasion a pretty little piece of modern-antique was given with much delicacy, and the audience once more gave way to a rapture of admiration. Two encores at a symphony concert initiated an innovation which, it is to be hoped, may not serve as a precedent to be followed. This claptrap music seemed strangely out of place at these concerts; but the hearers seemed to enjoy it hugely, and the orchestra applauded it heartily, and therefore it is quite possible that we were unable to appreciate how highly proper it was. We may be, in all likelihood, fully as wide of the mark when we confess that we cannot see the necessity of going to New York for a pianist of this order, while an artist of Mr. Baermann's rank and classical tastes has not been heard at these concerts for three seasons, and while at least one other excellent home artist has not been accorded any hearing whatever, under the regime of the present conductor. The "Waldweben" was finely played by the orchestra. Not so the symphony, of which the first movement and the finale were hurried through as if there was a desire to show how fast the players could perform them without meeting with disaster. The programme for the next concert is the following odd aberration: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; Concerto for violin in D-minor, No. 4, Vieuxtemps; Symphony, B-flat, Volkmann. The soloist is to be Mr. I. Schnitzler. The programme books, by the way, continue to be industriously unedifying in point of information and ingeniously ponderous in point of style.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Soloist Eugenia Castellano.

Return of the Bostonians—"Wang"
Again at the Globe—Cyril Tyler Tonight—The Christmas "Messiah"—
Another Wagner Concert—The Wolff-Hollman Matinees—Notes.

The patrons of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra were given a very pleasant surprise last evening in the appearance of Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a pianist who made her American debut on this occasion.

The young artist may well take pride in the success attending her introduction to this country, and it is entirely safe to predict for her a brilliant career, if the triumphs of last evening's appearance may be taken as a measure of her abilities.

She comes to this country as the representative of a school little known here in recent years, for she is a player of the pianoforte, and not a mere mechanical manipulator of the key board, with a prodigious memory and a firm belief in the standard repertory of the day.

Her appearance was to have been made in the second Tschalkowsky concerto, but the incompleteness of the parts supplied the orchestra made it necessary to substitute solo numbers including Chopin's Nocturne in E minor (op.), and Scherzo in B minor and Martucci's Etude de Concert.

The signorina came before her public an utter stranger, but the entire confidence and self-possession which characterized her entrance predisposed the audience in her favor, and before she had concluded the Nocturne she was an accepted Boston favorite.

She is a master of the technique of the pianoforte, but her command of the keyboard has been made a means and not an end, and the drill incidental to the acquirement of her skill in the manipulation of the keyboard has not, as is too often the case, lessened in the least degree the development of her artistic nature.

She is a born musician, and the refinement, sentiment, and the warmth of her temperament all contribute to the effect of her playing. Her touch is delightfully clear and elastic; she shows a reserve power in the broadest passages that is surprising in a woman, and one so young especially; her tone is never forced beyond a pure musical quality, and the greatest rapidity of movement attainable is accompanied by such a clearness and accuracy that every note is given its full value.

Such playing, while showing the intelligence which appeals to the mental faculties, touches the inner nature of the music-lover and gives a sense of satisfaction which no words can describe.

Her most artistic interpretation of the Chopin numbers created a great impression upon the audience, but at the finish of the marvellously brilliant etude by her old teacher, Martucci, both her public and the orchestra found vent for their enthusiasm in the most extravagant expressions of approval, and after four recalls she added

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was: Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Nocturne, E-minor (posthumous), Chopin; Scherzo, B-minor, Chopin; Etude de Concert, Martucci; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Symphony No. 4 (Italian), Mendelssohn. It was a curious jumbling of composers; a thing of shreds and patches; almost touchingly naïve as an example of programme-making, and, on the whole, chillingly uninteresting. The soloist was Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a new comer here, with a profusion of black hair, not Paderewskially, or Hollmanically suggestive of a garden of luxuriant weeds growing wildly at random, but arranged in glossy curls. She was to have played Tchaikowsky's second concerto; but, according to the programme, that composition was withdrawn on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided, and the pieces named were substituted. They were scarcely up to the dignity of a Symphony concert. The little woman has a brilliant and facile technique, a beautiful touch, and she plays with precision, ease and fluency. The piano has evidently no difficulties of which she is not the master, and her performances were wholly admirable in their finger play. Beyond this they were not especially interesting, except, perhaps, for the graceful refinement of method she brought to bear on them. We have, however, ravaged and glutted on technique, and difficult technique has become so much easier than is easy technique, that we have ceased to wonder at it, and refuse to be comforted by it in the absence of other more intellectual essentials. The Chopin pieces were clearly and cleverly played, but they were not interpreted with any marked skill or special individuality of style, and frequently there was a confusing absence of rhythm. The artist was heard to best advantage in the Martucci selection, a severe technical exercise, bristling with exacting passages, and not unmelodious. Musically, it is not worth much; but it enabled the player to display her finger ability in its fullest development. It excited the audience to a pitch of great enthusiasm, and after two recalls, the artist responded with another brilliant finger exercise, of the same order, which again excited the audience to recall the player twice more, and to insist on another encore. This was granted, and the concert assumed the aspect of a piano recital. On this last occasion a pretty little piece of modern-antique was given with much delicacy, and the audience once more gave way to a rapture of admiration. Two encores at a symphony concert initiated an innovation which, it is to be hoped, may not serve as a precedent to be followed. This claptrap music seemed strangely out of place at these concerts; but the hearers seemed to enjoy it hugely, and the orchestra applauded it heartily, and therefore it is quite possible that we were unable to appreciate how highly proper it was. We may be, in all likelihood, fully as wide of the mark when we confess that we cannot see the necessity of going to New York for a pianist of this order, while an artist of Mr. Baermann's rank and classical tastes has not been heard at these concerts for three seasons, and while at least one other excellent home artist has not been accorded any hearing whatever, under the regime of the present conductor. The "Waldweben" was finely played by the orchestra. Not so the symphony, of which the first movement and the finale were hurried through as if there was a desire to show how fast the players could perform them without meeting with disaster. The programme for the next concert is the following odd aberration: Overture, "Renvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; Concerto for violin in D-minor, No. 4, Vieuxtemps; Symphony, B-flat, Volkmann. The soloist is to be Mr. I. Schnitzler. The programme books, by the way, continue to be industriously unedifying in point of information and ingeniously ponderous in point of style.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Soloist Eugenia Castellano.

Return of the Bostonians—"Wang"
Again at the Globe—Cyril Tyler Tonight—The Christmas "Messiah"—
Another Wagner Concert—The Wolff-Hollman Matinees—Notes.

The patrons of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra were given a very pleasant surprise last evening in the appearance of Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a pianist who made her American debut on this occasion.

The young artist may well take pride in the success attending her introduction to this country, and it is entirely safe to predict for her a brilliant career, if the triumphs of last evening's appearance may be taken as a measure of her abilities.

She comes to this country as the representative of a school little known here in recent years, for she is a player of the pianoforte, and not a mere mechanical manipulator of the key board, with a prodigious memory and a firm belief in the standard repertory of the day.

Her appearance was to have been made in the second Tchaikowsky concerto, but the incompleteness of the parts supplied the orchestra made it necessary to substitute solo numbers including Chopin's Nocturne in E minor (op.), and Scherzo in E minor and Martucci's Etude de Concert.

The signorina came before her public an utter stranger, but the entire confidence and self-possession which characterized her entrance predisposed the audience in her favor, and before she had concluded the Nocturne she was an accepted Boston favorite.

She is a master of the technique of the pianoforte, but her command of the keyboard has been made a means and not an end, and the drill incidental to the acquirement of her skill in the manipulation of the keyboard has not, as is too often the case, lessened in the least degree the development of her artistic nature.

She is a born musician, and the refinement, sentiment, and the warmth of her temperament all contribute to the effect of her playing. Her touch is delightfully clear and elastic; she shows a reserve power in the broadest passages that is surprising in a woman, and one so young especially; her tone is never forced beyond a pure musical quality, and the greatest rapidity of movement attainable is accompanied by such a clearness and accuracy that every note is given its full value.

Such playing, while showing the intelligence which appeals to the mental faculties, touches the inner nature of the music-lover and gives a sense of satisfaction which no words can describe.

Her most artistic interpretation of the Chopin numbers created a great impression upon the audience, but at the finish of the marvellously brilliant etude by her old teacher, Martucci, both her public and the orchestra found vent for their enthusiasm in the most extravagant expressions of approval, and after four recalls she added as

130
 "The score number 'Il Momento Capriccioso,' by Van Westerhout. Even this failed to satisfy the audience, now in a state of delight over the new sensation, and, following a further double recall, the signorina completed her triumphs by playing in a superb fashion a gavotte in the 16th century style by Van Westerhout. It was a great success for the signorina, and the quick recognition of the rare abilities of the new comer reflected credit upon the intelligence of the audience. Without doubt the followers of the German school will be shocked at having critical Boston indorse a player who is not bound by the laws of the classical school, but the public will gladly accept the new-comer and enjoy her playing with a sense of relief.

Mr. Nikisch gave the patrons of these concerts on this occasion a programme of great merit, and his reading of the "Italian" symphony by Mendelssohn was in keeping with his best work this season. An excellent performance of the "Roi d'Ys" overture by Lalo began the programme, and a charming interpretation of the wonderful tone picture "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," completed the evening's pleasures.

Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist of the orchestra, is to be the soloist next Saturday evening, and the programme will include Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; Vieuxtemps' concerto for violin, in D minor, No. 4, and Volkmann's symphony in B flat.

Signorina Eugenia Castellano, the pianiste, who appeared at last evening's Symphony concert, was born in Naples, Italy, the youngest daughter of five children. She is now 16 years old. Her musical education was derived from maternal tuition, her mother—Teresa Castellano Bordini—being herself an accomplished musician. Signorina Castellano completed her technical studies under Martucci and Sgambati, and lastly, Van Westerhout, for harmony and counterpoint, but she had been always notable as a musician from early childhood, and had finished a thorough collegiate music course of eight years in the space of three years' time, or from the age of 9 to 12 years, when she made the tour of the principal cities of Italy, receiving diplomas of honor from the Royal Philharmonia Academies of Bologna and Rome, with the popular judgment from crown to critic as the first pianiste of her country, as also from the great Italian critic Filippi "that the best artists would be proud to finish where Castellano began."

Ninth Symphony Concert.

The soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert was a very young and a very brilliant pianist, Signorina Eugenia Castellano. She is only 16 years of age, and in appearance is a child, but her playing is that of a mature artist, so broad and comprehensive is her method, so forceful, brilliant and finished is her technique, and so intelligent and sympathetic is her interpretation of master compositions.

She is an Italian, and received her early education from her mother, who was herself a musician of high repute. How naturally music comes to her may be inferred from the fact that she graduated in three years with high honors from a conservatory course of study which is supposed to require eight years of constant application.

She made her first public appearance in America at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, and completely captivated that usually reserved assemblage. She was recalled four times with uncommon demonstrations of enthusiasm. Her reception was even more cordial at the concert last evening.

It was intended that she should play Tschalkowsky's Concerto No. 2, but the number was necessarily withdrawn on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided.

As a substitute she played three solos, Chopin's nocturne in E minor and scherzo in B minor, and a concert study by Martucci, the master under whom Signorina Castellano has studied for the past few years.

The familiar Chopin numbers were played with marvellous expression and artistic finish. The Martucci study is a most exacting composition, bristling with difficulties which would try the skill of the most nimble of fingers. She played the most difficult passages with astonishing rapidity and in a faultless manner. She is truly a remarkable pianist, and her promised appearance here in a recital will be awaited with eager interest by Boston music lovers.

The orchestral offerings were very welcome and each was given a splendid performance under Mr. Nikisch's skilled direction. They consisted of Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's Italian symphony No. 4.

Mr. I. Schnitzler, violinist, will be the soloist at the 10th symphony rehearsal and concert, and the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Benvenuto Cellini..... Berlioz
 Concerto for violin in D minor, No. 4.. Vieuxtemps Symphony in B flat..... Volkmann

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Lalo: Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys."
 Pianoforte solos:
 Chopin: Nocturne in E minor, Opus 72 (posthumous).
 Scherzo No. 1, in B minor, Opus 20.
 Martucci: Etude de Concert.
 Wagner: "Waldweben," from "Siegfried."
 Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 4, in A major ("Italian"), Opus 90.

Miss Eugenia Castellano was the pianist.

Lalo's overture belongs distinctly to the new French school—in soul, as it does in body—and has almost all the virtues and faults of its school. It is a strong piece of coloring, with a powerfully dramatic moment now and then, the effects in it being of the physical sort mainly. At times you almost think you are listening to something very like a theme; at others that some formal thematic development is going on. But the general impression is rather formless, and, save for the evident dramatic intention, aimless. But the overture is beauty and coherence themselves compared to some other things of its school we have heard. It was grandly played.

It would not be wholly easy to say just where the musical superiority of Wagner's "Waldweben" over Lalo's "Roi d'Ys" overture lay. The "Waldweben" is, until quite near the end, wholly and frankly formless, and of thematic work there is exceedingly little in it. And yet there is a certain unassuming air about the Wagner selection that leads you to expect less than in Lalo's overture—and you seem really to get more. Then there is Wagner's genius, his strong and compelling individuality; whereas in Lalo you find little else than the style, or manner, of a school—and a pretty bad school, at that.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony was exceedingly brilliantly played. The more one hears this work (especially the first and third movements), the more is one impressed with the consummate mastery the composer shows in it. It is a marvel of beauty of form. It seems a little strange that Mendelssohn should have left this symphony, written in 1833, among his posthumous works, while he had the "Scotch" symphony published during his lifetime. One fails to see by what process of self-criticism Mendelssohn can have been led to imply such a preference for the "Scotch;" to us the "Italian" is decidedly the finer work.

Miss Castellano was announced to play the Tschalkowsky G major concerto; but, when it came to rehearsal, the orchestra parts were found to be in a condition that forbade all thoughts of giving the work. So, as time was short, it was decided that she should play three short pieces without orchestra. This young lady is said to be only sixteen; her technique, especially in respect to finger-work, is almost phenomenal, and she already plays with no little authority and style. If in the Chopin nocturne her feeling showed itself as rather immature, it was honest, straightforward and musical, and there was no aping of the doings of older folk. But in the lighter things she did positive wonders, and was so rapturously applauded by the audience that she had to play two encore pieces. Indeed the impression she made was conspicuously fine.

131

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Opus 23; Vieuxtemps, violin concerto No. 4, in D minor; Volkmann, symphony in B-flat. Mr. I. Schnitzler will be the violinist.

The Symphony Concert.

Concerning the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the eminent critic of the Advertiser, Mr. Louis C. Elson, justly remarks: "The concert of Saturday was in a large degree a piano recital set in an orchestral frame. One can best understand how the dignity of these concerts has departed when the circumstances attending this concert are taken into consideration." This means that, instead of a mature artist and a composition of just value and proportions, a youthful musician, Castellano Gentellano, a maiden of glossy locks, came forth and, after taking time to peel off her gloves, essayed two Chopin pieces, giving them in a characterless manner as far as interpretation is concerned, albeit with a clear touch and facile technique.

These were followed by the Etude of Martucci, which demanded rapid and fluent finger ability, a demand that was met by the young lady with remarkable skill. Two encores followed in the same style, for which performance this youthful digitalist was rewarded with a large bouquet and the vociferous applause of the audience. It would be unfair not to say that the pianist was earnest in her efforts and showed a delicacy and beauty in her touch, a flash of passion and a temperament not to be despised. But the effort belonged to the Salon and was not within the demands of the programmes of these concerts. A promising future, but at present immature.

It is belittling Mr. Higginson's noble beneficence to permit such combinations, and he should call a halt in this respect. The orchestral numbers were, overture to "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," Wagner, and Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony. They were played in the accustomed style of the orchestra. The symphony was hustled along on the first movement regardless of the limitations of the instruments, the running passages seesawing with each other at times. The last movement also showed the need of a conductor with a definite beat and controlling influence.

Next Saturday Mr. I. Schnitzler, a more recent member of the orchestra, will make his debut in Vieuxtemps, concerto for the violin, No. 4. Berlioz, overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," and symphony in B flat, Volkmann, will complete the programme, if the autocrat of affairs does not change his mind during the intervening time.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

At least one classically fine work made the symphony concert last evening seem as though not wholly given in vain. Happily, too, a hearing was spared of the Tschalkowsky pianoforte concerto, No. 2, in G major, and the soloist, Miss Eugenia Castellano, was thereby enabled to appear doubtless at a far worthier advantage with a judiciously chosen group of solis as follows: a Chopin, Nocturne in E minor (Op. posthumous); b Chopin, Scherzo in B minor; c Martucci, Etude de Concert. How Mendelssohn himself appreciated his own pet symphony is made evident in his letters from Italy in 1831. For example, he writes to his sisters from Rome on the 22d February, 1831: "Italian symphony is making great progress. It will be the gayest thing I have ever done, especially the last movement."

Yet at this time Mendelssohn had not found anything just right for the "adagio" that he first contemplated, and felt as he tersely expressed it that he must put it off for Naples. This adagio of Mendelssohn's fancy afterwards became an andante, which can only be described as a psychological tone poem in which is related so far as possible the aesthetic impressions the composer's visit to Naples made upon him. In fact the symphony as a whole is full of the open air, the blue sky and the Italian "Season of Blossoms" that he ever loved so much; while the finale is plainly inspired by the Carnival at Rome. The finale is described as a Saltarello, a weird yet lively Italian dance that is not so well known here as the Tarantella, from which it notably differs in quality of step: but there are three distinct themes in the finale of the Italian symphony, and the third theme is unmistakably a Tarantella.

The overture by Lalo, "Le Roy d'Ys," was, unless we greatly err, first heard here last season. It offers a capital illustration of its composer's sensuous individualism and perhaps is one of the most successful overtures of the unique class to which it belongs, having many felicitous touches in the instrumentation and all due propriety of contour.

Of the young artiste who appeared at this concert it is a pleasure to testify that her precocity is of the rarest kind. Her command of the keyboard, her phenomenal abandon, her naive unconsciousness of all technical difficulty were simply entrancing in their effect. In brief Miss Castellano is as bright and intelligent, as talented a pianist as has made a Boston debut for many a day. How temperamentally well balanced she may be as a musician can not easily be determined as the result of a single hearing, but that she is a tone-artist by intuition, that she has been masterly well taught, and that her prospects as a concert pianist are extraordinary, will not be called in question even by the most fastidious pedagogue. The orchestra played the Wagner music exquisitely, and the overture and symphony left little to be desired. The attendance at the concert included but a very meagre number of the regular patrons.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ.

OVERTURE to "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

- I. Allegro deciso con impeto. G major.
- II. Larghetto. G major.
- III. Allegro deciso con impeto. G major.

HENRI VIEUXTEMPS.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 4, in D minor, op. 31.

- I. Introduzione: Andante. D minor. Moderato. D minor.
- II. Adagio religioso. E flat major.
- III. Scherzo: Vivace. D minor. Trio: Meno mosso. D minor.
- IV. Finale marziale: Andante. D minor. Allegro. D major.

ROBERT VOLKMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat major, op. 53.

- I. Allegro vivace. B flat major.
- II. Allegretto. E flat major.
- III. Andantino. G minor.
- IV. Allegro vivace. B flat major.

SOLOIST:

MR. I. SCHNITZLER.

overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," and symphony in B flat, Volkmann, will complete the programme, if the autocrat of affairs does not change his mind during the intervening time.
WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

At least one classically fine work made the symphony concert last evening seem as though not wholly given in vain. Happily, too, a hearing was spared of the Tschalkowsky pianoforte concerto, No. 2, in G major, and the soloist, Miss Eugenia Castellano, was thereby enabled to appear doubtless at a far worthier advantage with a judiciously chosen group of solis as follows: a Chopin, Nocturne in E minor (Op. posthumous); b Chopin, Scherzo in B minor; c Martucci, Etude de Concert. How Mendelssohn himself appreciated his own pet symphony is made evident in his letters from Italy in 1831. For example, he writes to his sisters from Rome on the 22d February, 1831: "Italian symphony is making great progress. It will be the gayest thing I have ever done, especially the last movement."

Yet at this time Mendelssohn had not found anything just right for the "adagio" that he first contemplated, and felt as he tersely expressed it that he must put it off for Naples. This adagio of Mendelssohn's fancy afterwards became an andante, which can only be described as a psychological tone poem in which is related so far as possible the æsthetic impressions the composer's visit to Naples made upon him. In fact the symphony as a whole is full of the open air, the blue sky and the Italian "Season of Blossoms" that he ever loved so much; while the finale is plainly inspired by the Carnival at Rome. The finale is described as a Saltarello, a weird yet lively Italian dance that is not so well known here as the Tarantella, from which it notably differs in quality of step: but there are three distinct themes in the finale of the Italian symphony, and the third theme is unmistakably a Tarantella.

The overture by Lalo, "Le Roy d'Ys," was, unless we greatly err, first heard here last season. It offers a capital illustration of its composers' sensuous individualism and perhaps is one of the most successful overtures of the unique class to which it belongs, having many felicitous touches in the instrumentation and all due propriety of contour.

Of the young artiste who appeared at this concert it is a pleasure to testify that her precocity is of the rarest kind. Her command of the keyboard, her phenomenal abandon, her naive unconsciousness of all technical difficulty were simply entrancing in their effect. In brief Miss Castellano is as bright and intelligent, as talented a pianist as has made a Boston debut for many a day. How temperamentally well balanced she may be as a musician can not easily be determined as the result of a single hearing, but that she is a tone-artist by intuition, that she has been masterly well taught, and that her prospects as a concert pianist are extraordinary, will not be called in question even by the most fastidious pedagogue. The orchestra played the Wagner music exquisitely, and the overture and symphony left little to be desired. The attendance at the concert included but a very meagre number of the regular patrons.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ.

OVERTURE to "Benvenuto Cellini," op. 23.

- I. Allegro deciso con impeto. G major.
- II. Larghetto. G major.
- III. Allegro deciso con impeto. G major.

HENRI VIEUXTEMPS.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 4, in D minor, op. 31.

- I. Introduzione: Andante. D minor. Moderato. D minor.
- II. Adagio religioso. E flat major.
- III. Scherzo: Vivace. D minor. Trio: Meno mosso. D minor.
- IV. Finale marziale: Andante. D minor. Allegro. D major.

ROBERT VOLKMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in B flat major, op. 53.

- I. Allegro vivace. B flat major.
- II. Allegretto. E flat major.
- III. Andantino. G minor.
- IV. Allegro vivace. B flat major.

SOLOIST:

MR. I. SCHNITZLER.

JANUARY 2, 1893.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," Opus 23.
Vieuxtemps: Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor, Opus 31.

Volkmann: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat, Opus 53.
Mr. I. Schnitzler was the violinist.

The "Cellini" overture, one of Berlioz's best written and most stoutly constructed works in this form, was given an immensely brilliant and finished performance. One missed the low tones of the bass clarinet, which should serve to blend those of the ordinary clarinet with those of the four bassoons, in the grave theme in the middle of the Larghetto movement near the beginning of the overture; the omission of this instrument, to be sure, leaves no gap either in the melody or harmony, but it does make a serious change in Berlioz's coloring; this omission is of a wholly different nature from Mr. Nikisch's reducing the prescribed "four trumpets" to two at the return of this same theme in the midst of the Allegro; an examination of the score shows plainly enough that Berlioz added another pair of trumpets at this point, neither for the sake of greater strength nor of greater fulness in the harmony, but simply on account of the defective scale of the old plain trumpets for which he wrote: by taking four trumpets in different keys, and making the practicable notes of one instrument fill up the gaps in the scale of another, he could get a sufficiently complete scale to enable the four instruments to play the melody after the fashion of Russian bell-ringers—each of the four trumpets playing what notes of the melody it could, and omitting the rest. But this melody can be as well played on two (or, for matter of that, on one) of our modern chromatic instruments as on four of Berlioz's plain ones; so the omission of the extra pair of trumpets was in nowise a piece of infidelity to the score. It made no difference whatever; but leaving out the bass-clarinet did make a sensible difference. Still, our orchestra so seldom sins in this way—it being, upon the whole, very remarkable, as orchestras go, for its scrupulous fidelity to composers' specifications—that this one point should not be too much dwelt on. Here, as on several previous occasions, Mr. Nikisch showed a peculiar aptitude for entering into Berlioz's spirit, and reflecting his individual style with surpassing truthfulness. The performance had all of Berlioz's brilliancy, impetuosity and verve, yet without ever degenerating into mere noisiness; his characteristic sudden crescendos were especially admirably done.

The Volkmann B-flat symphony has been heard here before with a certain amount of relish; but it seemed last Saturday evening as if this second hearing were just once too often. The work is respectably written, it is a sufficiently blameless composition, of no overweening pretensions, but lamentably devoid of genius. It is decent mediocrity in its fullest bloom. It is both curious and dismal to note how, when the composer hits upon a really charming musical thought—as in the first phrase of the theme of the Allegretto (second movement)—he flounders about in the most constrained way to finish his theme without falling plump into Mozart or Haydn. The first phrase is simply delicious; what follows it is but a consciously awkward avoidance of plagiarism. We were rather dismayed to hear how flat and foisonless several points in this symphony sounded, which had seemed quite fascinating to us at the first hearing. That dialogue between oboe and horn in the Andantino, for instance, seemed dreary and "manufactured" as might be. The symphony is a praiseworthy work enough, but it is not in fast colors; it cannot live. The performance was admirable.

Vieuxtemps's long D minor concerto—a very "sea-serpent concerto," to use Bülow's expression—has not been heard here for some time, if we remember aright. It is a work for which one cannot but feel a certain respect; there are some admirable points in it; the way in which both solo instruments and orchestra are treated in their relation to each other is really masterly, and speaks of something artistically deeper than mere cleverness. Time was (on the first appearance of this concerto in Paris) when a critic like Berlioz could go into unfeigned raptures over it; it is well built, it is musical, there are many passages of real beauty in it, at moments it almost reaches the pitch of inspiration. But it none the less belongs distinctly and irreclaimably to a by-gone musical period; it is one of those too common things in art that become obsolete with their style, that can not outlive their manner. Its being superior to many of its contemporaries cannot save it; today it has nothing left to say to us. That it gives the performer abundant opportunity, not only for virtuosic display, but for really fine and artistic playing, goes without saying; but with all its admirable qualities, it remains cold as stone, and an artist must be a very Pygmalion to win it to life.

Mr. Schnitzler will be remembered as the young violinist who came out to this country some years ago, at the same time as Mr. Fritz Giese, to join the Mendelssohn Quintet Club. After a while he left the club and went West, whence he returns this year as one of the first violins in our Symphony Orchestra. His playing has grown with time in force, vigor and authority; he showed himself last Saturday evening as a solo player par excellence—for, although we have not heard him in concerted chamber music since his return, there are certain unmistakable traits by which the born solo player may be recognized, and he has them distinctly. It is largely a matter of temperament. There was Wilhelm Müller, the 'cellist; one of the finest, if not the finest, quartet 'cellist ever heard here; hear him in a quartet, and he seemed possessed of every artistic virtue—fine tone, technique, marked individuality of style, immense pithiness of expression. It seemed as if he could squeeze all the juice out of any musical orange. Well! in solo playing he made next to no effect at all. His was not the solo temperament. Now Mr. Schnitzler plainly has the solo temperament to a high degree; it is not only that his playing stands out easily in relief against the orchestral background, that he plays with the authority of one who knows himself in a commanding position; neither is it that he has any very marked individuality of style—for, excellent and artistic as his style is, he does not strike a very personal note in the diapason of violin playing. It is that in all he does he depends wholly and instinctively upon his own force of expression, upon his own charm, and plays not to himself, but immediately and directly to his audience. He plays with the true solo player's tact, with the solo player's inborn instinct for pleasing and subduing his audience. Now, this is a quality just as compatible with the highest and sincerest art as it is with far lower phases of performance; it is, after all, an instinct for taking things by their effective side, for making them tell, and for doing as much as possible of the business one's self. Mr. Schnitzler's playing of the concerto was admirable from beginning to end; his tone is exquisite, his phrasing natural and graceful, his sentiment warm and penetrating; his bravura is of the most brilliant. In short, he makes a valuable addition to our already rich quota of violinists. He was very warmly received, and twice recalled after the last movement.

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Härtel and Peters editions, No. 2); Bizet, suite No. 2, from the "Arlesienne;" Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72. Mme. Basta Tavary will sing two arias, the titles of which will be duly announced.

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Concert.

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday evening at the Music Hall. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," Berlioz; concerto for violin No. 4 in D minor, Vieuxtemps; and Symphony in B flat, Volkmann. Mr. I. Schnitzler was the soloist, and played the Vieuxtemps concerto in an admirable manner. He has a fine technique, a full tone, and without affectation or exaggeration executed his task in a manner that showed artistic ability and musical intelligence. He was warmly applauded and recalled.

The composition itself is one of spontaneity and skilful construction. It is also full of difficulties but the work is happily placed upon the instrument. The accompaniment was often overloud and coarse. The brilliant overture of Berlioz and the graceful and enjoyable symphony of Volkmann were played in a manner much better than the customary one of the orchestra. Next Saturday the programme will be: Symphony in D minor, Haydn; suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2 Bizet; overture, "Leonore," Beethoven. Mrs. Basta Tavary will be the vocalist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Soloist Mr. I. Schnitzler.

The Bostonians' New Opera, "The Knickerbockers"—Another "Wang" Week—Paderewski's Return—The Wagner Matinee—Nordica Operatic Concert—Last Wolff-Holm in Recital

Director Arthur Nikisch sent his last evening's audience away from the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, under his direction, in the happiest frame of mind, and one of the leading violin players of the organization, Mr. I. Schnitzler, will be apt to share in the pleasant memories of the occasion.

The programme was an eminently enjoyable one, and Mr. Schnitzler made his first appearance, and a most successful one, as soloist.

Hector Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" made the opening number, and the great French composer has never been better represented in this selection than in Mr. Nikisch's reading of it last evening. The band was re-enforced in the wind and percussion parts to meet the full demands of the score, and the several movements were brilliantly played throughout.

Mr. Schnitzler chose Vieuxtemps' concerto No. 4 in D minor, op. 31, for his debut as soloist, playing the complete work and in a most masterly fashion. He proved a thoroughly conscientious player, well equipped for all the demands of the concerto, and his success with the audience was in keeping with his merits. He commands the resources of the violin with rare skill, his playing is characterized by purity of tone, good taste and breadth of style, and his bowing is free and graceful at all times. He made an especially successful effort in the adagio in which the hymnlike theme was sung with fine expression upon the instrument, and in the brilliant finale the admirable style in which he played the sharply contrasting movement showed him to be an artist of broad and liberal training. He instantly attracted the attention of the audience and maintained his hold upon his public throughout the concerto, gaining repeated recalls as he finished his task, his associates in the orchestra joining heartily in the ovation in his honor.

Robert Volkmann's symphony No. 2, B flat major, made the final number of the evening's select ones, and the bright tuneful movements were given a most satisfactory interpretation, which called out the heartiest applause and left a very delightful impression of the final concert of 1892.

Mme. Basta Tavary is the soloist next Saturday evening, and the orchestra will play the Haydn symphony in D minor, Bizet's "Suite L'Arlesienne," No. 2, and the "Leonore No. 2," overture by Beethoven.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

AN EXCELLENT CONCERT BY THE SYMPHONY.

Berlioz Overture to Benvenuto Cellino a Typical Example of its School—The Composer's Indulgence in Experiments—Vieuxtemps's D Minor Violin Concerto Performed.

The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," which began the concert of Saturday, is a typical example of the merits and defects of its school. In the domain of art it sometimes occurs that a genius arises whose paintings are out of drawing, whose perspective and groupings are not satisfactory, but who goes down through the centuries simply because of his wonderful employment of colors. There are analogous cases in the realm of music. Reduce this glowing overture from a many-colored orchestral painting to the black and white etching of a piano-forte transcription, and it becomes a very tangled affair with tattered bits of melody leading nowhere, and spasmodic thoughts lacking true development. Nor is the process of such transcription an utterly unjust one; one can apply it in the case of Beethoven or of Wagner and have a very satisfactory residuum. Given the contrasted tone-tints of the orchestra, however, allowed to spice his dish as he pleases, and Berlioz becomes sometimes great—always interesting. He differs from Wagner, and is less powerful than him, in the matter of scoring; in the grandeur of musical ideas there can be no comparison made) chiefly in the fact that the great German always knew exactly the effect that he wanted, while Berlioz frequently indulged in mere experiment.

There are such experiments in "Benvenuto Cellini," and the trombone theme with its florid violin accompaniment (excellently played it was too) pales before a similar combination made in the overture to "Tannhaeuser." The trombones had grand work to do and played exceedingly well; but Berlioz here too constantly employs these instruments in their noisiest manner, and seems not to have grasped that effective gloom, that intensified horn tone, in soft, trombone passages, which Wagner employed, and which Mozart seems to have understood. Yet the clangor and the fierce, threatening tone of these instruments was grandly effective in the combative portions of the work, and it may be possible that the chief fault here lay in the unrestrained manner in which the entire brass band was allowed to control matters in the performance. Yet I hesitate to state this defect, for the performance, as a whole, was so noble, so full of verve, that one desires only to praise. Decidedly, if our conductor has his weak points, he has his great ones, too, and it would be difficult to equal the performance of this overture in any other American orchestra.

Mr. I. Schnitzler was the soloist, and performed Vieuxtemps' D minor violin concerto. It is one of the few worthy compositions of the Franco-Belgian school, which too often gives violin fireworks for their own pyrotechnical sake. The Adagio Religioso is full of breadth and nobility, and the concerted work of the solo violin, harp and violoncello in this movement is true music. It is unnecessary to chronicle how well the last two instruments were played. The soloist was by no means overweighted by his difficult task; if I except a slight flattening in pitch, and this but temporary and in the higher positions, the execution was all that could be demanded. The breadth of tone obtained in the G string passages of the finale, the security of the harmonics, the clear double-stopping, especially in the chromatic runs, and the brilliancy of the chief theme of the Scherzo, all call for favorable comment. The rustic character of the Trio of the Scherzo, the drone bass, and the pretty, pastoral character of the wood-wind passages, were well brought out in the orchestral work and formed a good contrast to the spirited and martial finale. The soloist was recalled with much enthusiasm, twice, by the audience, but did not accept encores as was done in the preceding concert.

The programme ended with Volkmann's B flat symphony, a work of shapely and melodious character and of conservative scoring. The musical essayists seem agreed that Volkmann drew inspiration from Schumann, much as Gade took sustenance from Mendelssohn, even to the extent of becoming a copy of his ideal, but in this case nothing of individuality is lost, and in fact the allegretto of this symphony is a nearer approach to that of Beethoven's eighth symphony (which forms the slow movement of that thoroughly playful work) than to anything in the Schumann repertoire; the whole symphony, indeed, is closely comparable (although at a respectful distance), in its brevity, its accelerated "slow movement," and its humorous and capricious touches, with the above-mentioned work of the symphonic master. The first movement is the most satisfactory, for there is excellent contrast of themes (the chief theme is bold and fiery, the second charmingly playful), and proper development. The reappearance of a theme from the first movement, in the midst of the second, gives a continuity to the work, and is a device which both Beethoven and Schumann had used in their symphonies, and Volkmann may have been indebted for the thought to either or both. This second movement was delightfully shaded, and the final appearance of the gavotte-like theme on the strings, pizzicato, with imitations on the woodwind, was the perfection of daintiness in its execution. In the andantino, which serves to introduce a less worthy finale, the excellent playing of the oboe against a well-balanced pizzicato accompaniment deserves much praise, and so does the shading of the crescendo which led gradually from the languor and melancholy of the third, into the dash and brío of the finale. The horn, too, gave its part of the dialogue with the oboe without break or blur.

But it is almost unnecessary to seek out the individual excellence where all was so well done. If the concert presented nothing of astounding depth, it gave nothing, per contra, that was weak or unworthy, and the brilliancy of the first, and the delicacy of the last number, redeemed the roughness and crudity that has marked the performance of some recently played masterpieces.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Tenth Concert, With Violinist Schnitzler as Soloist.

The symphony concert last evening was one of exceeding brevity, lasting but little over an hour. Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," a concerto for violin by Vieuxtemps and a Volkmann symphony constituted the programme.

The Berlioz number is considered as one of his finest works, combining brilliancy, lively rhythm and characteristic orchestration, notably the heavy scoring for brasses and instruments of percussion.

The overture was finely played, the work of the brasses being particularly correct and harmonious. The somewhat irregular Volkmann symphony, with its technical peculiarities, is an interesting composition, and it received a capital interpretation.

The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, who was heard in Vieuxtemps concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor.

The young artist played the long and difficult selection in a generally satisfactory manner. His execution was excellent and quite smooth, and while his intonation was not always perfect, a harshness being apparent in the lower notes of his instrument when playing forte, his staccato bowing was clear, and true and delicate.

Mr. Schnitzler plays without affectation or trickery, and with the air of a well-grounded and conscientious musician. He was warmly applauded by the auditors and his fellow-musicians for his excellent performance.

The programme for the 11th rehearsal and concert this week will be Haydn's symphony in D minor; suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2, Bizet; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mme. Basta Tavary will be the soloist.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

Mr. Nickisch had arranged an especially pleasing programme for the eleventh of the series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last Saturday evening. Mme. Basta Tavary was the soloist of the evening, and the appearance of this eminent artist is always greeted with pleasure. She was first heard in the "Letter" aria from "Don Giovanni," which she sang with her accustomed care and skill. Her second selection was from "Tannhauser," the aria for Elizabeth, and this she gave with great dramatic effect and musical ability, which called forth such hearty applause and repeated recalls that Mme. Tavary was obliged to reappear several times and acknowledge with her accustomed grace. The Suite 1, from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," is singularly rich and telling in melodious numbers and instrumental coloring, with an occasional sprightly little movement, which was very enjoyable. Joseph Haydn symphony in B flat major and Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" were well rendered by the orchestra during the evening. Next week there will be no rehearsal or concert, as the orchestra will be away on one of its tours, to return Jan. 20, when Mr. Henri Marteau, the violinist, will be the soloist, and J. Raff's symphony "Im Walde."

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme consisted of symphony in B-flat, Haydn; "Letter Aria," from "Don Juan," Mozart; Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; aria from "Tannhauser," Act 2, Scene 1, Wagner; overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mrs. Basta Tavary was the vocalist. The playing of the orchestra Saturday evening, was really the best that has taken place under the present administration. The delightful Haydn symphony was rather vigorously handled, to be sure, and the forte passages were too loud, but there was not that element of coarseness in the rendering that usually permeates the efforts of the orchestra, an element that in the playing of the classics amounts to nothing less than grossness.

Haydn and Mozart need even a more delicate touch than the fairly conservative rendering that was given the Haydn symphony on this occasion. Nevertheless it was enjoyable when it is considered how much better it was than the usual offering by the orchestra in the classics. The Bizet suite was admirably played, Mr. Strausser giving the obligato for saxophone in the first movement, in his usually artistic and satisfying manner. The overture to "Leonore," if the allegro had not been taken so rapidly, would have been a performance recalling somewhat the superb manner of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke. It is to be hoped that the orchestra will keep up to this standard, if it cannot better it, under its present conductor.

Mrs. Tavary brought all the tact and skill of a long experience to aid her in her singing of her numbers. There is always an artistic intention in this vocalist's efforts, if the result realized is not of the best, technically. She was recalled after each aria. There will be no concert next Saturday evening, but on the following Saturday evening, Jan. 21, there will be an interesting programme, presenting Mr. Henri Marteau, a young violinist, just arrived in this country, who will make his debut in New York this week. The composition that he will play at his Boston appearance is not announced.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last night opened with a brilliant and exceptionally effective performance of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, and ended with Volkmann's genial, bright and graceful symphony No. 2 in B flat, op. 53. This also was sympathetically read and delightfully played; the pretty allegretto and the tender andantino receiving especially fine treatment. The soloist was Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, who played Vieuxtemps's Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor, Op. 31, a serious work, not overlaid with virtuoso passages, dignified in style, and making its strongest demands on the finer and deeper qualities of the artistic intelligence of the performer. Mr. Schnitzler has a pure and full tone, an ample and flexible technique, large freedom and ease in bowing, and excellent taste. Not and then his intonation was slightly inaccurate but on the whole, he played well in tune. His cantabile playing is especially warm and broad, and his style is sincere, generally. The effort was commendable for its frank straightforwardness and for the excellent schooling that it evidenced. He was applauded with cordial enthusiasm, and vigorously recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, D minor Haydn; suite "L'Arlesienne," No. 2, Bizet; Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. The soloist is Mme. Basta Tavary, who will sing two arias.

THE SYMPHONY.

A PIANO RECITAL IN AN ORCHESTRAL FRAME.

Much to Praise and to Condemn—Handel's Masterpiece Given by the Handel and Haydn Society—An Auspicious Opening of the Season—Other Musical Events—Notes.

The concert of Saturday was in a large degree a piano recital, set in an orchestral frame. One can best understand how the dignity of these concerts has departed when the circumstances attending this concert are taken into consideration. The concerto originally announced (by Tschai-kowsky) was shelved "on account of the incorrect orchestral parts provided,"—according to a footnote on the programme. In its stead were given three solo works of the usual recital order. Two of these were Chopin numbers, for which it was scarcely worth importing a pianist into this city of pianists. The third was a showy display of technique that was totally out of place at a symphony concert, and was about as well fitted to precede Wagner's "Waldesweben" as a Tupper poem to precede Shakespeare. But, after all, it did not precede Wagner for an unexpected interpolation took place that must have surprised the regular symphony auditors. Recalled with considerable enthusiasm, which, judged from the technical side, was deserved, the young pianist—Miss Castellano by name,—tripped gaily back to the instrument and added another piece of virtuosity. Again applauded, she returned and gave a quaint, Gavotte-like work in the antique vein. There was some danger of her adding yet another number, but with the double encore the interpolations ceased. There may be a few who imagine that it is hypercritical to censure a young artist for readily yielding to what she conceived to be the demand of the public; to such it must be stated that there is an art (now almost a lost one) which is called "programme-making," and five piano solos, mostly of the personal display type, violated the unities terribly, and did not serve to usher in Wagner and Mendelssohn in a satisfactory manner. Public applause is not the chief factor in this matter, although the actions of the symphonic authorities might lead one to think differently, for the public applaud Patti's "Home Sweet Home" with as much fervor as "Walther's Prize Song," and were our conductor to give Gounod's "Marche Funebre d'une Marionnette" he would win more hand-clapping response than ever has been given to a Beethoven symphony. Miss Castellano deserves much praise for a brilliant technical display, but not for the aptness of her selections, or for any especial depth of feeling displayed in them, but the last quality may come with riper years, for the pianist is probably the youngest that has recently appeared at these concerts.

The overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" was most brilliantly performed. It is just the music that gives our conductor a chance to display his best points. Bold martial rhythms, tender, Goldmarkian, sensuous love-themes, and fiery trumpet fanfares, here unite to give a picture that is none too deep, but is graphic, and decidedly popular in the best sense of the word. One can pay tribute, too, to the unforced style of the writing: though there is little of novelty, there is nothing of straining. It was a spicy work, nicely performed.

Wagner's "Waldesweben" was both good and bad in its presentation. The first part was ragged, but the passages for the strings divisi were very well done and the oboe work was commendable. The passages for the Glockenspiel were not in strict time, and blurred the ensemble occasionally.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony began with a furious tempo, but the strings were able to sustain it, although the wind instruments showed occasionally that the pace was too severe for them. The introductory measures of the andante were very tattered and irregular but the viola work in the beautiful chief theme was admirable. What a theme it is to portray the true viola tone-color! It has more of the dreamy melancholy of the instrument than even the theme of Berlioz's "Childe Harold" symphony, which is considered the most typical of viola themes. In the trio of the scherzo the horns did their work without a break, but the passages could have been more delicately shaded. The Saltarello was very brilliant, and the rapid triplet figures were given, at least by the strings, with a degree of clearness that was astonishing: the dainty lightness of it all proved that the conductor appreciated the distinction between the skipping grace of the Soltarello and the vehemence of the Tarantella a distinction that is not always made. I had nearly forgotten to chronicle the cello theme in the opening overture. It was entirely excellent. But in the matter of solo work our orchestra is almost beyond cis-Atlantic competition, and every obbligato is nearly perfect. May we some day be able to say the same of every ensemble effect. LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY GIRLS.

Amy Robsart at the Rehearsal.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON ROUT.

The Fun at Music Hall Began Early—
Three Hours of Patience—Mr.
Nikisch and his Soloist—Tunes and Technique—Fiddlers' Diamonds.

I went to the Symphony rehearsal yesterday.

So did a very big contingent of Boston and the suburbs.

I went early, to see the fun.

If you don't believe thoroughly in the musical enthusiasm of the Boston girl, go early some rehearsal afternoon to Music Hall and stand around the edges of the second balcony crowd waiting in the corridor.

At noon yesterday the Symphony girls began to gather.

The doors are not open until 1:30 p. m. Mr. Nikisch does not lift his baton until 2:30.

Consider the patience of that crowd!

But if you value the wholeness of your garments and the safety of your bonnet, don't confide in it; don't insinuate yourself in its midst.

Spectacled young girls and middle-aged girls; girls chatting in couples and groups packed close; solitary girls; girls with bags and with music rolls; girls reading the Century and Harper's while they wait, wedged in; girls browsing in dog-eared volumes; girls very smart as to gowns and hats, and girls very shabby; girls rural and girls sophisticated; girls in the first stages of Richardson or Czerny and girls who have been teaching scales and five-finger exercises half a lifetime.

But all of them Symphony girls, each with a precious bit of pasteboard entitling them to admission to the second balcony where there are no seats reserved, and it is a matter of first come first served. Every one of those 466 girls yesterday meant to be first.

There was no doubt of it.

Patiently they waited.

They crowded close and closer, in a condensed mass of gowns and bonnets and breathless expectation.

At last the doors were opened.

Rushing, pushing, elbowing, prying forward by main strength, pell mell they made for the stairs; veils were torn off, skirts ripped, bonnets pulled askew, hair disordered, ribs poked, toes trodden, in the merciless onslaught; the strongest took precedence, the weakest struggled bravely after and the ticket-takers worked with both hands.

A rout of the gallery gods was not to be compared to it.

Filling Music Hall.

Into the big bare balcony they dodged by a dozen doors.

In five minutes the balcony was filled; in ten it was crowded.

It took fifty minutes to fill the first balcony, the floor and the aisles on either side, while the orchestra men filed in a desultory way into their places under the white curtained drop lights and began a melancholy prelude of squeakings and moanings in thirds and sixths, keying up fiddles and flutes.

All this time the second balconyites were rustling the yellow-backed programmes and reading Mr. Apthorp's contributions to recent musical literature.

A Picture of Nikisch.

Then a little man in black broadcloth paced in a slow, soliloquistic way across the stage.

A little man, very sleek and shiny, compact and well-tailored, his Prince Albert coat buttoned close, a rim of snowy linen dividing the black of his long locks and the black of his coat at the neck, big, big cuffs, and his face almost as white as his linen against the dark background of hair, brows and beard.

Conductor Nikisch, of course.

Beethoven in bronze looked down benignly on the flutter of bows and the flash of brasses.

Nikisch in broadcloth, on his little pedestal opposite, ran his eyes in a quick, comprehensive glance across his orchestra.

He lifted the baton.

It was Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

Over across the hall Apollo, the Greek, stood posed in marble, listening.

The Symphony girls in the second balcony were only ears and eyes.

The Symphony girls on the floor leaned forward in various attitudes of melody-drinking and rapturous expression.

Fine and clear and brilliant the music, with now a clash of cymbals and now a thread of sweet sounds that the magician wound with subtle passes about his white wand in invisible gossamers; winding, winding, with deft, dainty jugglery, until at the climax of some brilliant crescendo he flung the whole cobweb bubble of melody off into space from the tip of his baton with a single flourish of his white, supple, dexterous hands.

In the interim before the Vieuxtemps violin concerto, while the patter of applause fell like the big hurried drops of an April shower, the Symphony girls broke into chatter, especially the Symphony girls standing in the floor aisles.

"I should feel awfully if I had to stay away a Friday afternoon," commented the eye-glasses.

"Then you are here often?" asked the spectacles.

Confidences in the Aisle.

"I haven't missed a single rehearsal in three years. I used to stand over in the other aisle, but I think you can see better over here. I'd about as soon be in the upper balcony, only one has to come so early to get any kind of a seat, and here when it is a rainy day sometimes one gets a chance to sit down, and if one is early almost always for the first number so many people come late, and get shut out till the second."

Ingenious little Symphony girl, blessed be the tardy!

Then came Mr. Schnitzler with his violin.

"It's too bad his nose is so long," said the pretty girl next me, regretfully sniffing the violets on her muff.

"But he plays perfectly lovely," she added conciliatingly.

"— Nine — ten — eleven — there! I've counted a dozen diamond rings on a dozen little fingers up there, and yet they say men are not vain. Want to call attention to their white hands—it just makes me tired to see them," this spitefully from the pretty girl again.

While the orchestra began the introduction Mr. Schnitzler held his violin in front of him gingerly in one hand and bashfully proceeded to arrange his necktie with the other.

Every girl in the audience had a nervous desire to help him, he obviously was having such a hard time with it.

But just then he tucked his violin under his chin and began.

The Symphony girls couldn't have helped him here.

They leaned forward with rapt attention.

How he played!

Now it was a gentle minor andante with softly flowing numbers and flute-like flights of sound, and then a brilliant scherzo with crisp bright dancing notes.

How the Symphony girls applauded him, and how the members of the orchestra applauded, too.

But he wouldn't be encored.

He got into his own seat in the ranks of the orchestra, and after a little handshaking all around—whole-souled bonhomie that made the Symphony girl want to hug herself out of sympathy—the Volkmann symphony began.

I don't know anything about music.

Only about the sensual pleasure of sweet sounds—something like the intoxication of hasheesh perhaps.

So I listened to the Symphony girls splitting hair-breadths of technique and gushing adjectives all the way through the corridors and down the stairs, with a little smile at the musical Greek of it.

"And Paderewski will be here next week, just think!" I caught as I passed out.

Music Hall is a wonderful place.

AMY ROBSART.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Tenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The First Appearance of Mr. Schnitzler, Violinist.

Several Antidotes Against Severe Pianoforte Poisoning.

The programme of the tenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Concerto for viol. No. 4, D minor.....Vieuxtemps
Symphony, No. 2, B flat.....Volkmann

Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra, was the solo violinist of the evening. From the technical standpoint his performance deserved warm praise. He played fluently, without extravagance, with musical intelligence. It is true that occasionally, and then chiefly in bravura, he strayed from the true pitch; but in cantabile his intonation was pure and his delivery was frank. Mr. Schnitzler made a very favorable impression, and he was applauded loudly and deservedly. Whether Mr. Schnitzler, as violinist, has that great gift or rare acquirement known as temperament real or feigned is another question. He would in all probability always command respect, possibly hearty admiration. I do not think, however, that he can wind his fiddle strings around the heart or hypnotize the hearer. It is true that the music played by him does not lend itself to such interesting and dangerous experiments.

For the D minor concerto of Vieuxtemps is a serious work, dignified, and at times almost noble. Vieuxtemps himself hesitated about playing it in public, for, although it was finished in 1850, he did not produce it in any concert in Polish or Austrian city that year. Not until he was in Paris in December, 1851, did the great violinist so highly esteemed by Schumann, Berlioz and Wagner allow it to go upon a programme. On that occasion Berlioz wrote a glowing account of the performance and praised highly the work itself. "The composer is here almost jealous of the virtuoso; and yet what a brilliant task he has allotted him. * * * The ideas are spontaneous, numerous; and they are always clothed with an instrumental dress that heightens the effect. The scherzo is indeed singular; it is a difficult task for the leader of the orchestra and for the violinist to arrive at the end without a slip."

142

Vieuxtemps, by the way, was born the 17th of February, 1820, not the 20th, as stated by the programme book. Many biographers, with Fetis at the head, say the 20th. Vieuxtemps, in his autobiography, is clear that it was the 17th, and his friends Radoux and Kupperath, in their lives of the great violinist, follow his own direction.

It may be of interest now that Hollman, the cellist, has played in Boston, to listen to the opinion of Vieuxtemps concerning him. Vieuxtemps finished his first concerto for violoncello in January, 1876. Hollman sought counsel concerning the proper interpretation of the work, which was first played by Joseph Servais. It is recorded that Vieuxtemps spoke as follows concerning the former cellist: "Hollman is the Dutch cellist, with his powerful tone, his bow of steel. He plays my concerto superbly, with vigorous tone, incredible strength, but not with the magic charm of Servais. The latter is more refined, more delicate, more remarkable in expression and in variety of color. The other, however, is young, zealous, industrious, an enthusiast. * * * I could fashion him into a great antagonist, with whom it would be dangerous to contend."

The orchestra gave Saturday evening a brilliant performance of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture by Berlioz. The overture has made the swing of the pendulum. In early days it provoked such men as Louis Ehler to rhapsodical praise; and now many thoughtful French and German search in it in vain for one great musical thought, and prefer "Le Carnaval Romain," the companion piece. The believer in programme music may here find, possibly, the full expression of the mad, artistic and adventurous life of that singular genius and cut-throat, Cellini, who boasted of his descent from a Captain in the Army of Julius Caesar. The concert-goer who seeks merely amusement listens to a concert overture where there is much ado about nothing, and he may console himself with the remark of Ehler, that the mistakes of a giant are more interesting than the truisms of a dwarf.

The Volkmann Symphony is pleasing music, and it was played in a charming and sympathetic manner. The second and third movements were particularly delightful, and the solo passages of the andantino were treated con amore. It is true that the symphony is not "great" or "profound" music, but it is a pleasure to hear occasionally music that does not prescribe to itself very preposterously. "It has become the fashion to write overtures to subjects like Lear, Faust, Manfred and Hamlet—subjects that, if one be not a great man, must further in the most dangerous manner all unhealthy and improper tendencies. What demands do we not make that we may be able to enjoy in such cases, and—pardon the inversion—with what a measure of delight is not our enjoyment exacted from us? What have we to do with spiritual sprains, in which form musicians exhibit before us their soul suffering? I will openly assert that I discover more genuine intended and expressed art sense in Strauss's 'Beautiful Blue Danube' than in all the caricatures of puffed-up, modern romantic music."

The pianists are upon us. Again will there be various interpretations of Beethoven and Chopin and conflicting opinions. The concert-goer who wishes an antidote against pianoforte poisoning should first of all read diligently Louis Pagnier's treatise on "The Evil Influence of the Pianoforte on Music as an Art."

He may then find comparative relief in the following definitions and sayings, borrowed for the most part from the French.

A "pianoteuse" is a female pianist who spends her time in torturing the ears of the neighbors by playing without style, without taste and with the imperturbability of a country girl of marriageable age, a great repertoire of light music which under her untrained fingers stabs the hearers.

"The pianoforte is the gatling gun of peace." A horse that trots irregularly is said to "play the pianoforte."

"Piano-morbus" is instrumental "endemic cholera."

"Society," said Fiorentino, "appears to me to be divided into two classes: Some play the pianoforte, others submit to this."

"The pianoforte," said Riart, "is untiring and ferocious. Once open, it never shuts its lid; it is like unto the oyster."

"I do not like the pianoforte," cried an unfortunate husband, "but the hunting horn is a hundred times worse. I do not like the pianoforte, and yet I am happy; for if I loved the pianoforte, my wife would play the horn from morning to night."

"When he is at the pianoforte, you think it is Vulcan lording it over the anvil and iron and brass. He prides himself on striking with full force, and you would swear that he was forging ebony and ivory."

Alphonse Karr invented an ingenious plan. "An island should be discovered and used as a Botany Bay for all pianists and young people who have 'pianistic' hopes. Unless the pianist is of the very first rank he should not be allowed under any pretext to leave the island. When, however, he is remarkable and really wishes to give a concert he should enter Paris in a close carriage. The moment the concert is over he should be packed immediately in the same vehicle and be transported at lightning speed to the Isle of Pianofortes."

"An elephant driver once came with his animal to a country town. He advertised as follows:

"GRAND PIANOFORTE RECITAL!"

"An elephant, the first prize of the Conservatory, will play a concerto of Chopin."

"The ticket office was stormed. The hall was crowded. The elephant appeared. He touched the pianoforte with his trunk, uttered his cry, and left the stage. The public was indignant. The elephant driver spoke as follows: 'Ladies and gentlemen, please pardon us. The elephant was in the best of humor; but an unfortunate accident deprived him of his nerve. As he looked at the keys of the instrument he recognized the teeth of his mother.'

Playing the pianoforte is sometimes called by irreverent Parisians "playing dominos."

But let us not forget that it was Alphonse Karr who said: "Complaints against the pianoforte are often as noisy as the instrument itself; it is as necessary to quell the one as the other."

PHILIP HALE

MUSIC. July 1, 93

THE SYMPHONY.

Considerable of the music performed at the tenth symphony last evening was in the semi-classic vein, that is neither here nor there, so to speak; and the programme for the most part must have proven far more acceptable to many sentimental and easily pleased amateurs who regularly attend the symphony concerts, than to musicians. The concert opened admirably, however, with the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture by Berlioz. While there is a real wealth of creative power in this noble work, it is also written with the perfect ingenuousness of one who utters his own thoughts in his own way, and without stopping to think how, without the slightest affectation or straining after effect and often with the childlike grace and sweetness well-nigh cloying, with which even a child might sympathize. Furthermore, the composition is to some extent pictorial in its effect, and this experience is rendered all the more intense by the genial warmth of sentiment and masterly taste with which the orchestra coloring is applied. The members of the orchestra to a man were in their element with this work; and in glowing colors was exquisitely set forth an orchestral score which would seem as superior to praise as it is indeed incomparable. It was presented with a distinctness and fidelity that were perfect in their way—time, tune and tone being given out with a fractional nicety and exactitude such as even the Boston Symphony Orchestra seldom equals.

With the concerto for violin in D minor, op 31 by Henri Vieuxtemps came the first appearance here, as virtuoso, of Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra. The concerto is written in a fervent and impressive style, with a fine regard for the musical possibilities of the solo instrument and is most exacting in its demands on the performer. The four chief divisions of the work consist of an introduction; andante (D minor) followed by a moderato in D minor; an adagio religioso in E flat major; a scherzo, vivace (D minor) with trio, meno mosso, in the same key; and a finale marziale, which has an introductory andante in D minor, followed by an allegro in D major. In all this well-nigh kaleidoscopic variety of movement, the musical attractiveness of the work is invariably well sustained, although in the adagio religioso the inherent sentiment of the subject matter is in the trend of a super-sentimental style to which its composer is more or less prone. The scherzo is bewitchingly jocose, and the finale is as vigorous and brilliant an allegro as one would care to hear. Mr. Schnitzler was delightfully triumphant in his mastery of the technical difficulties of the concerto. He also proved himself to be a musically refined and interesting artist. His tone is at its best with such melody as appeals to the heart; and it is a clear, full, true, and sympathetic tone. With the scherzo and finale his technique was somewhat rigid, but both movements were otherwise most ably and effectively played. The artist was several times recalled, and the impression he made was, all in all considered, so highly favorable that his future appearances in this city will be heartily welcomed. It can at least be said for Volkmann's symphony in B flat major that it is a thoroughly genial and well made work, and that unlike at least two modern symphonies that have been heard this season, it is pregnant with the charm of naturalness. It is not in the music of the neglected Volkmann that one finds form twisted and tortured into any abnormal state of formality. The entire first movement of the work is so admirable and so clear in form that it would well become a symphony of more classic attainments in other ways. The allegretto is plainly modeled after the allegretto of Beethoven's symphony in F major and it also calls to mind the Russian F major quartet.

Well has Robert Volkmann been styled the Hungarian Gade. Ehler finds in the last movement a predominating happy humor. What a thoroughly comical fancy it is that we come upon shortly before the plu mosso when the double basses contrapuntalize the first theme "and with a diabolical irony as an accompaniment to the awkward three half notes." The symphony is chiefly scored for strings, the usual wood-wind, trombones and tympani, although in the middle movement the instrumental force is markedly reduced. The first performance of the work was under Director Henschel at the Boston Symphony concert of Dec. 22, 1883. The symphony was delightfully played.

Carri will give their symphony music to-morrow at 8 o'clock. It will be January 19, 1892. It will be assisted to conduct concert of at the organ; Carl which occurred last

lo. as simple and well hickering Hall last symphony in F, op. occasion, and theite for orchestra, ging of Miss Hamlin pin's "Andante," ka were thoroughly er played by Miss ence present. Theient, comprised the "In, Freddy Frobisher, R. Chapman, but nophony must surely th him. contains so many Mrs. C. M. Raymond, of color, of work-o, gave a delightful d work of art. Fifth avenue. Miss analytical program sent with her exqui-ition as a whole ie piano by Louis R. and mistiness and or from Boston, sung: Allegro as well as German as well asims seems to have mpaniment with re-st frame of mind. s dramatic, but not Mrs. Sawyer andation of soul states th William C. Carl assymphonic music. ow evening at Hard-lth predominates; tle, swiftly transi-

a glowing account of the performance and praised highly the work itself. "The composer is here almost jealous of the virtuoso; and yet what a brilliant task he has allotted him. * * * The ideas are spontaneous, numerous; and they are always clothed with an instrumental dress that heightens the effect. The scherzo is indeed singular; it is a difficult task for the leader of the orchestra and for the violinist to arrive at the end without a slip."

Vieuxtemps, by the way, was born the 17th of February, 1820, not the 20th, as stated by the programme book. Many biographers, with Fétis at the head, say the 20th. Vieuxtemps, in his autobiography, is clear that it was the 17th, and his friends Radoux and Kupperath, in their lives of the great violinist, follow his own direction.

It may be of interest now that Hollman, the cellist, has played in Boston, to listen to the opinion of Vieuxtemps concerning him. Vieuxtemps finished his first concerto for violoncello in January, 1876. Hollman sought counsel concerning the proper interpretation of the work, which was first played by Joseph Servais. It is recorded that Vieuxtemps spoke as follows concerning the former cellist: "Hollman is the Dutch cellist, with his powerful tone, his bow of steel. He plays my concerto superbly, with vigorous tone, incredible strength, but not with the magic charm of Servais. The latter is more refined, more delicate, more remarkable in expression and in variety of color. The other, however, is young, zealous, industrious, an enthusiast. * * * I could fashion him into a great antagonist, with whom it would be dangerous to contend."

The orchestra gave Saturday evening a brilliant performance of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture by Berlioz. The overture has made the swing of the pendulum. In early days it provoked such men as Louis Ehlert to rhapsodical praise; and now many thoughtful French and Germans search in it in vain for one great musical thought, and prefer "Le Carnaval Romain," the companion piece. "The believer in programme music may here find, possibly, the full expression of the mad, artistic and adventurous life of that singular genius and cut-throat, Cellini, who boasted of his descent from a Captain in the Army of Julius Caesar. The concert-goer who seeks merely amusement listens to a concert overture where there is much ado about nothing, and he may console himself with the remark of Ehlert, that the mistakes of a giant are more interesting than the truisms of a dwarf."

The Volkmann Symphony is pleasing music, and it was played in a charming and sympathetic manner. The second and third movements were particularly delightful, and the solo passages of the andantino were treated con amore. It is true that the symphony is not "great" or "profound" music, but it is a pleasure to hear occasionally music that does not prescribe to itself very preposterously. "It has become the fashion to write overtures to subjects like Lear, Faust, Manfred and Hamlet—subjects that, if one be not a great man, must further in the most dangerous manner all unhealthy and improper tendencies. What demands do we not make that we may be able to enjoy in such cases, and—pardon the inversion—with what a measure of delight is not our enjoyment exacted from us? What have we to do with spiritual sprains, in which form musicians exhibit before us their soul suffering? I will openly assert that I discover more genuine intended and expressed art sense in Strauss's 'Beautiful Blue Danube' than in all the caricatures of puffed-up, modern romantic music."

The pianists are upon us. Again will there be various interpretations of Beethoven and Chopin and conflicting opinions. The concert-goer who wishes an antidote against pianoforte poisoning should first of all read diligently Louis Pagnier's treatise on "The Evil Influence of the Pianoforte on Music as an Art."

He may then find comparative relief in the following definitions and sayings, borrowed for the most part from the French.

A "pianoteuse" is a female pianist who spends her time in torturing the ears of the neighbors by playing without style, without taste and with the imperturbability of a country girl of marriageable age, a great repertoire of light music which under her untrained fingers stabs the hearers.

"The pianoforte is the gatling gun of peace."

A horse that trots irregularly is said to "play the piano orte."

"Piano-morbus" is instrumental "endemic cholera."

"Society," said Fiorentino, "appears to me to be divided into two classes: Some play the pianoforte, others submit to this."

"The pianoforte," said Stuart, "is untiring and ferocious. Once open, it never shuts its lid; it is like unto the oyster."

"I do not like the pianoforte," cried an unfortunate husband, "but the aunting horn is a hundred times worse. I do not like the pianoforte, and yet I am happy; for if I loved the pianoforte, my wife would play the horn from morning to night."

"When he is at the pianoforte, you think it is Vulcan tordng it over the anvil and iron and brass. He prides himself on striking with full force, and you would swear that he was forging ebony and ivory."

Alphonse Karr invented an ingenious plan. "An island should be discovered and used as a Botany Bay for all pianists and young people who have 'pianistic' hopes. Unless the pianist is of the very first rank he should not be allowed under any pretext to leave the island. When, however, he is remarkable and really wishes to give a concert he should enter Paris in a close carriage. The moment the concert is over he should be packed immediately in the same vehicle and be transported at lightning speed to the Isle of Pianofortes."

"An elephant driver once came with his animal to a country town. He advertised as follows:

"GRAND PIANOFORTE RECITAL!
"An elephant, the first prize of the Conservatory, will play a concerto of Chopin."

"The ticket office was stormed. The hall was crowded. The elephant appeared. He touched the pianoforte with his trunk, uttered his cry, and left the stage. The public was indignant. The elephant driver spoke as follows: 'Ladies and gentlemen, please pardon us. The elephant was in the best of humor; but an unfortunate accident deprived him of his nerve. As he looked at the keys of the instrument he recognized the teeth of his mother.'

Playing the pianoforte is sometimes called by irreverent Parisians "playing dominoes."

But let us not forget that it was Alphonse Karr who said: "Complaints against the pianoforte are often as noisy as the instrument itself; it is as necessary to quell the one as the other."

PHILIP HALE

MUSIC. Jan 193

THE SYMPHONY.

Considerable of the music performed at the tenth symphony last evening was in the semi-classic vein, that is neither here nor there, so to speak; and the programme for the most part must have proven far more acceptable to many sentimental and easily pleased amateurs who regularly attend the symphony concerts, than to musicians. The concert opened admirably, however, with the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture by Berlioz. While there is a real wealth of creative power in this noble work, it is also written with the perfect ingenuousness of one who utters his own thoughts in his own way, and without stopping to think how, without the slightest affectation or straining after effect and often with the childlike grace and sweetness well-nigh cloying, with which even a child might sympathize. Furthermore, the composition is to some extent pictorial in its effect, and this experience is rendered all the more intense by the genial warmth of sentiment and masterly taste with which the orchestra coloring is applied. The members of the orchestra to a man were in their element with this work; and in glowing colors was exquisitely set forth an orchestral score which would seem as superior to praise as it is indeed incomparable. It was presented with a distinctness and fidelity that were perfect in their way—time, tune and tone being given out with a fractional nicety and exactitude such as even the Boston Symphony Orchestra seldom equals.

With the concerto for violin in D minor, op 31 by Henri Vieuxtemps came the first appearance here, as virtuoso, of Mr. I. Schnitzler, a member of the orchestra. The concerto is written in a fervent and impressive style, with a fine regard for the musical possibilities of the solo instrument and is most exacting in its demands on the performer. The four chief divisions of the work consist of an introduction; andante (D minor) followed by a moderato in D minor; an adagio religioso in E flat major; a scherzo, vivace (D minor) with trio, meno mosso, in the same key; and a finale marziale, which has an introductory andante in D minor, followed by an allegro in D major. In all this well-nigh kaleidoscopic variety of movement, the musical attractiveness of the work is invariably well sustained, although in the adagio religioso the inherent sentiment of the subject matter is in the trend of a super-sentimental style to which its composer is more or less prone. The scherzo is bewitchingly jocose, and the finale is as vigorous and brilliant as an allegro as one would care to hear. Mr. Schnitzler was delightfully triumphant in his mastery of the technical difficulties of the concerto. He also proved himself to be a musically refined and interesting artist. His tone is at its best with such melody as appeals to the heart; and it is a clear, full, true, and sympathetic tone. With the scherzo and finale his technique was somewhat rigid, but both movements were otherwise most ably and effectively played. The artist was several times recalled, and the impression he made was, all in all considered, so highly favorable that his future appearances in this city will be heartily welcomed. It can at least be said for Volkmann's symphony in B flat major that it is a thoroughly genial and well made work, and that unlike at least two modern symphonies that have been heard this season, it is pregnant with the charm of naturalness. It is not in the music of the neglected Volkmann that one finds form twisted and tortured into any abnormal state of formality. The entire first movement of the work is so admirable and so clear in form that it would well become a symphony of more classic attainments in other ways. The allegretto is plainly modeled after the allegretto of Beethoven's symphony in F major and it also calls to mind the Russian F major quartet.

Well has Robert Volkmann been styled the Hungarian Gade. Ehlert finds in the last movement a predominating happy humor. What a thoroughly comical fancy it is that we come upon shortly before the piu mosso when the double basses contrapuntalize the first theme "and with a diabolical irony as an accompaniment to the awkward three half notes." The symphony is chiefly scored for strings, the usual wood-wind, trombones and tympani, although in the middle movement the instrumental force is markedly reduced. The first performance of the work was under Director Henschel at the Boston Symphony concert of Dec. 22, 1883. The symphony was delightfully played.

Carri will give their symphony music to-morrow at will be January 19, will be assisted to cond concert of at the organ; Carl which occurred last as simple and well hickering Hall last symphony in F, op. occasion, and theite for orchestra, ging of Miss Hamlin pin's "Andante," ka were thoroughlyer played by Miss ence present. Theent, comprised the Freddy Frobisher, R. Chapman, but nophony must surely th him. contains so many Mrs. C. M. Raymond, of color, of work-o, gave a delightfuld work of art.

Fifth avenue. Miss analytical program sent with her exqui-ition as a whole ie piano by Louis R. and mistiness and or from Boston, sung: Allegro as well as German as well asims seems to have mpaniment with re-st frame of mind.

s dramatic, but not Mrs. Sawyer andation of soul states th William C. Carl assymphonic music. ow evening at Hard-lth predominates; tle, swiftly transi-choirmaster of the ynote throughout avenue and Forty-t and even fiery. an recital last Satur-strumentation, is illiams. Mr. Parker, rier than much of s, as well as a com-confessed that his ssohn's sonata in F and crass, but it from Widor's second an epic with the nd wedding song of if a piquant com-

142
A glowing account of the performance and praised highly the work itself. "The composer is here almost jealous of the virtuoso; and yet what a brilliant task he has allotted him. * * * The ideas are spontaneous, numerous; and they are always clothed with an instrumental dress that heightens the effect. The scherzo is indeed singular; it is a difficult task for the leader of the orchestra and for the violinist to arrive at the end without a slip."

Vieuxtemps, by the way, was born the 17th of February, 1820, not the 20th, as stated by the programme book. Many biographers, with Fetis at the head, say the 20th. Vieuxtemps, in his autobiography, is clear that it was the 17th, and his friends Radoux and Kupperath, in their lives of the great violinist, follow his own direction.

It may be of interest now that Hollman, the cellist, has played in Boston, to listen to the opinion of Vieuxtemps concerning him. Vieuxtemps finished his first concerto for violoncello in January, 1876. Hollman sought counsel concerning the proper interpretation of the work, which was first played by Joseph Servais. It is recorded that Vieuxtemps spoke as follows concerning the former cellist: "Hollman is the Dutch cellist, with his powerful tone, his bow of steel. He plays my concerto superbly, with vigorous tone, incredible strength, but not with the magic charm of Servais. The latter is more refined, more delicate, more remarkable in expression and in variety of color. The other, however, is young, zealous, industrious, an enthusiast. * * * I could fashion him into a great antagonist, with whom it would be dangerous to contend."

The orchestra gave Saturday evening a brilliant performance of the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture by Berlioz. The overture has made the swing of the pendulum. In early days it provoked such men as Louis Ehler to rhapsodical praise; and now many thoughtful French and German search in it in vain for one great musical thought, and prefer "Le Carnaval Romain," the companion piece. The believer in programme music may here find, possibly, the full expression of the mad, artistic and adventurous life of that singular genius and cut-throat, Cellini, who boasted of his descent from a Captain in the Army of Julius Caesar. The concert-goer who seeks merely amusement listens to a concert overture where there is much ado about nothing, and he may console himself with the remark of Ehler, that the mistakes of a giant are more interesting than the truisms of a dwarf.

The Volkmann Symphony is pleasing music, and it was played in a charming and sympathetic manner. The second and third movements were particularly delightful, and the solo passages of the andantino were treated con amore. It is true that the symphony is not "great" or "profound" music, but it is a pleasure to hear occasionally music that does not prescribe to itself very preposterously. "It has become the fashion to write overtures to subjects like Lear, Faust, Manfred and Hamlet—subjects that, if one be not a great man, must further in the most dangerous manner all unhealthy and improper tendencies. What demands do we not make that we may be able to enjoy in such cases, and—pardon the inversion—with what a measure of delight is not our enjoyment exacted from us? What have we to do with spiritual sprains, in which form musicians exhibit before us their soul suffering? I will openly assert that I discover more genuine intended and expressed art sense in Strauss' 'Beautiful Blue Danube' than in all the caricatures of puffed-up, modern romantic music."

The pianists are upon us. Again will there be various interpretations of Beethoven and Chopin and conflicting opinions. The concert-goer who wishes an antidote against pianoforte poisoning should first of all read diligently Louis Pagnerre's treatise on "The Evil Influence of the Pianoforte on Music as an Art."

He may then find comparative relief in the following definitions and sayings, borrowed for the most part from the French.

A "pianoteuse" is a female pianist who spends her time in torturing the ears of the neighbors by playing without style, without taste and with the imperturbability of a country girl of marriageable age, a great repertoire of light music which under her untrained fingers stabs the hearers.

"The pianoforte is the gatling gun of peace." A horse that trots irregularly is said to "play the piano forte."

"Piano-morous" is instrumental "endemic cholera."

"Society," said Fiorentino, "appears to me to be divided into two classes: Some play the pianoforte, others submit to this."

"The pianoforte," said Duart, "is untiring and ferocious. Once open, it never shuts its lid; it is like unto the oyster."

"I do not like the pianoforte," cried an unfortunate husband, "but the hunting horn is a hundred times worse. I do not like the pianoforte, and yet I am happy; for if I loved the pianoforte, my wife would play the horn from morning to night."

"When he is at the pianoforte, you think it is Vulcan lording it over the anvil and iron and brass. He prides himself on striking with full force, and you would swear that he was forging ebony and ivory."

Alphonse Karr invented an ingenious plan. "An island should be discovered and used as a Botany Bay for all pianists and young people who have 'pianistic' hopes. Unless the pianist is of the very first rank he should not be allowed under any pretext to leave the island. When, however, he is remarkable and really wishes to give a concert he should enter Paris in a close carriage. The moment the concert is over he should be packed immediately in the same vehicle and be transported at lightning speed to the Isle of Pianofortes."

"An elephant driver once came with his animal to a country town. He advertised as follows:

"GRAND PIANOFORTE RECITAL!
"An elephant, the first prize of the Conservatory, will play a concerto of Chopin."

"The ticket office was stormed. The hall was crowded. The elephant appeared. He touched the pianoforte with his trunk, uttered his cry, and left the stage. The public was indignant. The elephant driver spoke as follows: 'Ladies and gentlemen, please pardon us. The elephant was in the best of humor; but an unfortunate accident deprived him of his nerve. As he looked at the keys of the instrument he recognized the teeth of his mother.'

Playing the pianoforte is sometimes called by irreverent Parisians "playing dominoes."

But let us not forget that it was Alphonse Karr who said: "Complaints against the pianoforte are often as noisy as the instrument itself; it is as necessary to quell the one as the other."

PHILIP HALE

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

Considerable of the music performed at the tenth symphony last evening was in the semi-classic vein, that is neither here nor there, so to speak; and the programme for the most part must have proven far more acceptable to many sentimental and easily pleased amateurs who regularly attend the symphony concerts, than to musicians. The concert opened admirably, however, with the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture by Berlioz. While there is a real wealth of creative power in this noble work, it is also written with the perfect ingenuousness of one who utters his own thoughts in his own way, and without stopping to think how, without the slightest affectation or straining after effect and often with the childlike grace and sweetness well-nigh cloying, with which even a child might sympathize. Furthermore, the composition is to some extent pictorial in its effect, and this experience is rendered all the more intense by the genial warmth of a masterly taste with which the orchestra is applied. The members of the orchestra were in their element with this glowing colors was exquisitely set off by the orchestral score which would seem a praise as it is indeed incomparable. Presented with a distinctness and fidelity perfect in their way—time, tune and given out with a fractional nicety and such as even the Boston Symphony seldom equals.

With the concerto for violin in D by Henri Vieuxtemps came the first here, as virtuoso, of Mr. I. Schnitzler of the orchestra. The concerto is a fervent and impressive style, with the musical possibilities of the solo instrument and is most in its demands on the performer.

Four chief divisions of the work composed the programme: andante (D minor) in D major; a scherzo, vivace (D minor) in D major; a scherzo, vivace (D minor) in D major; and a scherzo, vivace (D minor) in D major.

Andante, which has an introductory and minor, followed by an allegro in D major, well nigh kaleidoscopic of movement, the music is givenness of the work is well sustained, although in the andante inherent sentiment of the subject matter of a super-sentimental style to the composer is mere or less prone. The scherzo is joyous, and the finale is as vigorous as an allegro as one would care.

Schnitzler was delightfully triumphant in the mastery of the technical difficulties of the concerto. He also proved himself musically refined and interested in his tone is at its best with such melody of the heart; and it is a clear, sympathetic tone. With the scherzo technique was somewhat rigid, but the movements were otherwise most ably played. The artist was several times applauded, so highly favorable that his performance in this city will be heartily remembered.

It can at least be said for Volkmann's B flat major that it is a thorough well made work, and that unlike at least two modern symphonies that have been heard this season, it is pregnant with the charm of naturalness. It is not in the music of the neglected Volkmann that one finds form twisted and tortured into any abnormal state of formality. The entire first movement of the work is so admirable and so clear in form that it would well become a symphony of more classic attainments in other ways. The allegretto is plainly modeled after the allegretto of Beethoven's symphony in F major and it also calls to mind the Russian F major quartet.

Well has Robert Volkmann been styled the Hungarian Gade. Ehler finds in the last movement a predominating happy humor. What a thoroughly comical fancy it is that we come upon shortly before the plu musso when the double basses contrapuntalize the first theme "and with a diabolical irony as an accompaniment to the awkward three half notes." The symphony is chiefly scored for strings, the usual wood-wind, trombones and tympani, although in the middle movement the instrumental force is markedly reduced. The first performance of the work was under Director Henschel at the Boston Symphony concert of Dec. 22, 1883. The symphony was delightfully played.

The Second Boston Symphony Concert.

THE program scheme of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which occurred last Thursday evening at Chickering Hall, was simple and well contrasted. Johannes Brahms' third symphony in F, op. 90, Dr. Antonin Dvorák's D major suite for orchestra, Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch" and Chopin's "Andante," "Spianato" and "Polonaise," the latter played by Miss Suza Doane with orchestral accompaniment, comprised the evening's entertainment.

The performance of the Brahms' symphony must surely have appealed to his enemies, for it contains so many beauties—beauties of mood, beauties of color, of workmanship; in a word, a genuinely inspired work of art.

Mr. W. F. Apthorpe's remarks in the analytical program would lead one to expect a composition as a whole sombre in its savagery, full of gloom and mistiness and soul strife. As if to prove that he can be Allegro as well as Penseroso, Ariel as well as Caliban, Brahms seems to have composed this symphony in the happiest frame of mind. There is much that is tragic, much that is dramatic, but not the gruesome, morbidly theatric exploitation of soul states that one often encounters in modern symphonic music. Health, magnificent, manly, mental health predominates; and color there is, mood coloring, subtle, swiftly transitory, darkling at times, but the basic keynote throughout is pitched high, blithe, sweetly eloquent and even fiery. The color scheme, as far as the instrumentation, is brighter, less turbid and generally clearer than much of Brahms' orchestral work. It must be confessed that his orchestral speech at times is stammering and crass, but it very often suits his moods. Why frame an epic with the airy trellises, the ornamental curvings of a piquant comedy? Brahms is Brahms, and we have to accept him and his shortcomings. The envelope is rough, even repelling, but the kernel is always sound and sweet. He reminds one in this particular of Robert Browning.

144

The orchestral garb of the beautiful third movement, the allegretto in C minor, seems to fit the orchestra better than does the instrumentation of the other three movements; upon its quaint, pathetic grace one cannot dwell sufficiently. It is a musical gem of the first water and is accorded a better setting than most of Brahms's precious musical stones. The symphony was played by Mr. Nikisch with a clear sympathetic fire, that burned brightly to the close. It was not the most favorable night for music, but the orchestra has seldom played better here. Dr. Dvorák's suite was extremely interesting in character and invention. It is built on characteristic dance motives, and its composer's ingenuity and deftness, even where the musical idea is slight, is extraordinary. Dvorák is the landscape painter among modern composers. He has genuine feeling for out of door scenes, he is breezy, sane, and his Bohemian blood sparkles and surges through this suite. The bagpipe drone of the præludium, the melancholy grace of the polka, the delightful measures of the menuet, the poetry of the romanza, admirable in its scoring for the woodwind, and the furiant finale, with its tangle of cross rhythms—bold, impetuous, galloping across country—and its closing chords, religious in color (Dr. Dvorák is a good Roman Catholic), all these made the suite delightfully good music.

It also was superbly played, though the tempi were open to criticism.

One wishes that Miss Suza Doane, who was a Reinecke pupil, could, in her piano playing have come up to the standard of the evening. But she is young, quite talented, and was very nervous, hence her playing sounded angular, awkward and constrained. She possesses a fluent technic, an incisive touch (often forced and hard), and has evidently been well schooled.

She was received well, and for encore played Liszt's setting of Mendelssohn's "Auf flueglen des gesanges" in anything but a poetic manner.

The evening closed with a brilliant performance of Wagner's pompous march, in which the orchestra was splendidly sonorous and satisfying. The third concert takes place January 12.

145
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

JOSEPH HAYDN. SYMPHONY in B flat major (Breitkopf & Haertel. No. 12).
I. Largo. B flat major. Allegro vivace. B flat major.
II. Adagio. F major.
III. Menuetto: Allegro. B flat major.
Trio: The same tempo. B flat major.
IV. Finale: presto. B flat major.

WOLFGANG AMADEUS MOZART. "LETTER"-ARIA from "Don Giovanni," Act II., Scene 13.
DONNA ANNA: (Recitative.) "Crudele? Ah no, mio bene!"
(Rondo: Larghetto). "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio."
(Allegretto moderato). "Forse un giorno il cielo ancora."

GEORGES BIZET. SUITE No. 1 from "L'Arlesienne."
I. Prelude: Allegro deciso (tempo di marcia). C minor.
II. Minuetto: Allegro giocoso. C minor.
III. Adagietto: Adagio. F major.
IV. Carillon: Allegretto moderato. E. major.

RICHARD WAGNER. ARIA from "Tanhaeuser," Act. II., Scene 1.
ELISABETH: (Allegro). "Dich, theure Halle, gruess' ich wieder."

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.
Adagio. C major. Allegro. C major.

SOLOIST:

MME. BASTA TAVARY.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphony, B-flat (B. & H. No. 12), Haydn; the "Letter" aria from Don Juan, Mozart; Suite No. 1, "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; Air, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhauser," Wagner; and Overture "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Madame Basta Tavary was the soloist. The Symphony was beautifully played throughout, though it was read in a somewhat too modern vein, and the first allegro was taken at a pace so rapid that its piquant grace was somewhat marred, and a vigor was imparted to the movement that misrepresented it. The charming Bizet suite was delightfully given in both the reading and the performance. The emphasis throughout was admirable and the coloring was rich and brilliant. Madame Tavary sang the Mozart aria with the ease and freedom of an experienced artist, though in a dry and perfunctory manner. The recitative would have been more effective had it been given with greater breadth. Some liberties were taken with the last movement, that cannot be approved. Mozart needs no gratuitous ornamentation, and the run that was interpolated and the high note that was given at the close could well have been spared. If the composer had wanted them he would have written them down. This "improving" a great master, especially when that master is a Mozart, assumes, very much, the aspect of an unpardonable impertinence. The "Tannhauser" air was spiritedly sung, though with an excess of sentimentality in the opening recitative. The artist was recalled twice after each aria. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff, and a violin concerto. The soloist will be Monsieur Henri Marteau.

BASTA-TAVARY.

Journal
She Will Sing This Evening
in Music Hall.

A Sketch of a Woman of Marked
Versatility.

From Cologne to Munich—From London to New York.

The outside of the throat of a singer is more interesting to many than the tones that issue and create waves of air. Tamagno washing his socks aroused as much attention as Tamagno the slayer of Desdemona. I am told that there are people who awake at dead of night and wonder whether Paderewski wears a wig. It is the old story. Boswell is read and "The Rambler" is forgotten. The documents consulted most curiously are "human documents," and there was such cultivation of curiosity before the Goncourt Brothers invented the phrase.

The singer baffles curiosity while she excites it. The field of her triumphs is seen through the colored glass of her imagination. She knows not disaster. She is always the favorite pupil of her master. But in her answers to definite questions she defies chronology, and mocks time and space.

When a singer appears and applause rends the air questions follow the applause. "Where was she born? When was she born?" And often, alas, "Why was she born?" would be a more appropriate question. "Has she a mother?" This is a needless inquiry. A well-conducted singer always has a mother as well as jewels. The mother is devoted to her, lives for her, protects her, but in many cases she does not look like her. And so it was in Venice when Benedetto Marcello threw his vitriolic satire in the face of the voluptuous queens of the operatic stage.

Mrs. Basta-Tavary sings in Music Hall this evening. It is not her first appearance in the town, but it is her first appearance in a Symphony concert. Questions that may be asked this evening can now be answered. Here is her picture.

BASTA-TAVARY.

The Basta was born in Cologne in 1859. "Are you sure?" Madam, I have it on the best of authority—the singer herself. Do you think that she would deceive the public and her manager in such a matter of trifling importance? Then, I would not contradict a woman. Besides, a singer's birthday is a movable feast.

I do not know her maiden name. She is of Russian parentage, and her mother was a singer before her. The Basta was one of the innumerable pupils of Liszt; and she might have thum-

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphony, B-flat (B. & H. No. 12), Haydn; the "Letter" aria from Don Juan, Mozart; Suite No. 1, "L'Arlésienne," Bizet; Air, "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," Wagner; and Overture "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Madame Basta Tavary was the soloist. The Symphony was beautifully played throughout, though it was read in a somewhat too modern vein, and the first allegro was taken at a pace so rapid that its piquant grace was somewhat marred, and a vigor was imparted to the movement that misrepresented it. The charming Bizet suite was delightfully given in both the reading and the performance. The emphasis throughout was admirable and the coloring was rich and brilliant. Madame Tavary sang the Mozart aria with the ease and freedom of an experienced artist, though in a dry and perfunctory manner. The recitative would have been more effective had it been given with greater breadth. Some liberties were taken with the last movement, that cannot be approved. Mozart needs no gratuitous ornamentation, and the run that was interpolated and the high note that was given at the close could well have been spared. If the composer had wanted them he would have written them down. This "improving" a great master, especially when that master is a Mozart, assumes, very much, the aspect of an unpardonable impertinence. The "Tannhäuser" air was spiritedly sung, though with an excess of sentimentality in the opening recitative. The artist was recalled twice after each aria. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff, and a violin concerto. The soloist will be Monsieur Henri Marteau.

BASTA-TAVARY.

She Will Sing This Evening
in Music Hall.

A Sketch of a Woman of Marked
Versatility.

From Cologne to Munich—From London to New York.

The outside of the throat of a singer is more interesting to many than the tones that issue and create waves of air. Tamagno washing his socks aroused as much attention as Tamagno the slayer of Desdemona. I am told that there are people who awake at dead of night and wonder whether Paderewski wears a wig. It is the old story. Boswell is read and "The Rambler" is forgotten. The documents consulted most curiously are "human documents," and there was such cultivation of curiosity before the Goncourt Brothers invented the phrase.

The singer baffles curiosity while she excites it. The field of her triumphs is seen through the colored glass of her imagination. She knows not disaster. She is always the favorite pupil of her master. But in her answers to definite questions she defies chronology, and mocks time and space.

When a singer appears and applause rends the air questions follow the applause. "Where was she born? When was she born?" And often, alas, "Why was she born?" would be a more appropriate question. "Has she a mother?" This is a needless inquiry. A well-conducted singer always has a mother as well as jewels. The mother is devoted to her, lives for her, protects her, but in many cases she does not look like her. And so it was in Venice when Benedetto Marcello threw his vitriolic satire in the face of the voluptuous queens of the operatic stage.

Mrs. Basta-Tavary sings in Music Hall this evening. It is not her first appearance in the town, but it is her first appearance in a Symphony concert. Questions that may be asked this evening can now be answered. Here is her picture.

BASTA-TAVARY.

The Basta was born in Cologne in 1859. "Are you sure?" Madam, I have it on the best of authority—the singer herself. Do you think that she would deceive the public and her manager in such a matter of trifling importance? Then, I would not contradict a woman. Besides, a singer's birthday is a movable feast.

I do not know her maiden name. She is of Russian parentage, and her mother was a singer before her. The Basta was one of the innumerable pupils of Liszt; and she might have thundered his picture and gypsy music in the cities of the globe. Fortunately she turned from the error of her ways and studied singing, first with Marchesi, then with Lamperti. She learned dramatic action with Roger, that great glory of the French operatic stage. Let us see. Roger died in 1876; so she must have been with him before she said good-by to 17. She made her debut at La Scala in Milan as Lucia. She sang soon afterward in Berlin. In 1882 she appeared as Carmen in Cologne. And then she went to Munich.

I first saw "Frau Basta" in August, 1882, in the Royal Theatre at Dresden. She was not a member of the company, but she was a "visitor" from the Munich Opera House. She then sang Isabelle in "Robert the Devil," and she told Robert with great emphasis that she loved him. Now Robert was a short, fat man named Riese. He had a sweet voice and was once a trombone player.

Two nights after I heard her as the Queen of Night in "The Magic Flute." The Queen of Night, you remember, is a woman with a high voice and a high temper, and she has an unpleasant habit of appearing when you least expect her.

August 23 of the same year Mrs. Basta lost her reason and kept her bravura as the unhappy Lucia.

In September—it was the 30th—1884, I assisted at a representation of Halevy's gloomy opera, "The Jewess." There on the stage was my old friend as Eudoxie, the part created by Dorus-Gras. The Princess or the Queen in French opera of the Meyerbeer period had always taken singing lessons so that she could trill for hours and spend days in directing vocal cascades.

Presio. The 4th of October she was Carmen. The German Carmen, as a rule, has studied Spain only in the geography of school. But I forget; I record simply; I should not pass judgment.

In November, '84, she was the jealous woman in "Norma," who is jealous and imploring in solo and duet. Vorl was the tenor; and, by the way, was there ever such a contemptible stage hero for two respectable women to fight over as the Roman proconsul of Benini?

Basta was the Susanna in "Figaro's Wedding," a month later. And in January, 1885, I said good-by to her for a season. It was the 4th, and as Oscar, the page, in "Gustav III," she was plump and pleasing.

Now the poor, mad Bavarian King, the friend of Wagner, was fond of Basta in his musical, platonic fashion. He liked her as Eva. It is said he was so pleased with her that he gave her a brilliant and solid diamond ring; that he commanded a picture of her in the character of Eva to be painted for his own collection.

And then Basta wandered. She sang in the Italian language in Moscow and St. Petersburg. Augustus Harris heard of her, and she signed a three years' engagement for London. In Covent Garden she swore vengeance against Don Juan.

The Minnie Hauk Opera Company sang "Carmen" at the Boston Theatre Nov. 30, 1891. Michaela went timidly across the stage in search of Don Jose. I rubbed my eyes. It was the Basta. But according to the programme it was Basta-Tavary. It was the same Basta, however. The face is one not to be mistaken. During that engagement she sang Margaret in "Faust," Senta in "The Flying Dutchman," Donna Anna in "Don Juan" and Martha in Flotow's opera. Since that engagement she has sung in concerts at Tremont Temple and Music Hall. Last fall she was engaged by the managers of the Worcester Festival of '92.

Mrs. Basta-Tavary will sing this evening "Non mi dir," from "Don Giovanni," and the air from "Tannhauser," Act II, scene I.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mme. Tavary.

Return of the Damrosch Orchestra—The Second Wagner Matinee Under Herr Seidl's Direction—Intense Interest in Paderewski's Recitals—The Nordica Operatic Concert—Notes.

The engagement of Mme. Tavary as the soloist at the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, the 11th of the season's series by the Boston orchestra, gave great satisfaction to those who have anticipated with pleasure this recognition of Mme. Tavary's eminent abilities.

The favor this singer has gained with the Boston public, in her appearances under other auspices here, was clearly shown in the hearty greeting which attended her first appearance, and she fully met the expectations of those familiar with her earlier local successes in both her numbers.

She was first heard in the "Letter aria" from "Don Giovanni," in which her singing of the melodious movements charmed all who heard her and quite merited the enthusiastic applause with which she was rewarded at its conclusion. Her eminent ability as an actress, quite as much as her skill as a musician, served her in good stead in this number, and the rare musical intelligence of the singer was prominently shown at all times.

She made an admirably contrasting choice in her second selection, the aria for Elizabeth in the second act of "Tannhauser," which was given with such a breadth of dramatic style and such a grand measure of artistic elegance in its delivery that it called out an ovation seldom given at these concerts. Repeated recalls after each selection were most gracefully recognized by Mme. Tavary.

Mr. Nikisch has not often given the patrons of these concerts a more enjoyable treat than that afforded by the playing of the first suite from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," the brilliant and dainty movements having a performance that brought out their captivating contrasts in the happiest manner.

A very satisfying recital of Haydn's symphony in B flat major No. 12 (B. & H.) introduced the evening's programme, and an equally pleasing performance of the "Leonore" overture No. 3 ended it.

The orchestra makes its occasional tour the coming week, and will resume its home concerts on the 20th inst., when M. Henri Marteau, violinist, is to be the soloist, and Raff's "Im Walde" the symphony.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Eleventh Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

Concerning Bizet's Music to "L'Arlesienne."

Basta-Tavary Sings Arias of Two Centuries.

The eleventh symphony concert gave much pleasure to a large audience. The programme was interesting, although there was no novelty; it was well contrasted and it was of reasonable length. The performance of the orchestra was almost always acceptable and often brilliant. The programme was as follows:

Symphony, B flat (B and H No. 12) Haydn
"Non mi dir" from "Don Giovanni" Mozart
Suite "L'Arlesienne," No. 1 Bizet
"Dieu, que l'homme est grand" from "Tannhauser" Wagner
Overture, "Leonore," No. 3 Beethoven

The feature of the concert was the excellent performance of Bizet's charming suite made by him from his incidental music to Daudet's play. The second suite from this music of 24 numbers in all was published after Bizet's death and was arranged for concert use by Ernest Guiraud.

The account of this suite that is published in the programme book is unsatisfactory. In the first place Bizet's name was Alexandre-Cesar-Léopold, and not "Charles," etc. Bizet's godfather preferred the name "Georges," and the composer of "Carmen" is thus named by the world.

The operetta "Docteur Miracle" was written in competition for performance at the Bouffes-Parisiens under Offenbach as manager. Bizet took the first prize ex aequo with Lecocq, and the two operettas were played alternately.

In the Entr'acte of the programme book there is a quotation from Zola in which "L'Arlesienne" is spoken of as a "failure," and there is no mention of the final success of Daudet's piece. It is true that when the play was first brought out at the Vaudeville, Oct. 1, 1872, it was a failure, and there were only 14 or 15 performances. But it was given at the Odeon in 1887, and then played 63 times. In 1887 at the same theatre it had 42 performances.

The simple play of Daudet is not so well-known to concert-goers that a sketch of it in explanation would have been impertinent. A young farmer, Frederi, is madly in love with a girl of Arles. He is about to marry her when it is discovered that she is an infamous woman. The unfortunate young man tries to forget her. He makes love to Vivette, a charming girl whom he has known from infancy, but the recollection of the cursed Arlesienne paralyzes his love-making and keeps alive his sorrow. One night, while the peasants celebrate the festival of Saint-Eloi and dance the farandole, he throws himself out of the loft of the farmhouse and breaks his skull on the pavement of the court.

The original music to this play was written for the orchestra of the Vaudeville, which was thus curiously made up: Seven first violins, no second violins, two violas, five cellos, two double basses, one flute, one oboe, one cornet, two horns, two bassoons, kettle drums, harmonium and pianoforte. The harmonium was behind the scene and it was played by Bizet and at times by Guiraud. The orchestra was directed by Constantin.

The suite now known in the concert halls of the world was rewritten by Bizet for concert use. He changed the instrumentation and arranged it for a full orchestra. The suite was first played in its new form at a Concert Pasdeloup, Nov. 10, 1872. It was admitted to the honor of Conservatory performance in 1875. When the drama was revived the second instrumentation of Bizet was used by Colonne, who directed the orchestra at the Odeon performances.

The programme book says that the Prelude opens with "a solemn, march-like theme." Now this "march-like theme" is a march tune, and one that is well known throughout France. It is an old Provencal Noct (or Christmas song), the "Marche du Roi," the march of the Kings, the words of which are attributed to King Rene. The melody is two centuries older than the text. It is often called the March of Turin.

The second part of the Prelude is composed of two distinct ideas that play a great part in the drama. The first is the "sweet and sympathetic theme, veiled by the sonority of the saxophone with a shadow of mysterious melancholy." And now comes an excellent illustration of the fact that music is an individual affair. A certain strain means one thing to one man, another thing to another man. The author of the programme book thought that Bizet drew "his inspiration from an idea akin to Mephistopheles's: 'O night, spread thy shade over them; Love, close their souls against prying remorse; and ye, flowers of subtle odor, complete the perturbation of Margaret's heart!'" In other words the music suggested guilty passion. The andante is "morbid, if you will, but it is of an unearthly beauty." Alas for human conjecture! This theme is the music of the innocent, Frederi's pure and sweet brother, whose reason slumbers until it is awakened by the tragic death of the passionate young man. To a third or fourth hearer, unacquainted with the story and the fitting music, the phrase might mean something else, might awaken thoughts of a landscape, regret, a picture, or what-you-will.

The second idea in the second part of the prelude is the passion of Frederi, a strong, terrible lament, which cries out in agony and with convulsive sobs.

The exquisite adagietto accompanies the meeting of Balthazar, the old shepherd, and the grandmother of Vivette. They had loved each other in their youth, but she became the wife of another, and he then shunned her. They met for the first time in many years, although they had not been widely separated by distance, at the betrothal of Frederi and Vivette. Listen to this speech of Mere Renaud: "And when I heard your dogs bark, and I recognized afar off your great cloak, it took all my might to keep me from running to you. Now our sorrow is over, and we can look at each other without blushing. Balthazar, would you be ashamed to kiss me, now that I am old and wrinkled? Press me close to your heart, my brave good man. I have owed you this kiss for 50 years."

Camille Bellalgue protests against the separation of the music from the drama: "As if one could detach the colors from the canvass; as if the supreme beauty of these melodies, these ritornelles, these chords (for sometimes they are only choros) did not consist in rigid adherence, so to speak, to the situations, the words and the gestures."

The suite was read and played in a most sympathetic manner. There is only one serious criticism to make in regard to the reading and that concerns the treatment of the "Innocent music" in the prelude. The languid, melancholy, unearthly air was taken at such a quick pace that the phrase seemed hurried, nervous, restless; its character was destroyed and there was little effect of any kind. With this exception the performance of the suite was one long to be remembered. Particularly delightful was the interpretation of the Intermezzo, generally known as the "Menuet des Vieillards," or the "Menuet Valse," in which the phrase which forms the middle part is thought by a fanciful French writer to "express well the gentle and resigned tenderness of two aged lovers in the drama, who interchange souvenirs full of subdued emotion." What Bizet thought of it is another matter; he was no doubt chiefly busied in writing good music.

The Haydn symphony was well played in spite of occasional traces of ultra-modern proclivities of the conductor, and the "Leonore" overture was read in a highly dramatic fashion. All in all, it was a most agreeable concert, and one of reasonable length.

A sketch of the career of Mrs. Basta-Tavary appeared in the Journal of last Saturday, and there is now no need of calling attention to what she has done or left undone. She is fond of the "Letter-aria," from "Don Giovanni," and she sings it on all occasions. In the sketch published Saturday I forgot to mention that in March, '92, Mrs. Tavary was Donna Anna in the poor performance of "Don Giovanni," by the Abbey, Schoffel & Grau Company at Mechanics' Hall. Saturday evening she showed herself to be a singer of experience. The recitative was lacking in breadth, and there was, on the whole, an absence of the "grand style." On the other hand, much of her detail in the large-voiced passages was admirable. As for the bravura passages that follow, I confess that I sympathize with Berlioz and detest them, unless the performance is a triumph of the vocal art. Mrs. Tavary's delivery was uneven, and that which was good and that which was bad were close together. Breathing and consequent phrasing would be worthy of the highest praise; and then a pinched tone or a meaningless explosion would offend. She did not rise to true Wagnerian dramatic intensity in the "Tannhauser" air; that is to say, she did not follow the traditions. Whenever I heard this air sung by a stout, red-faced mistress of the Wagnerian art in Berlin, Dresden or Munich, the song was one long, heaven-defying howl. Then great was the enjoyment of the audience. Mrs. Tavary is to be thanked for her moderation.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme of the rehearsal and concert Jan. 20, 21, will be as follows: Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," and Raff's Forest symphony. Mr. Henri Marteau, a young French violinist, will be heard in a concerto for violin and orchestra.

PHILIP HALE.

Echoes From The Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Paderewski's Second Piano Recital—Urania Spectacle Tonight.

Damrosch and New York Symphony Orchestra—Lieut. Peary's Lecture.

Mme. Basta-Tavary was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, singing Donna Anna's letter song from "Don Giovanni" and an aria from Wagner's "Tannhauser." The talented soprano is a favorite with Bostonians, and her reception was most cordial. In the Giovanni aria the recitative was given with excellent dramatic effect, although madame's voice was not at its best, and the rondo and closing part showed marked improvement in tone quality. More satisfactory was the "Tannhauser" selection, the Wagner music suiting her voice better, and her strong, clear and true vocalizing rang out above the orchestra with telling effect. Although an opera singer, and heard to greater advantage with theatre surroundings, Mme. Tavary's concert work is always of a high order of merit, and in both selections she merely utilized her vocal abilities without any suggestion of dramatic action. She was recalled several times.

Haydn's symphony in B flat major, No. 12, was the opening number. Although this is scored for a full orchestra there are no clarinets introduced, and the part for the second flute is almost entirely done away with. The introduction, a lively allegro, resembles a country dance tune and two themes play "hide and seek," as it were, until a sudden rest ensues; then at last the second theme is introduced by a phrase on the strings; an odd bit of orchestration. The opening was played with a delightful dash by the strings, while the sombre closing themes showed the almost perfect team work of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra in elaborate and heavily scored compositions. In the second movement the cello parts, horn effects and measures for muted trumpets were beautifully played by the men. The minuet was given with dash and rhythmic precision, and the finale was noticeably well done on the part of the wind contingent.

In Bizet's suite the work of the instruments in the opening, military-like theme in unison seemed perfect, the playing of the band being as of one man. The effect was grand. The minuet, a quaint little dance air with a peculiar bass, and the third movement, for strings only, were each delightfully interpreted.

The effect of the bell-like orchestration of the closing group was electrical, and the simulation of chimes was singularly beautiful and sonorous.

The familiar "Leonore" overture, No. 3, by Beethoven, closed the concert. The grand work was grandly given, perhaps, as a whole, receiving the best interpretation of the evening.

The next rehearsal and concert will occur Jan. 20 and 21, the programme being Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Raff's symphony, "In Walde," and a concerto for violin and orchestra, with Henri Marteau as soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in B-flat major (No. 12, Breitkopf & Härtel Ed.)

Mozart: Recitative, "Crudele! Ah no, mio bene!" and Aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni," act II, scene 13.

Bizet: Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlésienne."

Wagner: Aria, "Dich, theure Hulde, grüss' ich wieder," from "Tannhäuser," act II, scene 1.

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72.

Mme. Basta Tavary was the singer.

The Haydn symphony is in many ways a rather modern sounding work for the composer; it is not merely that it is Haydn at his best, and hence ever fresh and young; it is something in the general character of the themes, the more frequent and at times bold modulation, an occasional chromatic element in the harmony, an unwonted profusion and variety of wind-coloring in the orchestration. One feels in it more than once the influence of Mozart; indeed, the symphony was written in 1795, and Mozart died in 1791. The slow movement in particular, with its independent 'cello part, its muted trumpets and drums, and its rich scoring for the wind instruments, is a gorgeous piece of coloring of which, even as a bit of orchestration, any modern master might be proud. There is, too, a certain modern breadth of style, a length of breath so to speak, in the theme itself that anticipates the melodic style of Beethoven and other later masters. The symphony was admirably, beautifully played.

Bizet's first suite from his music to Alphonse Daudet's "L'Arlésienne" (decidedly the more interesting of the two) contains much that is charming. The opening march theme in the prelude is not only full of life and vigor in itself, but is treated with infinite spiritual skill. The little Andante molto that follows it is to us one of the most absolutely bewitching passages in all modern French music. Strange to say, however, this exquisite little passage was less effectively played than anything else in the whole suite. To us the tempo seemed decidedly too fast; and here one may well be in doubt as to precisely what Bizet meant by "andante molto." Bizet was a Grand Prix de Rome, and had been some time in Italy before he wrote his "L'Arlésienne" music; he might thus be expected to use Italian terms in the Italian way. But "andante molto," in the literal sense of "very much going"—i. e. going briskly—does not in the least agree with the character of the music. On the other hand, if he used the term as any Frenchman or other non-Italian might, taking andante in its generally accepted technical sense to mean "slow," then "andante molto" would have to be interpreted "very slow"—something just short of largo, for instance—and this would indicate the proper tempo of the movement (to our thinking, at least) very correctly. At all events we remember the ravishing effect of the passage as it used to be played by Mr. Thomas, at a tempo, if not much slower, yet markedly slower than that taken by Mr. Nikisch last Saturday evening. Some other items, too, militated against the full effectiveness of the passage: muted string parts were played with such exceeding delicacy that those cloyingly sweet and unctuous chromatic harmonies that underlie the reiterated E-flat, G, F, E-flat of the clarinet were hardly perceptible. Mr. Strasser played the saxophone solo very smoothly and nicely; but one might suspect that he is not so easily at home on the saxophone as he is on the clarinet, for there was a certain lack of abandon and romantic fervor in his performance such as we have never noticed in his clarinet playing. In short, for one reason or another, this delicious passage missed fire—so much to our disappointment that we cannot help dwelling upon it at perhaps greater length than it really deserves. The Minuet, per contra, was exquisitely played, with all due delicacy and sprightliness; the smorzando passage at the close was especially well done. The Carillon made its unfailing effect.

Beethoven's great "Leonore" overture was superbly given; the strings in particular are to be praised for giving certain passages of piano cantilena not only with artistic phrasing and expressiveness, but really piano, as they are written. The dramatic trumpet episode in the middle, with its alternating song of thanksgiving, was grandly led up to; Mr. Molé played the flute solo excellently well, and the rushing coda was given with immense effect. By the way, what can the individual who edits the programme-books have been thinking of when he said that, at the beginning of this overture, the harmony passed to the key of B major? The chord of B major with an obvious D-natural in it is something new!

Mme. Tavary sang Donna Anna's great aria with great expressiveness and no lack of vocal technique; but there was a certain want of breadth and heroic grandeur of style to be felt throughout, and the close of the allegretto ("Forse un giorno," etc.) needed more brilliant slancio and ecstatic exaltation of sentiment. It was pure, artistic singing, full of delicate and feminine feeling, but somehow one felt it not to be Donna Anna; it was not on a large enough scale. Elizabeth's greeting to the Minnesingers' Hall has no proper place in the concert-room. On the stage, as a sudden outpouring of intense feeling, as one short climax of buoyant emotion, its effect is enormous—coming, as it does, immediately after the exceedingly brilliant introduction on the orchestra. But in the concert-room it is merely an excerpt, and one that has not sufficient development to throw the listener into a sympathetic mood. It ends almost before it has begun. As well might a reciter select Gloucester's first speech in "Richard III." and stop short at "the lascivious pleasing of a lute." The thing has, by itself alone, no proper musical existence: it is but the introduction to a scene, not a scene in itself. Mme. Tavary sang it with both sentiment and fire; but no singer ever made it effective in such conditions.

The next programme (for Jan. 21) is—Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring," opus 36; Raff, symphony No. 3, in F major ("Im Walde"), opus 153. Mr. Henri Marteau will play a concerto for violin, the title of which will be duly announced. There will be no rehearsal nor concert here this week.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday gave the impression of lightness and popularity, rather than of depth or of educational intent. A pretty Haydn symphony was followed by Bizet's popular "Suite Arlesienne" (No. 1), a work which one of the symphonic conductors used to relegate to the "Young People's Popular Concerts," and even the soloist of the evening had a light voice. Yet it is pleasant to hear a concert of such prettiness once in a way, and it is not always a matter of regret that our conductor does not allow the dignity of the symphony concerts to weigh heavily upon him.

There was a degree of modern fervor about the Haydn symphony that was not quite in the vein of the simple old master, but the conductor showed palpably, in the finale, that he fully understood the meaning of the Haydn tempi. The presto became an allegro, as was proper, for, a century ago, the quick tempi were taken slower and the slow ones quicker than nowadays. The points of excellence in the work were the shading of the trio of the minuet, the delicate work of the violins in the last movement, and the exquisite daintiness with which the interrupted phrases of the final coda were given. The only shortcomings were a too great dramatic force in the first movement and a lack of perfect ensemble in portions of the finale.

After the symphony came Mme. Bastavary in the "Letter-Aria" from "Don Giovanni." This was not an entire success; there was palpable effort in almost every measure and the voice was thin and too much given to vibrato. These defects were still more marked in the "Greeting to the Hall" from "Tannhauser," which seemed spasmodic rather than broad, and, of course, the tremolo was quite in opposition to the Wagnerian ideal. It is due to the singer to say that she was twice recalled after each of her songs.

Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne" was excellently played; it seemed to suit the dashing, capricious vein of the conductor and none of its quaintness or brusquerie was lost in the performance, and the bold effects of orchestral color were made the most of. It is wise to put works of this character on the programme occasionally, for, while these concerts are supposed to be educational, they need not be pedantic, and in fact, Bizet's scoring has an educational value even to the advanced musician. The breadth of the strange march, given in unison by the deep strings, was peculiarly impressive, and the subsequent varying of this theme with unusual tone-colors served to show the different departments of the orchestra to much advantage. The drone bass in the pastoral second movement was given in the heartiest manner possible. The little adagio was sweetly given by the muted strings, and of course pleased the audience greatly. The final carillon was played with all its appropriate swing, and brought the attractive work to a worthy conclusion.

It was the last number of the concert that redeemed the programme from being unambitious, for this was the finest of all dramatic overtures—Beethoven's "Leonora,

No. 3." The performance of this was brilliant in the extreme. Judged by any standard, it was a grand interpretation of a noble work. Especially noteworthy was the dramatic power of the passage immediately preceding the trumpet call which heralds the arrival of the governor of the province, a graphic picture (in outline) of the desperate attempt of Pizarro upon the life of Florestan, and the revealing of the heroine in her true character.

The trumpet calls were perfectly played, better than I can recall ever having heard them in these concerts. They are not intrinsically difficult, it is only the nicety of shading required, and the distance of the performer from the conductor, that makes them so. In fact, Beethoven never wrote a difficult trumpet passage. The so-called "Classical epoch" was an era of decadence in trumpet-playing and Beethoven seems to have recognized this fact, for while he uses the horns unmercifully at times, he demands but little of his trumpeters. Mozart's alterations of the obbligato in Handel's "The Trumpet Shall Sound" is a vivid proof of the statement above made. Entirely magnificent was the playing of the violins in the closing passages of this overture; one may search through America in vain for a body of musicians which shall rival our group of first violins.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

—Mme. Tavary made an emphatic success as soloist at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week. She looked finely Friday afternoon in a black gown of thin texture combined with pink. The square-cut bodice was all of pink under black lace. Her abundant blonde hair was most charmingly dressed. In the audience, which was exceedingly demonstrative for a rehearsal, were seen in seats near the platform Mrs. Gardner, her first appearance; Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Lindall Winthrop, the Misses Stackpole, the Elliott W. Pratts, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Henry Winsor, Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. G. B. Shattuck, Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. Charles Fairchild, Mrs. Templeman Coolidge, Jr., and Dr. Sturgis Bigelow.

MME. NIKISCH.

Chat With the Wife of the Symphony Leader.

She Is One of Boston's Four Hundred.

"My Aim Is to Raise the German Lied to Its Proper Place."

On one of Brookline's highest hills, commanding a magnificent view of the southern suburbs and the shining dome of the State House, stands a handsome modern house which bears on its modest door-plate the magic legend, "Nikisch." It is the only house in Boston or its suburbs which can assume that title, as there is no other owner of that name than the popular Symphony Orchestra conductor, after one has counted his little family.

A ring at the door bell brings a quick reply, and the Journal representative is ushered through a pleasant, well-lighted hall into the finely appointed library and morning room beyond. A bright and cheery apartment it is, with the sun shining in through the bay window, lighting up the sombre bookcases, and bringing out into full relief the tones in the good etchings and engravings on the walls. Near the window stands an ebony escritoire with brass-mounted inkstand and pen tray, and other furnishings necessary to the dainty woman who writes a note in English as daintily and well cared for as herself. On a table

MME. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

close by are photographs in frames of Mrs. Nikisch and Paderewski, of Madame Nikisch herself, and a friend or two beside. On the mantel are other photographs of musicians at home and abroad. In the centre of the room stands a big divan with luxurious square pillows that instantly suggest the comfort which the concertmeister must find there when he comes home tired from rehearsal or concert. Over in the bay window stands the only distinctly foreign feature of the room, in the form of a tiny spinning wheel, such as the German peasant women use for spinning flax; and which is quite different from those formerly used in this country for a similar purpose, and which one occasionally sees now in the parlors of women who would on no account own that Their Grandmothers Ever Spun Flax!

There is nothing else foreign about the room; on the contrary, it has a distinctly home-like and "lived-in" look. One has barely time to realize this when the door opens and the little woman who gives her whole house this atmosphere, the cheerful, lovable house-mother, enters. One does not wonder at the atmosphere when one sees her sweet, smiling face or hears her kind, gentle voice; but one does wonder at her English. For when Madame Nikisch came to Boston three years ago she spoke it very little, and to-day one would scarcely notice the slight accent which lingers about her speech, rather than mixes with it.

Personally, she is slightly below medium stature, with brown hair and the frank, appealing, blue eyes, which we find sometimes in the German race. She is a young woman, and one cannot wonder, looking at her and her charming toilets, that the society papers refer to her, frequently, as "quite the prettiest woman" at some high festivity. For with her simple, unaffected manners, her charming features and the indescribable fascination of her smile, she is easily the rival of any society belle in town. It is probably owing to all these charms, quite as much as to her husband's position, that she has won her way straight into the holy of holies of our best society and is well established.

One of Boston's Four Hundred.

Amelie Nikisch was born in Brussels, where her father was a printer and publisher for many years. She was educated there for some years, having studied music at an early age and always having been associated with the best musical people. Her father met with reverses in his business and removed to London, where he died soon after, leaving Amelie at the age of 17 to find some means of supporting her mother. This she did for some years by teaching music, going back to Germany and keeping up her studies at the same time as well as she could. She was a pupil at the Leipzig Conservatory for a time, always working hard with both the present and the future in view.

After a few years of music teaching, singing and studying, a lady who was deeply interested in the dramatic profession obtained a position for her in light opera, and she went on the stage. From that time her life was easier. It was not long before she met Herr Nikisch, and after a short courtship they were married, when she retired from the stage to assume the domestic duties for which she is so well fitted.

"I am a trained housekeeper," she says proudly. "I am never at the mercy of my servants, because I understand all kinds of housework well, and if they should suddenly decide to leave me I could do it all myself. I am a good cook; and as I have no reason to be afraid of their leaving, I am never worried about my household affairs. I respect all labor and I really like to do housework; but if a woman has any other work to do she cannot afford to wear herself out in the treadmill of daily housework."

It is to be feared that Mme. Nikisch is not the typical German housewife of a generation back, however, for she also says:

"The care of a house and a family are not enough for a healthy, thinking, earnest woman."

154
The shock have come vital interest in her life beyond them, or she must stagnate and grow gossip and narrow. When I think of my own work I care little for all the gossip of the world. Upon being asked about her work, she went on:

"My first and highest work, of course, is the care of my family—my husband and my two children. But next to that my aim is to

Raise the German Lied

to its proper place in the public estimation. The lieder are the only songs I sing. Mine is not a great voice" (this is Madame Nikisch's own modest estimate of herself), "but it is one admirably fitted to the lieder. Why do public singers always choose the same old, time-worn, showy select ones? There are such possibilities in the lieder. You know they are the German folk-songs, in a sense. They speak the language of the heart in a simple, homespun way, appealing to the sympathies, if properly sung, as no other songs can. They combine poetry, music, pathos and lowly sentiment, and it is a pity the public do not know them better. There are hundreds of them in the German language. But beyond a dozen or so by Schubert, two or three by Schumann and an occasional other, you Americans do not know them. Robert Franz has published a big book of them, Schubert wrote over a hundred, Schumann scores of them, and every German composer has added his—often beautiful—contributions to the list. These are what I sing. These are what I want the American public to know."

Madame Nikisch has sung the German lieder at the symphony concerts on two or three occasions here, and has appeared with the Symphony Orchestra in New York, Baltimore and Philadelphia. She has also been heard often privately here, when Mr. Nikisch could accompany her. In fact, she never sings except to his accompaniment, as no one else can give her the same sympathetic support.

When she left the stage, and especially after the birth of her two children, her studies had to be dropped for a time; but after she came to Boston she took them up again in good earnest, with her husband for her instructor. She works diligently and practices faithfully; and what, with her fine, sympathetic voice, and her singleness of purpose as she becomes better known as a singer,

Boston Is Destined to Be Proud of Her.

When asked how she liked America she answered quickly and heartily:

"I like it very much. I am glad my children are being educated here. Germany educates her children very thoroughly in some directions; but American children are taught everything and made to see everything. They grow broad and liberal minded, and that is what I want my children to be. And the women? O, they are much more free in this country. In Germany a woman who will do anything toward her own support so long as she has a husband is not considered respectable. See would not be tolerated in society. And women are so much better who have some interest in life. If they have it not, beyond themselves, they become so harsh and bitter, so uncharitable and narrow; O, it aches me to see it."

And this latter is the only German construction one may hear her utter in an hour's steady conversation.

Madame Nikisch is, in short, a typical woman of the educated class to-day. A generation or two ago such women stayed quietly at home, reading novels, mending the household linen and secretly wishing there were something in life beyond this and their neighbor's shortcomings. To-day they stay in their homes; they look after the household affairs, they keep up with the new in literature, they look after their children, but they are finding new avenues for thought and outlets for their energies in some of the ever widening interests for their sex. They are losing their taste for viewing their neighbor's shortcomings in the broader perspective of opportunity.

And yet they are women—and pretty ones.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

155
This seems to be Beethoven week. The Beethoven Quartet gave one of its excellent concerts last evening, while the Nikisch Orchestra played Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the third "Leonore" overture; and to-morrow evening the Philharmonic Orchestra will play the Seventh Symphony and the "Coriolan" overture. There would be no objection to this—for Beethoven is surely one of the best of composers—were it not for the strange and discreditable fact that a greater genius than Beethoven, a certain Johann Sebastian Bach, continues to be shamefully neglected in our concert-halls. A piece by Bach, who is next to Wagner the most modern of composers, would have done more than the "Will o' the Wisp" and "Dance of Sylphs" from Berlioz's "Faust," to introduce the sadly needed modern element in last evening's programme of the Boston Orchestra.

It was an odd programme, anyway, two soloists and an antiquated piano concerto being included in its scheme, besides a symphony which, being one of the even numbers, is not one of Beethoven's best. It was played, too, in a rather conservative and colorless way. The "Leonore" overture, on the other hand, was superbly played, with that tremendous final climax which we were taught to love at the German opera. The Valse des Sylphes was given so daintily that the audience insisted on a repetition.

The two soloists were Mr. Adamowski, who played two movements of Bruch's first violin concerto in excellent fashion, for which he was made to get up and bow again and again. The other soloist, Signorina Eugenia Castellano, was also overwhelmed with applause. She is a young Italian girl of only sixteen, who plays with masculine vigor and brilliancy. Her execution is clear, unerring, showy, and dashing. She is at her best in bravura pieces, which accounts for her choice of a trashy piece by Martucci for an "encore." She played the last movement of Mendelssohn's first piano concerto brilliantly, but the slow movement revealed her limitations—a hard, metallic touch, and an apparent inability to enter into the spirit of music which is written for a higher purpose than the display of digital dexterity. Possibly these attributes may come in time, but little Josef Hoffman and Otto Hegner had them from the beginning.

We hear from the New York Times the surprising intelligence that the Boston music critics are doing their best to drive Mr. Nikisch out of the city. The Boston music critics would scarcely undertake to do this thing, in view of the fact that they are fully aware that a mortifying defeat would attend their efforts. They perhaps do not rate Mr. Nikisch as high as he is rated in New York; but there are various good and sufficient reasons for that, all of a purely critical nature. This statement of the Times is just as reliable as is its other statement that these same critics assert that New York is the only city in the United States which possesses a first-class permanent orchestra with a thoroughly competent conductor. On the contrary, the Boston music critics have steadily insisted that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the best in the country, and is unsurpassed anywhere. The thoroughly competent conductor is quite another story; but certainly, critical Boston does not cast its eyes in the direction of New York, in the hope of discovering one there; especially since the New York music critics drove Theodore Thomas out of that city.

Saville 24/15/93

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Seidl Society Concert.

M. Henri Marteau, the young violinist of Reims, made his first appearance in America last night, at the third Seidl Society concert in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Judged by his looks M. Marteau is a youth of twenty years. He is a pupil of the famous Leonard of Paris, and has won the first prize of the Paris Conservatory. In addition to that he is the protégé of such men as Charles Gounod and Jules Massenet. During the last two years he has given many concerts in France and Germany, and has been well received. His early success, apparently, has not turned his head, for he bears himself with modesty and without affectation. M. Marteau's first piece on the programme was a violin concerto by Bruch, a bravura number. It was played with fire and great technical excellence by the young violinist as well as by the orchestra. Brilliancy and a sure technique are the only qualities, indeed, which are necessary for its proper performance. The best piece of the evening was Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," a melodious violin solo with many poetic passages, dedicated to M. Marteau by the composer. This was followed by Schubert's Serenade. M. Marteau played these two solos with great warmth of feeling and thorough comprehension. The technique was flawless. His high notes never screeched, while the lower passages were marvellously clear and sympathetic. As an encore he played a fragment from Wieniawski's Polonaise Brillante, another bravura number. The choice of such a piece, after a simple and affecting composition like the Serenade, is not to be commended.

The Seidl Orchestra gave Tchaikovsky's Symphony in F minor, Philip Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen," and the Prelude and Glorification from Wagner's "Parsifal." Herr Seidl conducted all these pieces with his wonted excellence. The pizzicato scherzo in the first number, and the selection from Wagner at the end, were received with great applause.

A Noted Young Violinist.

Henri Marteau, the lad who is to play at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall on Jan. 20 and 21, was born in Reims, France, in 1874. His father was an amateur violinist and president of the Philharmonic Society of Reims; his mother was an accomplished pianist and had been a pupil of Clara Schumann. When Henri was but five years of age Camille Sivori visited the family, and so charmed was the boy that he requested his mother to permit him to become a professional violinist. The next day Sivori selected a little violin, which he presented to the lad. At once he began to study under Bunzl, a Swiss, who had been a pupil of Molique. After three years his parents took him to Paris, where he began his studies under the famous Leonard, who took a great liking to the boy. In April, 1884 (then ten years of age) he appeared for the first time in public before an audience of 2500 persons at Reims, and played with orchestra Leonard's violin concerto No. 5, earning the warmest approbation. He has since played in Paris, London, Vienna, Berlin, Dresden, and always with marked success. On special occasions, Leonard permitted his young pupil to perform on an old violin which Leonard prized highly, and upon his death Marteau became the possessor of this fine instrument. Gounod took a deep interest in Marteau, selecting him to perform the violin obbligato in a piece composed expressly for the Joan of Arc Centenary at Reims in 1885, entitled "The Vision of Joan of Arc," and which Gounod dedicated to Marteau.

Massenet is writing a concerto for the young artist. Brahms, Ambroise Thomas, Bruch, Richter (under whose conductorship he has frequently performed in London and Vienna), also take the liveliest interest in his career. In the summer of 1892 Marteau obtained the first prize at the Paris Conservatory amid overwhelming applause from the public and to the delight of Ambroise Thomas, Massenet, Dubois and other eminent musicians on the jury. Rudolph Aronson and Major J. B. Pond have the direction of Marteau's tour in America. His first appearance in this country is announced for tomorrow night at the Lenox Lyceum, New York, with Mr. Seidl's Orchestra. In February he will play in the public rehearsal and concert of the New York Philharmonic Society.

From 24/15/93

50
She should have some vital interest in her life beyond them, or she must stagnate and grow gossip and narrow. When I think of my own work I care little for all the gossip of the world. Upon being asked about her work, she went on:

My first and highest work, of course, is the care of my family—my husband and my two children. But next to that my aim is to

Raise the German Lied

to its proper place in the public estimation. The lieder are the only songs I sing. Mine is not a great voice" (this is Madame Nikisch's own modest estimate of herself), "but it is one admirably fitted to the lieder. Why do public singers always choose the same old, time-worn, showy select ones? There are such possibilities in the lieder. You know they are the German folk-songs, in a sense. They speak the language of the heart in a simple, homespun way, appealing to the sympathies, if properly sung, as no other songs can. They combine poetry, music, pathos and lowly sentiment, and it is a pity the public do not know them better. There are hundreds of them in the German language. But beyond a dozen or so by Schubert, two or three by Schumann and an occasional other, you Americans do not know them. Robert Franz has published a big book of them, Schubert wrote over a hundred, Schumann scores of them, and every German composer has added his—often beautiful—contributions to the list. These are what I sing. These are what I want the American public to know."

Madame Nikisch has sung the German lieder at the symphony concerts on two or three occasions here, and has appeared with the Symphony Orchestra in New York, Baltimore and Philadelphia. She has also been heard often privately here, when Mr. Nikisch could accompany her. In fact, she never sings except to his accompaniment, as no one else can give her the same sympathetic support.

When she left the stage, and especially after the birth of her two children, her studies had to be dropped for a time; but after she came to Boston she took them up again in good earnest, with her husband for her instructor. She works diligently and practices faithfully; and what, with her fine, sympathetic voice, and her singleness of purpose as she becomes better known as a singer,

Boston Is Destined to Be Proud of Her.

When asked how she liked America she answered quickly and heartily:

"I like it very much. I am glad my children are being educated here. Germany educates her children very thoroughly in some directions; but American children are taught everything and made to see everything. They grow broad and liberal minded, and that is what I want my children to be. And the women? O, they are much more free in this country. In Germany a woman who will do anything toward her own support so long as she has a husband is not considered respectable. See would not be tolerated in society. And women are so much better who have some interest in life. If they have it not, beyond themselves, they become so harsh and bitter, so uncharitable and narrow; O, it aches me to see it."

And this latter is the only German construction one may hear her utter in an hour's steady conversation.

Madame Nikisch is, in short, a typical woman of the educated class to-day. A generation or two ago such women stayed quietly at home, reading novels, mending the household linen and secretly wishing there were something in life beyond this and their neighbor's shortcomings. To-day they stay in their homes; they look after the household affairs, they keep up with the new in literature, they look after their children, but they are finding new avenues for thought and outlets for their energies in some of the ever widening interests for their sex. They are losing their taste for viewing their neighbor's shortcomings in the broader perspective of opportunity.

And yet they are women—and pretty ones.

154
Boston Symphony Orchestra.
This seems to be Beethoven week. The Beethoven Quartet gave one of its excellent concerts last evening, while the Nikisch Orchestra played Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the third "Leonore" overture; and to-morrow evening the Philharmonic Orchestra will play the Seventh Symphony and the "Coriolan" overture. There would be no objection to this—for Beethoven is surely one of the best of composers—were it not for the strange and discreditable fact that a greater genius than Beethoven, a certain Johann Sebastian Bach, continues to be shamefully neglected in our concert-halls. A piece by Bach, who is next to Wagner the most modern of composers, would have done more than the "Will o' the Wisp" and "Dance of Sylphs" from Berlioz's "Faust," to introduce the sadly needed modern element in last evening's programme of the Boston Orchestra.

It was an odd programme, anyway, two soloists and an antiquated piano concerto being included in its scheme, besides a symphony which, being one of the even numbers, is not one of Beethoven's best. It was played, too, in a rather conservative and colorless way. The "Leonore" overture, on the other hand, was superbly played, with that tremendous final climax which we were taught to love at the German opera. The Valse des Sylphes was given so daintily that the audience insisted on a repetition.

The two soloists were Mr. Adamowski, who played two movements of Bruch's first violin concerto in excellent fashion, for which he was made to get up and bow again and again. The other soloist, Signorina Eugenia Castellano, was also overwhelmed with applause. She is a young Italian girl of only sixteen, who plays with masculine vigor and brilliancy. Her execution is clear, unerring, showy, and dashing. She is at her best in bravura pieces, which accounts for her choice of a trashy piece by Martucci for an "encore." She played the last movement of Mendelssohn's first piano concerto brilliantly, but the slow movement revealed her limitations—a hard, metallic touch, and an apparent inability to enter into the spirit of music which is written for a higher purpose than the display of digital dexterity. Possibly these attributes may come in time, but little Josef Hoffman and Otto Hegner had them from the beginning.

We hear from the New York Times the surprising intelligence that the Boston music critics are doing their best to drive Mr. Nikisch out of the city. The Boston music critics would scarcely undertake to do this thing, in view of the fact that they are fully aware that a mortifying defeat would attend their efforts. They perhaps do not rate Mr. Nikisch as high as he is rated in New York; but there are various good and sufficient reasons for that, all of a purely critical nature. This statement of the Times is just as reliable as is its other statement that these same critics assert that New York is the only city in the United States which possesses a first-class permanent orchestra with a thoroughly competent conductor. On the contrary, the Boston music critics have steadily insisted that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the best in the country, and is unsurpassed anywhere. The thoroughly competent conductor is quite another story; but certainly, critical Boston does not cast its eyes in the direction of New York, in the hope of discovering one there; especially since the New York music critics drove Theodore Thomas out of that city.

Saville Jan 15/93

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Seidl Society Concert.

M. Henri Marteau, the young violinist of Reims, made his first appearance in America last night, at the third Seidl Society concert in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Judged by his looks M. Marteau is a youth of twenty years. He is a pupil of the famous Leonard of Paris, and has won the first prize of the Paris Conservatory. In addition to that he is the protégé of such men as Charles Gounod and Jules Massenet. During the last two years he has given many concerts in France and Germany, and has been well received. His early success, apparently, has not turned his head, for he bears himself with modesty and without affectation. M. Marteau's first piece on the programme was a violin concerto by Bruch, a bravura number. It was played with fire and great technical excellence by the young violinist as well as by the orchestra. Brilliancy and a sure technique are the only qualities, indeed, which are necessary for its proper performance. The best piece of the evening was Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," a melodious violin solo with many poetic passages, dedicated to M. Marteau by the composer. This was followed by Schubert's Serenade. M. Marteau played these two solos with great warmth of feeling and thorough comprehension. The technique was flawless. His high notes never screeched, while the lower passages were marvellously clear and sympathetic. As an encore he played a fragment from Wieniawski's Polonaise Brillante, another bravura number. The choice of such a piece, after a simple and affecting composition like the Serenade, is not to be commended.

155

The Seidl Orchestra gave Tchaikovsky's Symphony in F minor, Philip Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen," and the Prelude and Glorification from Wagner's "Parsifal." Herr Seidl conducted all these pieces with his wonted excellence. The pizzicato scherzo in the first number, and the selection from Wagner at the end, were received with great applause.

A Noted Young Violinist.

Henri Marteau, the lad who is to play at the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall on Jan. 20 and 21, was born in Reims, France, in 1874. His father was an amateur violinist and president of the Philharmonic Society of Reims; his mother was an accomplished pianist and had been a pupil of Clara Schumann. When Henri was but five years of age Camille Sivori visited the family, and so charmed was the boy that he requested his mother to permit him to become a professional violinist. The next day Sivori selected a little violin, which he presented to the lad. At once he began to study under Bunzl, a Swiss, who had been a pupil of Molique. After three years his parents took him to Paris, where he began his studies under the famous Leonard, who took a great liking to the boy. In April, 1884 (then ten years of age) he appeared for the first time in public before an audience of 2500 persons at Reims, and played with orchestra Leonard's violin concerto No. 5, earning the warmest approbation. He has since played in Paris, London, Vienna, Berlin, Dresden, and always with marked success. On special occasions, Leonard permitted his young pupil to perform on an old violin which Leonard prized highly, and upon his death Marteau became the possessor of this fine instrument. Gounod took a deep interest in Marteau, selecting him to perform the violin obbligato in a piece composed expressly for the Joan of Arc Centenary at Reims in 1885, entitled "The Vision of Joan of Arc," and which Gounod dedicated to Marteau.

Massenet is writing a concerto for the young artist. Brahms, Ambroise Thomas, Bruch, Richter (under whose conductorship he has frequently performed in London and Vienna), also take the liveliest interest in his career. In the summer of 1892 Marteau obtained the first prize at the Paris Conservatory amid overwhelming applause from the public and to the delight of Ambroise Thomas, Massenet, Dubois and other eminent musicians on the jury. Rudolph Aronson and Major J. B. Pond have the direction of Marteau's tour in America. His first appearance in this country is announced for tomorrow night at the Lenox Lyceum, New York, with Mr. Seidl's Orchestra. In February he will play in the public rehearsal and concert of the New York Philharmonic Society.

Jan 14/93

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

The eleventh symphony concert was genial, classic and quieting in the general effect of its programme; unlike too many of the concerts thus far, this season, the sound and fury-kind of music, signifying nothing, was conspicuous by its absence. The symphony was by Haydn—in B flat major, or No. 12 of the Breitkopf and Haertel collection—a work that even, yes and even forever, for that matter, should be admired for something more than its nominal value. Its venerable age seemed never more interesting, nor more nobly simple, and it was performed with all the fervency that the most fastidious listener would have demanded for it. The musical world owes much to Haydn. He was not the mere pedagogue, not simply the purest, that flippant musical opinion has frequently accredited him with being, but in both his homophony and polyphony there are interlocked in a rare degree certain epic and lyric elements of great value. Few symphonies so smack of the whole-heartedness of genius and are identified with such plastic clearness and harmonic fullness as the symphony in B flat major.

In the allegro vivace there is all the energy and strong youthful activity of a modern young athlete at his sport; and how ingenious it all is, especially at its transition period, no musician surely need be told. With the second movement, the expression becomes deeply fervent, and here we have indisputably the most beautiful movement of the symphony. It is deeply full of thought; and a devout and exalted tone pervades its strains.

The minuet has the same old formula that our grandparents in the Harvard Musical Association days used so much to admire, and with the finale there is a genial play of tones, but as is usually the case with Haydn symphonies, a deeper meaning is wanting. Many years will elapse before an estimate of Haydn's fame will cease to interfere with that just appreciation of his symphonies, which has but slightly more to do with homage than with enjoyment. The orchestral performance of the work was exceedingly good in points of tonal contrast and attention to some of the most delicate effects of light and shade, although the allegro vivace was taken at a rate of speed that was unjust if not inartistic in its effect.

The soloist for the Letter aria from Mozart's "Don Juan" and an aria from Tannhauser, Act II, Scene I, was Mme. Basta-Tavary.

Mme. Tavary, with all her vocal endowments, which are rare, and her intelligence as a musician, which is by no means mediocre, was but partially successful with the Mozart aria. Her delivery lacked straightforwardness and decision, not sincerity, for Mme. Tavary is eminently a sincere artist. She is, furthermore, gifted with a sympathetically musical nature; but, paradoxical as it may seem, her tones are always not quite true. Although Mme. Tavary is a dramatic soprano, her vocalism was offensively plegmatic in her performance of the great aria from Tannhauser, "Dich theure Halle."

There was lively, piquant and ear-catching melody and plenty of it in Georges Bizet's suite No. 1 from L'Arlesienne and it is all worked out with great ingenuity and various kinds of imitations. It heightened the audience into a humor that had not before been experienced and won for the orchestra some of the very hearty plaudits. In the performance of the suite there was a rare amount of finesse and refinement, yet all due chic, all of which culminated in the aggregated excellence of a united effort.

The concert had for its overture Beethoven's Leonore "No. 3." The right chronological order of these important overtures would still seem to be an open question, but the programme-book to the contrary notwithstanding it would appear that overture No. 2 was composed in 1805 and not in 1806 in which year the overture performed last evening was composed.

An interesting note which the programme does not contain may be found in a letter which Beethoven's biographer, Mr. Alexander H. Thayer, wrote to the New York Tribune, March 5, 1888. It refers to Beethoven's intention regarding the well-known trumpet signal that is a popular characteristic in each of the three overtures. As the opera was given in 1805-6, the closing scene was down in the dungeons of the prison. "When the signal is first given," says Mr. Thayer, "it is heard lightly, because all the doors and passages are supposed to be closed. On repetition these are all open and the crowd is rushing into the vaults. The increased loudness of the trumpets shows Pizarro that the time to commit murder is now passed." The reading of this overture differed very materially from any other that has been heard here. The allegro was taken at a tempo that often dragged, yet which was either hurried or retarded in accordance with an exceedingly inappropriate tempo rubato. At the concert one week from next Saturday evening Monsieur Henri Martean, violinist, will appear; the overture will be Goldmark's "In the Spring;" and Rad's "In Walde" symphony will end the concert.

"THE STORY IS FALSE."

Arthur Nikisch Explains the Alleged Trouble in New York.

Arthur Nikisch, the leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was seen last evening at his cosy home in Brookline.

When told the story current in New York society circles to the effect that he and his players were insulted on the occasion of their last private concert, given at the home of Mr. Harry Cannon, by being shown out by the rear entrance, Mr. Nikisch laughed and said:

"The story is false, and still it is founded upon a fact.

"There were several hundred people at the concert, and when it was over they all crowded into the hallway, and between the effort of the guests to get into their street garments and the effort of the musicians to get their instruments into their cases, the space in the hallways were well crowded.

"One of Mr. Cannon's butlers took it upon himself to show some of the musicians who were ready to take their leave out through the rear entrance, thinking that by so doing he was relieving them of the crush in the front hallway.

"One of the players misunderstood the action of the butler and expressed his indignation at being requested to leave by the rear door. The matter was at once satisfactorily adjusted by an explanation from the butler.

"The best of feeling at present exists between Mr. Cannon and the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"We will certainly keep all our engagements in New York, and we are looking forward with pleasant anticipation to our next private concert there, which is to be given at the house of ex-Secretary Whitney."

NIKISCH'S KARE ORCHESTRA

A Model Concert with Signorina Castellano and Other Talented Soloists.

The programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Company at Chickering Hall last night was in point of symmetry, contrast and interest a model one. It was as follows: Symphony No. 8..... Beethoven
Piano Concerto No. 1..... Mendelssohn
Two movements from "Faust"..... Berlioz

Violin Concerto No. 1..... Bruch
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3..... Beethoven
The soloists were Mr. T. Adamowski, one of the first violins of the orchestra, and Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a young Italian pianist, who appeared for the first time in New York at this concert. Beethoven's F major symphony, "The Little Symphony," which opened the programme, is a reflex of one of the composer's most joyous, happy-hearted moods, all the more precious because so rare. All of its lightsome humor, airy grace and delicacy and never failing charm were delightfully brought out by an interpretation and rendering admirable alike in refinement and finesse. The fairy-like allegretto in particular was given with special charm.

Just now, when Paderewski is claiming, and justly, a large share of popular attention, the advent of a new candidate for pianistic honors, who was also heralded as being worthy of them, is a matter of considerable interest and no little curiosity. Signorina Castellano, who is little more than a child in years and appearance, is nevertheless an artist of more than considerable present attainments and of great future possibilities. Her playing of the almost trivially familiar Mendelssohn concerto was marked by a repose and balance remarkable in one so young, by nice, artistic perception, and a charming feeling for contrast, and by a technique which is at once masterly and unobtrusive. Her tone is clear and brilliant, yet delicate, with a pearly, rippling quality in the scale passages, which recalls Joseffy. She was received with gratifying cordiality, and finally responded to a persistent and justifiable encore. Signorina Castellano will be heard again with pleasure, and heard often, too, one is inclined to think, as both her playing and artistic personality have that indefinable attribute we call charm.

The two movements from Berlioz's "Faust," the "Will o' the Wisp" minuet and the "Valse of Sylphs" were played with a rarely equalled dainty precision and graceful sentiment, and the audience demanded a repetition of the latter number. Mr. Adamowski, who last appeared as a soloist at these concerts two seasons ago, is an artist whose playing is marked by true artistic feeling and a contained force, none the less impressive because quiet. The two first movements of Bruch's romantic concerto, which breathe forth passion and tenderness, furnished him an opportunity of which he took every advantage, to the evident and complete satisfaction of the audience, who applauded with enthusiasm. Mr. Adamowski's tone is clear and sweet, his execution clean and facile and his style and phrasing admirable. An orchestra that can include in its ranks not alone one but several soloists of the calibre and capacity of Mr. Adamowski must needs be good.

A magnificent performance of the great "Leonore" overture, in which the work of the strings in particular was beyond all praise, brought a rarely enjoyable concert to a close. At each successive concert of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, one, as it were, "prepares for wonder and amazement"—wonder at the unvarying skill and intelligence that directs, amazement at the perfection of training and execution which produces such results. And one does not prepare in vain.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme consisted of symphony in B-flat, Haydn; "Letter Aria," from "Don Juan," Mozart; Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; aria from "Tannhauser," Act 2, Scene 1, Wagner; overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mrs. Basta Tavary was the vocalist. The playing of the orchestra Saturday evening, was really the best that has taken place under the present administration. The delightful Haydn symphony was rather vigorously handled, to be sure, and the forte passages were too loud, but there was not that element of coarseness in the rendering that usually permeates the efforts of the orchestra, an element that in the playing of the classics amounts to nothing less than grossness.

Haydn and Mozart need even a more delicate touch than the fairly conservative rendering that was given the Haydn symphony on this occasion. Nevertheless it was enjoyable when it is considered how much better it was than the usual offering by the orchestra in the classics. The Bizet suite was admirably played, Mr. Strausser giving the obligato for saxophone in the first movement, in his usually artistic and satisfying manner. The overture to "Leonore," if the allegro had not been taken so rapidly, would have been a performance recalling somewhat the superb manner of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke. It is to be hoped that the orchestra will keep up to this standard, if it cannot better it, under its present conductor.

Mrs. Tavary brought all the tact and skill of a long experience to aid her in her singing of her numbers. There is always an artistic intention in this vocalist's efforts, if the result realized is not of the best, technically. She was recalled after each aria. There will be no concert next Saturday evening, but on the following Saturday evening, Jan. 21, there will be an interesting programme, presenting Mr. Henri Martean, a young violinist, just arrived in this country, who will make his debut in New York this week. The composition that he will play at his Boston appearance is not announced.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

The eleventh symphony concert was genial, classic and quieting in the general effect of its programme; unlike too many of the concerts thus far, this season, the sound and fury-kind of music, signifying nothing, was conspicuous by its absence. The symphony was by Haydn—in B flat major, or No. 12 of the Breitkopf and Haertel collection—a work that even, yes and even forever, for that matter, should be admired for something more than its nominal value. Its venerable age seemed never more interesting, nor more nobly simple, and it was performed with all the fervency that the most fastidious listener would have demanded for it. The musical world owes much to Haydn. He was not the mere pedagogue, not simply the purest, that flippant musical opinion has frequently accredited him with being, but in both his homophony and polyphony there are interlocked in a rare degree certain epic and lyric elements of great value. Few symphonies so smack of the whole-heartedness of genius and are identified with such plastic clearness and harmonic fullness as the symphony in B flat major.

In the allegro vivace there is all the energy and strong youthful activity of a modern young athlete at his sport; and how ingenious it all is, especially at its transition period, no musician surely need be told. With the second movement, the expression becomes deeply fervent, and here we have indisputably the most beautiful movement of the symphony. It is deeply full of thought; and a devout and exalted tone pervades its strains.

The minuet has the same old formula that our grandparents in the Harvard Musical Association days used so much to admire, and with the finale there is a genial play of tones, but as is usually the case with Haydn symphonies, a deeper meaning is wanting. Many years will elapse before an estimate of Haydn's fame will cease to interfere with that just appreciation of his symphonies, which has but slightly more to do with homage than with enjoyment. The orchestral performance of the work was exceedingly good in points of tonal contrast and attention to some of the most delicate effects of light and shade, although the allegro vivace was taken at a rate of speed that was unjust if not inartistic in its effect.

The soloist for the Letter aria from Mozart's "Don Juan" and an aria from Tannhauser, Act II, Scene I, was Mme. Basta-Tavary.

Mme. Tavary, with all her vocal endowments, which are rare, and her intelligence as a musician, which is by no means mediocre, was but partially successful with the Mozart aria. Her delivery lacked straightforwardness and decision, not sincerity, for Mme. Tavary is eminently a sincere artist. She is, furthermore, gifted with a sympathetically musical nature; but, paradoxical as it may seem, her tones are always not quite true. Although Mme. Tavary is a dramatic soprano, her vocalism was offensively plegmatic in her performance of the great aria from Tannhauser, "Dich theure Halle."

There was lively, piquant and ear-catching melody and plenty of it in Georges Bizet's suite No. 1 from L'Arlesienne and it is all worked out with great ingenuity and various kinds of imitations. It heightened the audience into a humor that had not before been experienced and won for the orchestra some of the very hearty plaudits. In the performance of the suite there was a rare amount of finesse and refinement, yet all due chic, all of which culminated in the aggregated excellence of a united effort.

The concert had for its overture Beethoven's Leonore "No. 3." The right chronological order of these important overtures would still seem to be an open question, but the programme-book to the contrary notwithstanding it would appear that overture No. 2 was composed in 1805 and not in 1806 in which year the overture performed last evening was composed.

An interesting note which the programme does not contain may be found in a letter which Beethoven's biographer, Mr. Alexander H. Thayer, wrote to the New York Tribune, March 5, 1888. It refers to Beethoven's intention regarding the well-known trumpet signal that is a popular characteristic in each of the three overtures. As the opera was given in 1805-6, the closing scene was down in the dungeons of the prison. "When the signal is first given," says Mr. Thayer, "it is heard lightly, because all the doors and passages are supposed to be closed. On repetition these are all open and the crowd is rushing into the vaults. The increased loudness of the trumpets shows Pizarro that the time to commit murder is now passed." The reading of this overture differed very materially from any other that has been heard here. The allegro was taken at a tempo that often dragged, yet which was either hurried or retarded in accordance with an exceedingly inappropriate tempo rubato. At the concert one week from next Saturday evening Monsieur Henri Martean, violinist, will appear; the overture will be Goldmark's "In the Spring;" and Raff's "In Walde" symphony will end the concert.

"THE STORY IS FALSE."

Arthur Nikisch Explains the Alleged Trouble in New York.

Arthur Nikisch, the leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, was seen last evening at his cosy home in Brookline.

When told the story current in New York society circles to the effect that he and his players were insulted on the occasion of their last private concert, given at the home of Mr. Harry Cannon, by being shown out by the rear entrance, Mr. Nikisch laughed and said:

"The story is false, and still it is founded upon a fact.

"There were several hundred people at the concert, and when it was over they all crowded into the hallway, and between the effort of the guests to get into their street garments and the effort of the musicians to get their instruments into their cases, the space in the hallways were well crowded.

"One of Mr. Cannon's butlers took it upon himself to show some of the musicians who were ready to take their leave out through the rear entrance, thinking that by so doing he was relieving them of the crush in the front hallway.

"One of the players misunderstood the action of the butler and expressed his indignation at being requested to leave by the rear door. The matter was at once satisfactorily adjusted by an explanation from the butler.

"The best of feeling at present exists between Mr. Cannon and the members of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"We will certainly keep all our engagements in New York, and we are looking forward with pleasant anticipation to our next private concert there, which is to be given at the house of ex-Secretary Whitney."

NIKISCH'S RARE ORCHESTRA.

A Model Concert with Signorina Castellano and Other Talented Soloists.

The programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Company at Chickering Hall last night was in point of symmetry, contrast and interest a model one. It was as follows:

Symphony No. 8..... Beethoven
Piano Concerto No. 1..... Mendelssohn
Two movements from "Damnation de Faust"..... Berlioz

Violin Concerto No. 1..... Bruch
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3..... Beethoven

The soloists were Mr. T. Adamowski, one of the first violins of the orchestra, and Signorina Eugenia Castellano, a young Italian pianist, who appeared for the first time in New York at this concert. Beethoven's F major symphony, "The Little Symphony," which opened the programme, is a reflex of one of the composer's most joyous, happy-hearted moods, all the more precious because so rare. All of its lightsome humor, airy grace and delicacy and never failing charm were delightfully brought out by an interpretation and rendering admirable alike in refinement and finesse. The fairy-like allegretto in particular was given with special charm.

Just now, when Paderewski is claiming, and justly, a large share of popular attention, the advent of a new candidate for pianistic honors, who was also heralded as being worthy of them, is a matter of considerable interest and no little curiosity. Signorina Castellano, who is little more than a child in years and appearance, is nevertheless an artist of more than considerable present attainments and of great future possibilities. Her playing of the almost tritely familiar Mendelssohn concerto was marked by a repose and balance remarkable in one so young, by nice, artistic perception, and a charming feeling for contrast, and by a technique which is at once masterly and unobtrusive. Her tone is clear and brilliant, yet delicate, with a pearly, rippling quality in the scale passages, which recalls Joseffy. She was received with gratifying cordiality, and finally responded to a persistent and justifiable encore. Signorina Castellano will be heard again with pleasure, and heard often, too, one is inclined to think, as both her playing and artistic personality have that indefinable attribute we call charm.

The two movements from Berlioz's "Faust," the "Will o' the Wisp" minuet and the "Valse of Sylphs" were played with a rarely equalled dainty precision and graceful sentiment, and the audience demanded a repetition of the latter number. Mr. Adamowski, who last appeared as a soloist at these concerts two seasons ago, is an artist whose playing is marked by true artistic feeling and a contained force, none the less impressive because quiet. The two first movements of Bruch's romantic concerto, which breathe forth passion and tenderness, furnished him an opportunity of which he took every advantage, to the evident and complete satisfaction of the audience, who applauded with enthusiasm. Mr. Adamowski's tone is clear and sweet, his execution clean and facile and his style and phrasing admirable. An orchestra that can include in its ranks not alone one but several soloists of the calibre and capacity of Mr. Adamowski must needs be good.

A magnificent performance of the great "Leonore" overture, in which the work of the strings in particular was beyond all praise, brought a rarely enjoyable concert to a close. At each successive concert of Mr. Nikisch's orchestra, one, as it were, "prepares for wonder and amazement"—wonder at the unvarying skill and intelligence that directs, amazement at the perfection of training and execution which produces such results. And one does not prepare in vain.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme consisted of symphony in B-flat, Haydn; "Letter Aria," from "Don Juan," Mozart; Suite No. 1 from "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; aria from "Tannhauser," Act 2, Scene 1, Wagner; overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mrs. Basta Tavary was the vocalist. The playing of the orchestra Saturday evening, was really the best that has taken place under the present administration. The delightful Haydn symphony was rather vigorously handled, to be sure, and the forte passages were too loud, but there was not that element of coarseness in the rendering that usually permeates the efforts of the orchestra, an element that in the playing of the classics amounts to nothing less than grossness.

Haydn and Mozart need even a more delicate touch than the fairly conservative rendering that was given the Haydn symphony on this occasion. Nevertheless it was enjoyable when it is considered how much better it was than the usual offering by the orchestra in the classics. The Bizet suite was admirably played, Mr. Strausser giving the obligato for saxophone in the first movement, in his usually artistic and satisfying manner. The overture to "Leonore," if the allegro had not been taken so rapidly, would have been a performance recalling somewhat the superb manner of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke. It is to be hoped that the orchestra will keep up to this standard, if it cannot better it, under its present conductor.

Mrs. Tavary brought all the tact and skill of a long experience to aid her in her singing of her numbers. There is always an artistic intention in this vocalist's efforts, if the result realized is not of the best, technically. She was recalled after each aria. There will be no concert next Saturday evening, but on the following Saturday evening, Jan. 21, there will be an interesting programme, presenting Mr. Henri Martean, a young violinist, just arrived in this country, who will make his debut in New York this week. The composition that he will play at his Boston appearance is not announced.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

GLOBE—SUNDAY, JANUARY 22, 1893—

BOSTON'S NEW MUSICAL IDOL.

HENRI MARTEAU.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|-----------------|--|
| CARL GOLDMARK. | OVERTURE in A major. "In the Spring," op. 36. |
| MAX BRUCH. | CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, No. 1, in G minor, op. 26.
I. Vorspiel: Allegro moderato. G minor.
II. Adagio. E flat major.
III. Finale: Allegro energico. G major. |
| FRANZ LISZT. | EPISODE from Lenau's "Faust." Scene in the Village Tavern. "Mephisto-Waltz."
Allegro vivace, quasi presto. A major. |
| CHARLES GOUNOD. | "VISION DE JEANNE D'ARC," for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA. |
| JOACHIM RAFF. | SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major. "Im Walde."
op. 153.
I. IN THE DAYTIME. Impressions and emotions. Allegro. F. major.
II. AT TWILIGHT. Revery: Largo. A flat major.
Dance of Dryads: Allegro assai. D minor
III. AT NIGHT. Silent weaving of the forest. Entrance and exit of the wild hunt with Dame Holle (Hulda) and Wotan. DAYBREAK: Allegro. F major. |

SOLOIST:

MONSIEUR HENRI MARTEAU.

Boston society musical circles have a new idol in Henri Marteau, who is but 18 years old. It is not that the local devotees of music love "The Human Chrysanthemum" less, but there is a fair prospect of them loving the latest addition to the ranks of celebrities among artists more, at least it will be so if all signs go not astray.

M. Marteau made his first appearance before a Boston audience yesterday afternoon at the rehearsal. He has been in this country about three months, and was the talk of Paris and London and Berlin long, long ago, but it is safe to say that the majority of the fashionables at the Symphony rehearsal and a good many of the students and amateur musicians in the audience had never heard of M. Marteau.

Some of them were even overheard wondering who the soloist was, but it did not take many bars of his first number, Bruch's lovely concerto, to prove that here was a virtuoso though almost entirely unheralded.

The slight, boyish looking youth proved a master indeed of the violin and swept everybody at once into his train of admirers, and when the last strains died away enthusiasm broke loose. Where there is usually a modicum of nice, polite or even cordial "kid-glove applause," there was a burst of enthusiasm, and it was kept up until those who counted said there had been 12 recalls, and at the last some of the girls threw their corsage postes of violets at the feet of the violinist.

M. Marteau is as magnetic and charming personally as is his playing. He speaks almost no English as yet, but converses with much fluency in his native tongue, French, and quite as volubly in German.

"Henri," as his friends among Europe's musicians all affectionately term him, was born in Rheims, France, in the spring of '74. His family was one of wealth and position, and both of his parents were leading amateur musicians of the place.

Henri's first inspiration to become a great violinist came from hearing Sivori, the famous Paganini's pupil, play at the Marteau's home when the little aspirant for honors was but 5 years old. As he grew older he was given the best teachers, Bunzl, Hubert Leonard and Garcin at the Paris conservatory.

When but 10 years old he made his first appearance in his native city, playing before an audience of 2500 people. A year or two later he went to Berlin and Vienna, and shortly afterward made a tour of France.

From his first meeting with Richter, the famous Vienna musician and teacher, the latter looked upon young Marteau as a genius. Five years ago Richter told Mr. Rudolph Aronson, who was endeavoring to secure him for an American tour, that he could not come, but that he recommended as one bound to be a success young Henri Marteau, who at that time was already creating a great deal of enthusiasm.

But Mr. Aronson had not heard of him, and through not coming at that time into personal contact with the lad nothing farther was said or done in the matter. It is really to the manager's pretty wife that America is indebted just now for its pleasure. Mrs. Aronson last summer heard M. Marteau play at a musicale in Paris, and was so charmed that she besought her husband to hear him, and that settled the matter.

Two years ago M. Marteau won a first prize at the Paris conservatory, playing Vieuxtemp's 5th concerto, the prize being one of the coveted large silver medals, in itself a work of art.

Massenet was the chief of the judges who awarded the medals, and has ever since been one of Henri's warmest admirers. So highly indeed does he think of his technique and sympathy and compelling charm as a player he is writing a violin concerto for him at the present time.

At the concert last evening there was a repetition of the pronounced favor shown M. Marteau, and a disposition on the part of the big audience not to let the soloist pass from their view at the conclusion of his numbers. He came back numerous times to bow his acknowledgments.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture in A major, "Im Frühling."

Opus 36.

Max Bruch: Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in G minor.

Opus 26.

Liszt: Episode aus Lenau's "Faust": Scene in der Dorf-Schenke (Mephisto-Walzer).

Gounod: "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for Violin and Orchestra.

Raff: Symphony No. 3, in F major ("Im Walde"), Opus 158.

Mr. Henri Marteau was the violinist.

Goldmark's overture was finely played, but the composition does not wear over-well; there is a want of geniality in the leading theme, an occasional hardness in the harmony, and, although there is not a little undeniably good work in the working-out, the thing lacks true inspiration. The second theme is the best part of its material.

Liszt's "Mephisto-Walzer" has always seemed to us one of the best things in his orchestral baggage; it has more originality than "Les Préludes"—which is characteristic of the composer only in its form and treatment, but by no means especially so in its thematic material, which latter borders dangerously upon the commonplace—and more real dash and go to it than the other symphonic poems. To be sure, it does not rise to any great musical or poetic height; but it does admirably well all that it pretends to do. It is a tone-picture of a very "glowing"—as the French would say, a very brillant—scene, treated in a spirit which is half sympathetically enthusiastic, half cynical. Here, if anywhere, Liszt shows himself as really geistreich; he is picturesque, suggestive, and expressive without tediousness, and seems for once to have had a real inspiration. The thing is written with evident gusto—a feeling in which the listener is also able to share. For one thing, this work, far more than the symphonic poems, seems to be the true prototype of most of the things Saint-Saëns has done in a similar line.

The oftener one hears the "Im Walde" the more is one impressed with it as decidedly Raff's best symphony; it has all his virtues and fewer of his faults than any other extended orchestral work of his we can call to mind. Both in musical material and workmanship, it stands markedly higher than the "Lenore" symphony, while its poetic essence is at once finer and more truly human. It lacks the "popular" element that will always make the "Lenore" the favorite with the mass of the public; poetically considered, too, its subject is less strongly appealing to the average mind than that of Bürger's dramatic ballad. But the "popular" side of Raff's genius too often has a somewhat over-strong smack of the vulgar, not to say the meretricious—faults from which neither the march nor the slow movement of the "Lenore" are wholly free. And one of the most pleasant points in the "Im Walde" is that, with all its finer material and stouter workmanship, with all its more truly poetic atmosphere, it is just as individual in accent, just as unmistakably characteristic of the composer as anything he ever wrote. The middle part (working out) and coda of the first movement are equal to the best work of the sort Raff has done anywhere in his chamber music, which is saying a good deal. In the corresponding part of the "Lenore," on the other hand, he sinks more than once down to the rather helpless level of Rubinstein. The Scherzo (Dance of Dryads) is a gem; nothing could be more dainty and at the same time more spirited than those little passages in double-tonguing for the wooden wind. Mr. Nikisch made a heroic, but in every way admirable, cut in the last movement—in which, as a certain German critic once said, Raff, out of respect for the sonata-form, had made the day break twice on the same morning—a cut which infinitely improves the movement. There was really no artistic sense in making Wotan and Frau Holle go through their "wild hunt" all over again, after they had once bagged their game and departed. Can it have been that Raff (who once wrote a pamphlet on the "Wagner Question") had got it ineradicably fixed in his mind that Wotan was a person who always did everything at least twice? Mr. Nikisch cuts the second edition of the "wild hunt;" would that all conductors might follow him in this! The day-break and sunrise with which this movement ends are a positive master-stroke; here Raff has done successfully what no other orchestral composer we know of has succeeded in doing: he has brought back a bit of sentimental cantilena (the second theme of the first movement) in glowing apotheosis fashion at the end of a stirring final climax, and made it sound really strong and grand. From Flotow's overture to "Martha" to Reineck's overture to "König Manfred," we can recall no other instance of this sort of thing being done without a certain weakness that borders on the ludicrous. Raff has done it really powerfully and impressively! The whole symphony was admirably played.

Mr. Henri Marteau, the young violinist (we believe he is only twenty) made an exceedingly fine impression. His tone is unusually large, brilliant and penetrating, and holds its own against the orchestra with perfect ease. His technique is extremely brilliant and sure, and he plays with contagious warmth of sentiment. His phrasing is, if not invariably, yet generally artistic and musical. In short, the young man evidently, has very conspicuous and unusual talent; he is born and bred to his business! A certain immaturity, a lack of repose and perfect mastery over himself, are only natural—thank heaven he is human and not a monstrosity! But his playing has infinite charm, and is full of high artistic quality. One regrets that he has begun starring quite so early; for he has still something to learn that can best be acquired through patient, retired study, and can hardly be learnt at all in the concert room; and his talent is so plainly above the ordinary run that it is worth cultivating to the highest pitch. His playing of the fine Bruch concerto was admirable, and created the wildest enthusiasm in the audience. Gounod's "Vision of Joan of Arc" is a sort of thing that it is gratifying to have dedicated to one (it is dedicated to Mr. Marteau) from a famous composer; but it cannot be quite so gratifying to have to play it, and it is certainly no gratification at all to have to listen to it. It has the virtue of brevity—a virtue which it would have been easy to increase still further—and is undeniably a charming piece of tone-color; but it is hardly strong enough to hold together even with Mr. Marteau's playing.

The next programme is: Schumann, symphony No. 1, in B-flat major; Paderewski, concerto for pianoforte, in A minor; MacDowell, two poems for orchestra—I. "Hamlet," II. "Ophelia;" Wagner, Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg." Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski will be the pianist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Francis Wilson's "Lion Tamer" at the Globe.

M. Henri Marteau's Triumphant Debut at the Symphony Concert—Third Paderewski Recital—The Busoni Programmes—The Heinrich Concerts—Scharwenka's Coming.

The soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, the 12th of the present season's series, was M. Henri Marteau, a young French violinist, who made his first appearance here on this occasion.

M. Marteau is a very young man, being credited with having gained his present prominence at the age of 19, but he has the qualities of maturity in his playing, and has no call to ask consideration on account of his lack of experience upon the concert stage.

In this age of technical studies his mastery of his violin in this particular is not calculated to surprise the hearer, but the breadth of style, the finished and artistic elegance which characterizes all his playing, and the beauty of his phrasing, all combine to stamp him as an artist of remarkable merit.

His stage presence is calculated to gain him the good will of any audience, as the pose he assumes is easy and graceful, his bowing free and sure and his figure commanding, despite his evident youth.

He gets a large, and at all times faultlessly true tone, and, with the exception of occasionally forcing his strings beyond a musical quality in the stranger passages his playing gives rare pleasure.

He chose the concerto in G minor, by Max Bruch, for his first appearance, and won a well deserved recognition of his eminent abilities after each of its movements. The vorspiel was played in a grand, broad fashion, and the lovely adagio was sung up on the instrument with admirable taste and expression. In the brilliant finale the technical attainments of the player had a fine display, so much so that he was given a great ovation and recalled many times to acknowledge the applause from both audience and orchestra.

Of the "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," composed by Gounod for this violinist, the composer could say, with Gilbert's Bunthorne, "A poor thing, but mine own." However, it was daintily played by M.

HENRI MARTEAU.

Marteau as his second contribution to the programme, and the reputation of the composer made it a septable.

The work of the orchestra in the concerto calls for the highest commendation, as a better support for the soloist could hardly have been supplied.

The orchestral numbers on the programme of the evening were the overture "In the Spring," Goldmark; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt, and the symphony, "Im Walde," R. ff.

The selections seemed a bit out of season for spring scenes, and thoughts of the woods were not in keeping with the atmospheric condition of the outside world. Despite this fact the programme gave great pleasure by reason of its many brilliant characteristics. The Goldmark overture is an excellent example of the ability of this master of tone color, and the playing of the composition under Mr. Nikish's baton fairly challenged criticism.

The "Faust" episode by Liszt had a most fascinating performance, the real thing given it realizing all its ever varying suggestions in the most enjoyable fashion.

Raff's "Im Walde" symphony has always been popular here, and deservedly so, as it is a notable success in the line of programme music, and appeals to even the unimaginative mind by reason of its tuneful characteristics and wonderfully clever orchestration. It was capably played throughout.

At next Saturday evening's concert Mr. Paderewski is to be the soloist, and the programme will include Schumann's symphony No. 1, in B flat; Paderewski's concerto for pianoforte, in A minor; MacDowell's poems for orchestra, I. Hamlet, 2. "Ophelia," soli for pianoforte, and Wagner's vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger."

HENRI MARTEAU.

The Career of an Eighteen-Year-Old Violinist.

A Sketch of the Soloist of Tonight's Concert.

Applauded Throughout Europe, He Visits the United States.

Henri Marteau, the eminent violinist, who plays this evening at the Symphony concert in Music Hall, arrived at the Parker House late Thursday night in company with Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Aronson. A representative of the Journal called on Mr. Marteau yesterday and obtained from him the following account of his life, the most complete account that has as yet appeared in an American newspaper. Besides his native language, Mr. Marteau speaks German fluently. As he has at present but a scanty knowledge of English, the languages spoken during the interview were French and German. Mr. Marteau is a young man of simple manners. He is frank and direct in speech, modest in bearing, and of winning personality. Here is his picture taken from a Parisian photograph; and it is an excellent likeness.

M. HENRI MARTEAU.

Henri Marteau was born at Reims, France, the 31st of March, 1874. His father was an amateur violinist, a man of wealth and the President of the Philharmonic Society of the town; his mother was a pianist and a pupil of Clara Schumann. When Henri was about five years old Ernest Camillo Sivori, the famous pupil of the only Paganini, visited his parents, and as the boy heard him play, he exclaimed, after the manner of Correggio, "And I, too, will be a violinist!" Sivori himself chose a violin fit for such tiny hands.

The first teacher of Henri Marteau was Bunzl, a Swiss and a pupil of Molique. After three years' preparation Henri went to Paris and there he studied with Hubert Leonard, who was fond of him.

Henri's first appearance in public was in Reims in April, 1884, when he made his debut before an audience of 2500. He then played with the orchestra Leonard's concerto No. 5. In 1885 or 1886 (Mr. Marteau told the Journal representative that he was not sure of the year) he made his appearance at Kroll's Theatre in Berlin. In December, 1887, he played the Bruch concerto (No. 1) in Vienna. In 1888-9 he made a tour in France and played pieces by Bruch, Gounod, Mendelssohn, Sarasate, Schumann, Vieuxtemps, Leonard. In March, 1889, he was at Monte Carlo, where he played the Mendelssohn concerto and pieces by Ernst and Elter. In June, 1888, he was applauded in St. James Hall, London.

Marteau revisited Berlin in November, 1890, and appeared at the Singakademie. He played the Mendelssohn concerto; the Paganini capriccio, A minor; a mazurka by Wieniawski and a romance by Viardot. He gave concerts in Dresden in January and February, 1891. In one concert he was associated with Amalie Joachim. His concert selections were Bach's chaconne, Saint-Saen's third concerto, a sonata by F. W. Rust (1739-1796) and pieces by Dubois, Gounod, Leonard, Vieuxtemps, Wieniawski.

It was in April, 1891, that Marteau played for the first time in France, the violin concerto of Johannes Brahms. This was at Angers. In November of the same year he played it in Geneva. In December, 1891, he was at Antwerp.

It was in 1892 that Marteau was a first prize of the Paris Conservatory. He entered as a pupil of Garcin. His associate in the honor were Miss Jaffe, Boucherit, Tracol and Belville. The piece selected by the committee, of which Massenet was Chairman, was Vieuxtemps's fifth concerto, A minor. The glowing tribute then paid by Arthur Rougin to Marteau deserves a separate paragraph.

"As for M. Marteau, who was a pupil of Leonard before he entered the Conservatory, he is a finished artist. His performance is characterized by delicacy and elegance, his style is broad and grand, his phrasing is exquisite, his technique is above reproach. There is nothing wanting in color, heat or fire. In a word, his performance is almost perfection."

Mr. Marteau will play this evening in Music Hall Bruch's first concerto and a piece by Gounod, who took a veritable interest in him, selecting him to perform the violin obbligato in a piece composed expressly for the Joan of Arc centenary at Reims in 1885 entitled "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," and which Gounod dedicated to Marteau. Massenet is now writing a concerto for Marteau, and Brahms, Ambroise Thomas, Bruch, Richter (under whose conductorship he has performed in London and Vienna) take the greatest interest in his career.

When Leonard died Marteau became the owner of the favorite Italian violin of his master.

Marteau is engaged for 50 concerts in this country. He will go as far West as Chicago. He was anxious to play the Brahms concerto here, for he studied it under the supervision of the composer, but it was thought best that he should make his first appearance in the popular concerto of Bruch.

164

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It was an exciting concert from beginning to end, and although the programme was longer than usual, the interest of the auditor was not suffered to flag for an instant. Saturday's concert may therefore be spoken of as one of the best of the entire series. Goldmark's "Spring" overture is not of the effeminate, cloying style that is a defect in some of his works; its opening phrase, a three-noted figure from dominant to tonic and back, bursts forth with a heartiness that at once gives a clue to the boisterous heartiness that is to rule. The work is not without contrast however, and there are some celestial passages which picture ecstasy a la Wagner, on the violins in the highest positions. Touches of drone-bass, and other conventional portrayals of rusticity appear, but the work is so robust and exhilarating that one can readily excuse a lack of novelty. The performance was appropriately brusque. The violins began with an incisive power (it sounded like sull' ponticello work) that gave the keynote to the entire performance, which was brilliant from this sudden entrance, to the fiery Coda. The flute did especially artistic work in this number.

Boston is tending toward musical polytheism. A second object of worship has arisen in the concert room. This time it is a violinist—the Paderewski of the catgut. Henri Marteau is yet a youth, but he is an artist in whose work no trace of juvenility can be discerned. He presented his visiting card in the shape of Bruch's G minor concerto, and long before he had finished the introductory movement every one knew that a great artist was on the platform. He played the work as if he loved it, and there is certainly much to love in its stately measures.

The first movement, which may be called almost an improvised introduction, demands far more than mere technique from the performer; it requires dramatic instinct, and a broad, declamatory style; the arpeggios and other brilliant passages, here become a means and not an end; it is the French style applied to a German purpose. It is in such a movement that one can best judge of an artist, for here the individual nature speaks most freely. M. Marteau achieved his great success in this important movement.

The gem of the work, musically considered, is the Adagio. What a wealth of expression there is in the sub-theme here! How it appears in constantly new guises, on the G string, in canonic imitations between soloist and orchestra, and in tenderest pianissimo! Here was the romantic side of the artist, and it proved more abundantly equipped even than the dramatic. The finale has just a touch of war and heroism in its bold measures, and it was very natural for Bruch, who may be called the Tyrtæus of modern music, to employ this vein; its dashing measures are the truly technical part of the great concerto. Constant double-stopping, difficult skips, furious runs are everywhere present. Again the artist made a triumph, and the recalls which followed showed an enthusiasm on the part of the audience that was entirely in place.

One may commend the choice made by the young violinist for his introductory number, for the three contrasted styles of its movements afford the most abundant opportunity to judge of the soloist who undertakes it, and musically the concerto is not far behind the great one by Beethoven, and may certainly be ranked with the famous Mendelssohn concerto. Not as much can be said of the second number of M. Marteau; it was Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," a treacherous bit which the artist gave with appropriate sentimentality, but which seemed terribly diaphanous after the powerful concerto. The public, however, as is often the case, preferred molasses to music, and five recalls followed the termination of the sweet effusion.

The orchestra played finely in the concerto, and continued its excellent work throughout the concert. The "Mephisto Waltz" was as full of diablerie as the wildest sensationalist could wish. It is a fine study of tone-color, if nothing else, and its eerie character lost nothing in the interpretation. The ensemble was surprisingly good, for the work fairly bristles with syncopations and rhythmic difficulties, and these were overcome in excellent style. The violoncello, flute, and harp solos were finely executed, and deserve especial mention. Mr. Schuecker was most brilliant in the last named.

Raff's "Im Walde" symphony ended the concert. It is the best of the symphonies of this master, as the "Lenore" is the most popular. The first movement was beautifully shaded, and the rich modulations of the figure of two notes (like the chief figure of the "Spring" symphony, which began the concert, this is simply the dominant and tonic) were expressively rendered. The clarinette did excellent work in its important phrases in the Reverie, and the flute fioriture against the theme on the strings were finely played and with judicious balance. The "Dance of the Dryads" gave splendid opportunity to the woodwind, and the blending of the pretty skipping phrases with the pizzicato effects was perfect. That uncomfortable Northern deity, Frau Hulda, rode around in the finale in the usual sensational manner. Raff is fond of musical equestrianism, for both in the "Lenore" symphony and in this work the auditor is treated to a horse-back ride. One cannot say, however, that the realism of Berlioz or the dash of Wagner in the same kind of cavalry work is attained. This is, however, one of the very best of the Raff finales, for in this movement of his symphonies one often finds Raff rather too diffuse.

That Raff was master of the symphonic form is undeniable; he shows it in the first movement of this very symphony. But his love of programme effects is not a merit, and just such a symphony leads the non-musician to expect a story in every instrumental work. Beethoven, to be sure, opened the door to this, but it is a defect all the same. When classical instrumental music endeavors to picture definite things, it is not so powerful as painting or poetry, and it by choice, becomes the weakest in the sisterhood of arts. The fact needs frequent statement, for the laity still prefer Beethoven's weak Sixth symphony to his strong Seventh, and Raff's "Im Walde" does not take the public out of the woods in this popular misunderstanding of the true scope and mission of music.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The following bit from a private letter touches the Symphony concert of Saturday evening. We see often the criticism of experts, but isn't it interesting to see how a delicate intelligence, not musical, is affected by such music? Hereto is the tone of reflection the bit suggests:

"We enjoyed the concert very much—it was so very, very beautiful, and so dramatic. I like dramatic music, music that describes action, for this enables me to follow as I cannot the more philosophical music, because of my ignorance of technicalities—but this evening I was happy. We had a scene from 'Faust,' and a most beautiful symphony in three parts—'Daylight, Emotions and Impressions'—this was too vague for me, but beautiful—'Twilight, Reverie and Dryads' dance,' and last, 'Night—the silent weaving of the forest with Dame Hulda and Wotan—Daybreak.'"

This last part was most intelligible and beautiful—the dark forest and the gently heaving and weaving branches, the gradually nearing sound of the hunt, the wild music and the passing away, and at last the darkness and the murmur of trees. Then came some shrill sounds, faint at first and few—then one could really hear the screech of dawn. A brook seems to shake itself loose with bubbles like musical bells—the harmony becomes grand and heroic—one knows that the Almighty Giver has arisen once more to display his Creator's power. I wish you could have heard it all; I am not fanciful but I seemed to be in the forest guided by Keat's nightingale."

The composer himself would have been glad of this delicate appreciation. Usually "descriptive music" describes one thing as well as another, unless you know in advance what it is going to describe; but this Raff symphony is no doubt an exception.

AMONG THE MUSICIANS.

The reception accorded to the young violinist, Henri Marteau, who made his first appearance in this city as the soloist of the twelfth symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening, was most hearty and well merited. All that has been said of his successes, which have fired the enthusiasm of the musical centres of Europe can no longer be doubted, he is an artist of a rare type and plays with the quiet ease of a master. There is a breadth, power and musical sentiment in his playing seldom met with in the greatest artists, and his tone, rich, warm and of perfect smoothness, is simply exquisite, leaving little to be desired, and promises for him a most brilliant future career. He is quite young in years, having been born in Reims, France, in 1874, and showed signs of his musical genius at the age of 5, though it was not until April, 1884, that he made his public debut before an audience of 2500 in his native city. His stage presence is easy and graceful and he has a bright and winning face. He chose for his first number Bruch's concerto in G minor for violin. There was a perceptible nervousness which soon wore away and he played the Vorspiel with broad and technical skill. The adagio was full of expression and refinement; in the finale the purity of his tones were remarkable, and his runs and chromatics were given with great rapidity and evenness of bow. The second number, Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," and which was dedicated to Marteau by the composer, was played in a dainty and charming manner, full of thoughtful expression. At the conclusion of each of his numbers, a perfect ovation was accorded him to which he gracefully bowed acknowledgement. The rest of the programme consisted of overture in A minor, "In the Spring," by Karl Goldmark, which was given in Mr. Nikisch's best manner. The "Mephisto Waltz" by Listz, is one of the liveliest of Listz's orchestral tone-pictures, and was played with life and color. The long cello part was excellently done. Raff's "Im Walde" is full of picturesque and poetic beauty, and that highly colored orchestration in which Raff delights, and was a fitting ending to a thoroughly enjoyable programme. Next Saturday evening and Friday rehearsal Mr. Ignace Paderewski will be the soloist.

165

Twelfth Symphony Concert.

The principal feature at the symphony rehearsal and concert was the introduction of a young violinist, Henri Marteau, whose fame abroad, to judge from his performances here, has been justly earned. He is a youth of about 19 years of age, but young as he is, he is an artist "to the finger tips."

He is modest in bearing and boyish in appearance, and his bright, smiling face instantly wins the hearts of his auditors.

His first number, Bruch's first concerto for violin, immediately showed his almost perfect command of the instrument. The opening allegro was not so smoothly played as has been heard before in this city, but this defect was evidently due to the artist's nervousness, for his subsequent adagio and finale were beautifully performed.

The purity of his tones are remarkable. His legato runs and chromatics were given with great rapidity and precision, and the evenness of his bowing was also noticeable.

At times, perhaps, he lacked power; but that is but a slight fault which time will remedy. His interpretations plainly denote his artistic and sympathetic temperament, and the digital difficulties of the piece were skillfully surmounted by the young performer.

Gounod's "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," his second number, was dedicated to young Marteau by the composer, and the charming manner in which it was performed elicited several recalls to the platform.

The artist chatted with Mr. Nikisch while waiting for the orchestra to lead off, and at the conclusion of his last solo the two indulged in hearty hand shakes.

The high attainments of young Marteau promise a brilliant career for him. The applause was spontaneous and long prolonged, especially after his second number.

Goldmark's brilliant "Spring" overture was the first selection played by Mr. Nikisch's men. The various moods of the composer were given with due dramatic effect. Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, as its name implies, is a revel of melody, broken into bits by desonants and percussion interruptions, and the dash and vim with which it was played imparted to it all the tone coloring required. The long cello parts were capitally given.

Raff "Im Walde" symphony, with its picturesque and poetic orchestration, served as a delightful finale to the concert.

AMUSEMENTS. Aug 13/92

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Nikisch's most interesting concert, the third of this winter's New York series, was attended by an audience that tested to the utmost the seating capacity of Chickering Hall. A perfectly rounded and satisfactory programme was played, beginning with Beethoven's eighth Symphony. This is one of the symphonies that possesses the greatest continued charm. The fifth and the seventh, with this one, make up the trinity of greatest beauty among the symphonies. That heavenly calm and serene majesty which are the characteristics of the symphony given last evening were set forth in their highest power by Mr. Nikisch's excellent judgment in tempi and from the absolute and rigid command in which he holds his band. The time in which each movement was set seemed slower than most renditions that we are accustomed to, but there can be no doubt of the good resultant effect. It is remarkable, too, how each set of instruments, each choir, effaces itself in turn, as the music demands, leaving its neighbor room to come into prominence for the moment. In this way the most exquisite variety of tone color and of variety in expression are produced. Nikisch plays upon his orchestra as though that were his instrument and he the virtuoso.

Not the least interesting and exciting part of last night's concert was the debut before our public of Signorina Castellano, a young Italian pianist, who, though only 16 years old, has played often in Italy with the largest orchestras, and now comes to win fame in our country. Her natural gifts are of the highest. She seems endowed with every attribute that is necessary to the grandest success in her art, and there can be no doubt that she will meet it. Her reception last evening and the enthusiastic encore, where the applause was undiminished after two recalls, testified the delight of her hearers. Signorina Castellano played Mendelssohn's G minor concerto, with orchestra taking the first movement and the last at a tempo which would be impossible to any pianist that was not endowed with a marvellous facility. This indeed, she has in an extraordinary measure. Her technique is perfect and absolutely astonishing. There is immense strength and an unending supply of nervous force. Her serenity is undisturbed in the midst of the greatest physical exertion, and the union of fire and dash with dignified reserve is something rarely if ever before found in a woman pianist. As an encore "La Castellano" played a presto by Turini not known to our concert rooms. Much of her music has the charm of novelty as well as of beauty, as will be heard in her recitals that are soon to take place.

Mr. Adamowski, the favorite violinist of Boston, played two movements from Bruch's G minor concerto with that ease, elegance, and precision which have won for him an enviable position in the world of art.

What gave most piquant pleasure to the audience was probably the two extracts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," the minuet of the "Will-o-the-Wisps," and the "Waltz of the Sylphs." The latter was played in such a manner as to be beyond criticism. None but words that would sound very like flattery could be applied to the performance of this most dainty and delicate bit of orchestration. It represents the sylphs, who have, at Mephistopheles' bidding, brought to the sleeping Faust dreams of love and Marguerite, as gliding and dancing away through the air after the performance of their magic task. The audience redemanded this fairy-like bit, which was played so deliciously as to be equal in rendering to the perfection of its composition.

It should be announced that a sudden and severe cold will prevent Mrs. Nikisch from appearing at the Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon and Saturday evening. Mme. Basta Tavery will sing the "Non mi dir" from "Don Giovanni," and Elizabeth's aria from "Tannhäuser."

The fourth Symphony concert of the Boston Orchestra will take place on Thursday evening, Feb. 8.

Henri Marteau, who has captured musical Boston at one fell swoop, received one of the most noteworthy compliments that has been paid an artist in this city. It will be recalled that the Symphony orchestra is wont to lavish its applause on every soloist that plays or sings at the Saturday night concerts; indeed, the more indifferent the performance, the louder tap the bows on the leading violinists' desks. Many and many a time have the men of the orchestra saved an artist and fanned the audience into a species of enthusiasm by applauding. In short, the discriminating auditor has come to regard the Symphony orchestra as a sort of "claque," and its applause as meaningless; but the other night, after the masterly playing of the Bruch concerto, the first violins sat quite undemonstrative and allowed the expensive audience to wear out its hands and feet in recalling this charming youth who had taken it by storm. Possibly these gentlemen felt they were unequal to the occasion. For once a boy of genius stood among their ranks, and it so surprised them to hear the violin played in this fashion they thought any applause at their hands—or bows—was not necessary. Silence is eloquent, but, as it can be interpreted in several ways, it is sometimes safer to make signs that shall indicate what is believed; otherwise an observer might fancy jealousy was the cog that held back the wheels of emotion. No incident in the eleven seasons of Boston's Symphony concerts has made the stir which young Marteau's performance has done, and the spirit in which the violinists received it has made it doubly noteworthy.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Twelfth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

Henri Marteau, Violinist, Plays and Conquers.

In Memoriam—Julius Eichberg, Violinist and Teacher.

The programme of the twelfth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture—"In the Spring," op. 36.....Goldmark
Concerto for violin No. 1, G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Mephisto Waltz.....Liszt
"Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for Violin and Orchestra, Gounod
Symphony No. 3 ("Im Walde"), op. 153.....Raff

Goldmark once delighted in musical pictures of strange lands and strange men and women, that swooned alike under a blazing sun. He dreamed of Balkis, the Queen of Sheba, and her wild desire to see the court of Solomon. He was an Oriental, studying devoutly the Kama Sutra. He wandered in Shushan in the third year of the reign of the King Ahasuerus, and he sat at the feast in the court of the garden of the King's palace, "where were white, green and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble; the beds were of gold and silver upon a pavement of red and blue and white and black marble." He, too, coveted the beauty of Tamar.

And so his music was full of sandal wood and pungent incense, camels and nodding palms, long-bearded men that knew the languages of the animals, women that were courted by the Barmecides. And the hot sun struck fiercely his notes and turned them into mingled blood and wine. That was the Goldmark of "Sakuntala" and the "Queen of Sheba." The Goldmark of the "Spring overture" is an excellent and amiable musician who writes pretty and agreeable music. His name might be Schmidt, Schulz or Mueller. I prefer the Goldmark of the inexorable desert, the bird-haunted forest, the player to the graceful movements of heavy-eyed dancing girls.

The music of this concert was largely descriptive and romantic. Spring means something to an Englishman or a dweller on the Continent. We have no spring in staid New England. There is a dangerous leap from winter to summer, and the realistic music of accompaniment is a cacophony of coughs.

The "Mephisto Waltz" is an indecent setting of a lewd text. This episode in Lenau's

"Faust" is coarse and brutal; musical embellishment does not better it. Liszt's music is not without strength; the strength is the strength of Diogenes. The beauty is momentary and infrequent; morbid, it is akin to the charm of a poem by Baudelaire on "Carrion" or "Spleen."

The symphony gave great pleasure. There was no need of following Raff's directions for proper enjoyment. The music may have meant this or it may have portrayed that; the success of the portrayal is immaterial; the music itself, particularly in the first three movements, fascinates and holds the hearer.

The performance of the orchestra was admirable from the beginning to the end. In solo passages and in ensemble there was almost nothing to be desired. In beauty of conception and in perfection of performance the concert of Saturday evening was the finest of the present series.

The solo violinist was Henri Marteau. The story of the career of this remarkable young man was told at length in the Journal of Saturday, and there is no need of referring to his triumphs in France, Germany and England. Besides we have heard him.

Marteau does not need the rare charm of his personality. He could be older by many years, for in his performance there is no suggestion of the wonder-child. He could conquer without the aid of his handsome face with dangerous dimples; without the impression made by his manly, nervous and aristocratic bearing. Were he the Gwynplaine of Victor Hugo, the hearer would not notice the carve and eternal laugh. The ugliest of singers charmed thousands by the passion of his song, and the greatest Arsace was hi-cious to the view.

But when such physical attractions and such modesty of bearing are added to supreme musical gifts and acquirements, then indeed must the violinist be irresistible.

This young man was fortunate, it is true, in his teachers. There was Hubert Leonard, who succeeded Charles de Beriot. There was Garcin, the pupil of Alard. Marteau has also enjoyed the counsel of colleagues and composers.

But Marteau has one thing that cannot be given by the most experienced teacher. It is not to be learned in private lesson or in long-established conservatory. Intimate knowledge of tradition is here or no avail.

For this young man has the sacred fire of genius.

Destiny promised him at his birth that he could go forth into the world and by his violin draw all hearts unto him.

Nor is he merely an emotional player, of rare technique and fastidious ear. He plays with breadth and he is not dominated by an heroic role. He is master of the situation. He sounds the entire gamut of human passion.

His strength is never brutal. His virility is never muscularity. His tenderness is not effeminacy.

He does not play to the eye. He does not call attention to a difficulty. The good old cantor and organist Karl August Haupt—now at rest—would have seen in him the living exemplification of his advice to a pupil. "When you come to a trying passage you should persuade the hearer by your ease and accuracy that it is the simplest passage in the composition."

There are excellent violinists that honor this town by choosing it as the home of their adoption. Wandering stars of the first magnitude have brightened our sky for a night. But an audience in Music Hall has not been so thoroughly captivated by a violinist since the apparition of Martin Melton Sarasate.

And yet the joy of greeting a master is lessened by the thought of the departure from us.

168
the same week, of one of the most revered musicians of this country. Many in this city remember the beauty and the purity of the performance of the violinist. Hundreds acknowledge gratefully the sound and wise instruction that came from him.

Set oration or solemn funeral line would be distasteful to Julius Eichberg. It was his custom of an afternoon, when he was through with the exhausting labors of the day, to sit at ease in the club, where he was loved and respected from the time of its foundation. There would he talk on subjects musical, on topics of the day. There would he tell of musicians of the past. There would he give kind and unostentatious advice, which is now doubly precious. There would he parry jest and speak in epigram.

His use of English was most felicitous. One adjective would color a terse and witty sentence. He was a master of sarcasm, which, however, was only used in denunciation of that which was hypocritical, mean or impure. He scorned pretence and affectation. He was the champion of the unrecognized deserving, and of the humble, and of the oppressed.

His learning was never openly exposed. It crept into his conversation almost secretly and shame-faced, for great was the modesty of the man.

To the very last he was faithful in the discharge of his duty. He had exchanged the passing glory of the virtuoso for the enduring honor of the teacher. Although fatigued, he did not complain. That noble head was not bowed; those piercing eyes were not dimmed. The wit was nimble. The heart was great with kindness.

Now that he has left us there seems to be less music in this world, and nature itself seems less kindly. But surely such energy, such courage, such nobility and purity of life are not now extinct.

"O strong soul, by what shore
Tarriest thou now? For that force
Surely, has not been left vain!
Somewhere, surely, afar,
In the sounding labor-house vast
Of being, is practiced that strength,
Zealous, beneficent, firm."

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening, with the assistance of Mr. Henri Marteau, soloist. The programme was as follows:

Overture in A major. "In the Spring." Goldmark.
Concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor. Max Bruch.

"Mephisto Waltz".....Liszt.
"Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for violin and orchestra.....Gounod.
Symphony No. 3, in F major. "Im Walde".....Raff

The event of the evening was the appearance here for the first time of Mr. Henri Marteau, a young violinist who has already acquired an enviable reputation in Europe. One must speak in the highest terms of this youthful player for he possesses all the acquirements of the mature artist. His tone is broad, his technique extraordinary and wonderfully brilliant, his intonation remarkably correct, and his repose that of the consummate artist. His musical temperament embraces all the elements that are necessary in an æsthetic nature of the highest degree; his playing is characterized by delicacy, a beauty of sentiment and refinement, as well as a noble and virile manner, imparting manliness and breadth to his interpretations. His style is finished in the extreme. He was recalled five times after the Bruch concerto.

The orchestra played much better than usual, and if it had not been for the overblowing of the brass, the results would have been gratifying.

Next Saturday evening Mr. Paderewski will play his concerto in A minor, and there will be in the programme two poems for orchestra by Mr. MacDowell, our townsman, entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," respectively. Schumann's Symphony No. 1 and the "Vorspiel" from Wagner's "Meistersingers" will complete the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC. Corner

THE SYMPHONY.

Carl Goldmark, Max Bruch, Franz Liszt, Charles Gounod and Joachim Raff were the composers represented at the twelfth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening. The overture was that in A major entitled "In the Spring," by Carl Goldmark. It was the jocose fancy of the late Sterndale Bennett that the well known fondness of German composers for Frühlingslieder or spring songs was owing to the fact that Germany had no springs and that their tone-pictures of this favorite season were more derived from the idealization of poets than from reality; but as has been well said there must have been a vernal season in Vienna when Goldmark penned his opus 36 or "In the Spring" overture. It seemed somewhat incongruous of Mr. Nikisch to select at this season of the year a programme that contained two such works as the one by Goldmark referred to and the symphony "Im Walde," by Raff. The best parts of the overture are with its bright and tuneful theme of the allegro; the contrapuntal embellishment of the antithetical theme and the attending imitation of the singing of birds; the broadly flowing and impassioned melody that soon follows which is complimented by a series of sequences treated in the manner of a duet between strings and wood-wind; and the recapitulation section where the scoring becomes much fuller than before and the several subjects meet with a wide variety of treatment. The "Im Walde" symphony by Raff was first produced here at a concert given by Theodore Thomas and his orchestra Dec. 8, 1871. The first part is true in every way to the general subject of the work, cheerfully supporting as it does the exhilaration produced by the pure and aromatic air of the woods, and the joyous life of animated nature. Then follows a Twilight reverie, which opens with somewhat vague and mysterious harmonies, the strings leading to the dominant seventh chord of A flat whereupon a recitative is given out by the clarinet. This theme, taken up by harp and violas with flute accompaniment in sextuples was especially well played. Very picturesque effects were excellently reproduced by the orchestra, such as the episode in E major which follows, and where by many a various instrumental device there is represented the roaring of wild beasts. This episode gradually leads back to the principal theme sustained by solos for 'cello and viola with accompaniment by muted strings. Here is a charming bit of realism reminding one of the hum of myriads of insects. Towards the close of this we again hear the chief theme with rhythmical prolongations, during which tender strains after the manner of recitative are given out by the clarinet, somewhat as at the beginning. The second movement here forms a scherzo, allegro assai 3-4 time, D minor, entitled the Dryads' Dance. It presents reminiscences of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. With part 3 comes a "Night in the Forest," with a somewhat weird melody taken in octaves for cello and contra bass, afterwards taken up by violas and second violins. The music now becomes agitated and indicates the approach of the hunters and of Frau Holle and Wotan. The music that follows has much of the wildness and dramatic character of the spectral ride in the Lenore symphony. The theme of three measures frequently recurs with a different treatment each time, finally suggesting the departure of the hunters. Day now begins to break. Near the conclusion we have a return of one of the themes in the first part of the "Daytime" portion of the work.

169

The soloist for the concerto by Max Bruch in G minor, op. 26, was Mr. Henri Marteau, who judging alone from his performance last evening, is evidently one of the most gifted and interesting of men. Performing a masterpiece the exacting demands of which have long been known among violinists, he was yet enabled to conceal his own impressions of its difficulty and to become so absorbed in his interpretation, that while the eye was gratified by the virtuosity he displayed, the ear was none the less charmed. It was the performance of a young prodigy, it is true, but its traits were so identical with what one might expect from an experienced master that the accomplishment may justly be referred to as phenomenal. The composer has indeed aimed in this work at accumulating all intricate and skilful devices of complex passage writing, yet the voluptuary of all this is clothed with many an ingenious and gaudy device. There was also a rich healthful vein of sentiment in young Marteau's performance which was none the less charmingly true to nature than invariably artistic. In brief, his first playing in this city afforded abundant proof not only of his technical proficiency and his possession of a rare amount of artistic individuality, but alike of his poetic sense and his refined culture.

Young Marteau was born in Reims, France, in 1874. He made his debut in 1884 at Reims before an audience of nearly three thousand persons. Since then he has performed in Paris, London, Vienna, Berlin and other large cities and invariably with very much the same success that attended his Boston debut last evening, where everyone present could but have realized that all heralding of his European fame had been amply fulfilled, and the enthusiasm of the audience was raised to the highest pitch. Following the concerto the orchestra played the Mephisto Waltz in the episode from Lenau's "Faust," by Franz Liszt,—which was time wasted upon a thoroughly bad work—after which Mr. Marteau again appeared and with great charm interpreted with the orchestra the "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," by Charles Gounod. The concert ended with a fine performance of the Raff symphony above quoted.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:—Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; Concerto for violin, No. 1, Max Bruch; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt; "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for violin and orchestra, Gounod; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff. The orchestra was at its very best, and its work as a whole was in advance of any that it has hitherto vouchsafed this season. The Goldmark overture, in particular, was beautifully read and played, and a strong and characteristic interpretation was given of Liszt's bit of programme bluster. The feature of the concert, however, was the first appearance here of the violinist, Henri Marteau. This young man is already entitled to a place by the side of the most eminent of contemporary violinists. He has a large and beautiful tone; a style perfect in finish; elegant yet virile, exquisitely refined, and yet broad and manly. His technique is brilliant and faultless, his bowing free, graceful and masterly; his intonation immaculately true. Fire, self-possession, dignity, immense vitality and artistic beauty of the highest order delightfully characterize his playing. He is, taken for all in all, the finest violinist who has been heard here in many a day. In all that he does he manifests the born artist, and his style is marked by the same week, of one of the most revered musicians of this country. Many in this city remember the beauty and the purity of the performance of the violinist. Hundreds acknowledge gratefully the sound and wise instruction that came from him.

Set oration or solemn funeral line would be distasteful to Julius Eichberg. It was his custom on an afternoon, when he was through with the exhausting labors of the day, to sit at ease in the club, where he was loved and respected from the time of its foundation. There would he talk on subjects musical, on topics of the day. There would he tell of musicians of the past. There would he give kind and unostentatious advice, which is now doubly precious. There would he parry jest and speak in epigram.

His use of English was most felicitous. One adjective would color a terse and witty sentence. He was a master of sarcasm, which, however, was only used in denunciation of that which was hypocritical, mean or impure. He scorned pretence and affectation. He was the champion of the unrecognized deserving, and of the humble, and of the oppressed.

His learning was never openly exposed. It crept into his conversation almost secretly and shame-faced, for great was the modesty of the man.

To the very last he was faithful in the discharge of his duty. He had exchanged the passing glory of the virtuoso for the enduring honor of the teacher. Although fatigued, he did not complain. That noble head was not bowed; those piercing eyes were not dimmed. The wit was nimble. The heart was great with kindness.

Now that he has left us there seems to be less music in this world, and nature itself seems less kindly. But surely such energy, such courage, such nobility and purity of life are not now extinct.

"O strong soul, by what shore
Tarest thou now? For that force
Surely, has not been left vain!
Somewhere, surely, afar,
In the sounding labor-house vast
Of being, is practiced that strength,
Zealous, beneficent, firm."

PHILIP HALE

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening, with the assistance of Mr. Henri Marteau, soloist. The programme was as follows:

Overture in A major, "In the Spring," Goldmark.
Concerto for violin, No. 1, in G minor, Max Bruch.
"Mephisto Waltz".....Liszt.
"Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for violin and orchestra.....Gounod.
Symphony No. 3, in F major, "Im Walde".....Raff

The event of the evening was the appearance here for the first time of Mr. Henri Marteau, a young violinist who has already acquired an enviable reputation in Europe. One must speak in the highest terms of this youthful player for he possesses all the acquirements of the mature artist. His tone is broad, his technique extraordinary and wonderfully brilliant, his intonation remarkably correct, and his repose that of the consummate artist. His musical temperament embraces all the elements that are necessary in an æsthetic nature of the highest degree; his playing is characterized by delicacy, a beauty of sentiment and refinement, as well as a noble and virile manner, imparting manliness and breadth to his interpretations. His style is finished in the extreme. He was recalled five times after the Bruch concerto.

The orchestra played much better than usual, and if it had not been for the overblowing of the brass, the results would have been gratifying.

Next Saturday evening Mr. Paderewski will play his concerto in A minor, and there will be in the programme two poems for orchestra by Mr. MacDowell, our townsman, entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," respectively. Schumann's Symphony No. 1 and the "Vorspiel" from Wagner's "Meistersingers" will complete the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

Carl Goldmark, Max Bruch, Franz Liszt, Charles Gounod and Joachim Raff were the composers represented at the twelfth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening. The overture was that in A major entitled "In the Spring," by Carl Goldmark. It was the jocose fancy of the late Sterndale Bennett that the well known fondness of German composers for Fruhlinglieder or spring songs was owing to the fact that Germany had no springs and that their tone-pictures of this favorite season were more derived from the idealization of poets than from reality; but as has been well said there must have been a vernal season in Vienna when Goldmark penned his opus 36 or "In the Spring" overture. It seemed somewhat incongruous of Mr. Nikisch to select at this season of the year a programme that contained two such works as the one by Goldmark referred to and the symphony "Im Walde," by Raff. The best parts of the overture are with its bright and tuneful theme of the allegro; the contrapuntal embellishment of the antithetical theme and the attending imitation of the singing of birds; the broadly flowing and impassioned melody that soon follows which is complimented by a series of sequences treated in the manner of a duet between strings and wood-wind; and the recapitulation section where the scoring becomes much fuller than before and the several subjects meet with a wide variety of treatment. The "Im Walde" symphony by Raff was first produced here at a concert given by Theodore Thomas and his orchestra Dec. 8, 1871. The first part is true in every way to the general subject of the work, cheerfully supporting as it does the exhilaration produced by the pure and aromatic air of the woods, and the joyous life of animated nature. Then follows a Twilight reverie, which opens with somewhat vague and mysterious harmonies, the strings leading to the dominant seventh chord of A flat whereupon a recitative is given out by the clarinet. This theme, taken up by harps and violas with flute accompaniment in sextuples was especially well played. Very picturesque effects were excellently reproduced by the orchestra, such as the episode in E major which follows, and where by many a various instrumental device there is represented the roaring of wild beasts. This episode gradually leads back to the principal theme sustained by solos for 'cello and viola with accompaniment by muted strings. Here is a charming bit of realism reminding one of the hum of myriads of insects. Towards the close of this we again hear the chief theme with rhythmical prolongations, during which tender strains after the manner of recitative are given out by the clarinet, somewhat as at the beginning. The second movement here forms a scherzo, allegro assai 3-4 time, D minor, entitled the Dryads' Dance. It presents reminiscences of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music. With part 3 comes a "Night in the Forest," with a somewhat weird melody taken in octaves for cello and contra bass, afterwards taken up by violas and second violins. The music now becomes agitated and indicates the approach of the hunters and of Frau Holle and Wotan. The music that follows has much of the wildness and dramatic character of the spectral ride in the Lenore symphony. The theme of three measures frequently recurs with a different treatment each time, finally suggesting the departure of the hunters. Day now begins to break. Near the conclusion we have a return of one of the themes in the first part of the "Daytime" portion of the work.

The soloist for the concerto by Max Bruch in G minor, op. 26, was Mr. Henri Marteau, who judging alone from his performance last evening, is evidently one of the most gifted and interesting of men. Performing a masterpiece the exacting demands of which have long been known among violinists, he was yet enabled to conceal his own impressions of its difficulty and to become so absorbed in his interpretation, that while the eye was gratified by the virtuosity he displayed, the ear was none the less charmed. It was the performance of a young prodigy, it is true, but its traits were so identical with what one might expect from an experienced master that the accomplishment may justly be referred to as phenomenal. The composer has indeed aimed in this work at accumulating all intricate and skillful devices of complex passage writing, yet the voluptuary of all this is clothed with many an ingenious and gaudy device. There was also a rich healthful vein of sentiment in young Marteau's performance which was none the less charmingly true to nature than invariably artistic. In brief, his first playing in this city afforded abundant proof not only of his technical proficiency and his possession of a rare amount of artistic individuality, but alike of his poetic sense and his refined culture.

Young Marteau was born in Reims, France, in 1874. He made his debut in 1884 at Reims before an audience of nearly three thousand persons. Since then he has performed in Paris, London, Vienna, Berlin and other large cities and invariably with very much the same success that attended his Boston debut last evening, where everyone present could but have realized that all heralding of his European fame had been amply fulfilled, and the enthusiasm of the audience was raised to the highest pitch. Following the concerto the orchestra played the Mephisto Waltz in the episode from Lenau's "Faust," by Franz Liszt, which was time wasted upon a thoroughly bad work—after which Mr. Marteau again appeared and with great charm interpreted with the orchestra the "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," by Charles Gounod. The concert ended with a fine performance of the Raff symphony above quoted.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:—Overture, "In the Spring," Goldmark; Concerto for violin, No. 1, Max Bruch; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt; "Vision de Jeanne d'Arc," for violin and orchestra, Gounod; Symphony, "Im Walde," Raff. The orchestra was at its very best, and its work as a whole was in advance of any that it has hitherto vouchsafed this season. The Goldmark overture, in particular, was beautifully read and played, and a strong and characteristic interpretation was given of Liszt's bit of programme bluster. The feature of the concert, however, was the first appearance here of the violinist, Henri Marteau. This young man is already entitled to a place by the side of the most eminent of contemporary violinists. He has a large and beautiful tone; a style perfect in finish; elegant yet virile, exquisitely refined, and yet broad and manly. His technique is brilliant and faultless, his bowing free, graceful and masterly; his intonation immaculately true. Fire, self-possession, dignity, immense vitality and artistic beauty of the highest order delightfully characterize his playing. He is, taken for all in all, the finest violinist who has been heard here in many a day. In all that he does he manifests the born artist, and his style is marked by an innate aristocratic nobility that proclaims him at once as one of the favored of those children of art who have been dowered in the cradle. His performance of the concerto was fascinating in the beauty of its sentiment, its impressive, romantic feeling, and its freedom from all that savored of affectation. We have been somewhat surfeited on violin playing, of late, but the playing of this young genius, in its high perfection of technique and style, was a new sensation, that was stimulating in effect. Many have played this concerto here before, but no one has performed it so beautifully, or has made it so well worth the hearing. At the end of the first movement, the audience expressed its surprise and delight with prolonged applause, and when the work was ended, gave way to a storm of enthusiasm, recalling the artist three times. His wonderful cantabile playing in the Gounod selection again stirred it to a fury of plaudits that did not cease until the player came forward five times to bow his acknowledgements. His success was overwhelming, and what is more, it was wholly deserved. The brilliant future of this young master is already assured. At the next concert the programme will be: Symphony, No. 1, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte, A minor, Paderewski; two poems for orchestra, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia" Mac Dowell (first time); pianoforte solos, and Wagner's "Mastersingers" overture. The soloist is Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

170

171
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ROBERT SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY, No. 1, in B flat major. op. 38.
 I. Andante un poco maestoso. B flat major.
 Allegro molto vivace. B flat major.
 II. Larghetto. F flat major.
 III. Scherzo; Molto vivace. D minor.
 Trio I. Molto più vivace. D major.
 Trio II. Same tempo as the Scherzo. B flat major.
 IV. Allegro animato e grazioso. B flat major.

IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in A minor. op. 17.
 I. Allegro. A minor.
 II. Romanza: Andante. C major.
 III. Allegro molto vivace. A major.

EDWARD A. MACDOWELL. TWO POEMS for ORCHESTRA. op. 22.
 I. HAMLET. Largamente. D minor.
 II. OPHELIA. Moderato, con tenerezza. F major.

SOLI for PIANOFORTE.

RICHARD WAGNER. PRELUDE to "Die Meistersinger von Nuremberg."
 In very moderate movement, broad and weighty throughout. C major.

SOLOIST:

MR. IGNACE J. PADEREWSKI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

The Symphony Concert.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. Mr. Paderewski was the soloist. The programme was as follows: Symphony No. 1, in B flat, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Paderewski; Two Poems for Orchestra, No. 1, "Hamlet," No. 2, "Ophelia," MacDowell; solos for pianoforte, Nocturne and Valse Brillante, Chopin; Prelude to "The Meistersinger," Wagner.

Of course the great attraction of the evening to most everyone was the appearance of Mr. Paderewski; and it was the announcement that this eminent pianist would play, that long before the day of the concert caused every ticket for sitting or standing room to be disposed of. There is nothing new to be said of the playing of this wonderful artist.

Whatever he does is sure to charm the audience. This occasion was no exception, and he was recalled again and again after the performance of each of his numbers. His concerto, played for the third time in Boston (twice by himself and once by Mrs. Rive-King), is a work that improves upon repeated hearings. The effect of this composition depends upon a happy performance of the orchestral part, which is a dominant feature of the work. On this occasion it was coarsely and noisily played, more particularly the first movement, the impression thereby being given that the work is coarse and crude in its construction, which really is not the case. Its beauties were subjected to the patois that afflicts our band, hence the unfortunate results.

The novelty of the evening, and to the real musician the most important feature of the programme, was the presentation of Mr. MacDowell's "Two Poems" for orchestra. These compositions are spontaneous and finely orchestrated, showing in every respect the hand of the inspired and competent musician. If the effect produced was disappointing to the listener, it must not be laid at the door of the composer, but to the manner in which the music was performed, a manner at once rough and boisterous, regardless of the indicated expression, and lacking in the necessary contrasts of dynamics. As delineated by the orchestra "Hamlet" seemed armed with a club, and roaring like a lion, strode about thirsting for gore. "Ophelia," however, was more considerately treated, perhaps through some possessed gallantry upon the part of the conductor. It is to be hoped that we may yet hear these compositions played under better auspices.

The Schumann-symphony, the beauties of which are familiar to our audiences through the delightful playing of the orchestra under the baton of Mr. Gericke, was not creditably performed. The wood-wind was untuneful and the brass overblown and rank in quality; even the string band did an amount of undue rasping. At no time has the inability of the tympani player to accurately tune his drums been more distressingly apparent than in the first movement of the Paderewski concerto. A loud rough and hurried performance of the Wagner prelude finished this overlong and unpraiseworthy performance, as far as the orchestra was concerned.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

ABOUT MUSIC.

Journal

The Thirteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

Hamlet and Ophelia According to Mr. MacDowell.

The Enthusiastic Tribute Paid to Ignace Paderewski.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, B flat major, Op. 38.....Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte, A minor, Op. 17.....Paderewski
Two poems for orchestra, op. 22.....MacDowell
Nocturne, Op. 37, No. 2 }Chopin
Waltz, Op. 34, No. 1 }
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" ...Wagner

Mr. Paderewski was the pianist.

Mr. Paderewski was greeted warmly when he appeared on the stage, and at the end of the concerto he was applauded with unbridled enthusiasm. Recall followed recall. There was a similar scene after the numbers by Chopin. There was again seen the amazing triumph of temperament. And yet Mr. Paderewski never appeared to less advantage in Music Hall than at the concert of Saturday evening.

His concerto does not wear well. When it was played by him last season, there was much of its material that seemed effective. Saturday evening the former favorable impression was not renewed. The pianoforte part appeared to be often meaningless, or merely a means of exhibiting bravura. The instrumentation seemed at times unnecessarily noisy and raw. The romanza seemed rambling and inconsequential, and the finale not without the pomp and the tinsel of a spectacular theatre-piece. Mr. Paderewski played with fire and brilliancy; but he frequently forced the tone, or, to speak plainly, he pounded, and without necessity.

When the concerto was first played here by Mrs. King in March, 1891, the impression then made was this: "The concerto makes severer demands upon the player's technique than mine. The bravura work is dazzling, and it would be more effective were it not almost incessant. There is little or no depth of feeling, there is but very little feigned or genuine passion. Everything lies upon the surface, to be looked at, to be praised, to be forgotten. The concerto is like a long-continued setting-off of fireworks: rockets soar upward and die in fiery agony; pinwheels revolve and throw out dazzling sparks; colored lights and Roman candles, flower pots and mines amuse and hold the attention; set pieces compel one to admire the art of the maker; the last spark is extinct, and the darkness which follows is the more intense." This impression was strengthened by the hearing of Saturday evening.

Mr. Paderewski was not in his happiest vein. His performance of the nocturne was mannered and artificial: it was without poetic feeling; it was almost wholly devoid of the marvelous pedal coloring which seems peculiar to him. Nor was his playing of the waltz as frank as on former occasions.

The virtuoso dies with his generation. His fame is a bubble. When garrulous old men shake their heads and prate of the eloquence of the jury lawyer of their youth, or of the beauty of the actress whose eyes are now dust, or of the virtuoso who thrilled them, the young sit in the seat of the scornful. "The leaf falls, but the forest remains." That which is printed has a chance of survival, and the respect of the Chinese for paper and type is not without foundation. Mozart, the virtuoso, is a myth; Mozart, the composer, dwells among us; we know his plain and lovable face; we listen eagerly to his words of humor and consolation. But who can foretell the life of a contemporaneous composition?

Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poems are called "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," and they are without a textual programme. The hearer, when he knows that the music is about the Prince of Denmark, can imagine what he pleases. He may find the wicked King therein, or Polonius; the ghost may walk the wind-swept platform; or Rosencrantz and Guildenstern may enter arm-in-arm. It has been said that everyone is convinced of his ability to play the part of Hamlet, and no two hearers would probably agree concerning Mr. MacDowell's musical delineation of the hero. Let us rather rejoice in the musical beauty of the pieces without entering into vain discussions concerning the meaning of this or that passage. These symphonic poems are not by any means the strongest of the works of MacDowell, but how full they are of romantic beauty, of charming effects, of passion under artistic restraint, of haunting melody. With what skill are the colors prepared! This man is a born musician. Music was not to him an acquired taste, like tomatoes or olives. He best expresses his thoughts in music. It is his natural means of communication with his fellows.

These poems are "sleep-chasings," to borrow the phrase of Walt Whitman. Hamlet is seen as in a dream, from which the sleeper wakes, moved, excited, but not disquieted; and he would fain dream the dream again. Personally, I prefer the "Ophelia," and yet the "Hamlet" is in height of imagination the nobler work. When I hear such programme music as this, I do not hanker after conventional and rigid molds, into which music is poured that answers the definition of Leibnitz, viz.: "Music is an occult exercise of the mind, unconsciously performing arithmetical calculations."

Hearty and honest applause followed these symphonic poems, and yet theseeming triumph of the evening was the temperament of Paderewski. The individual is nearer to the public than is a work. It is the actor in "Hamlet" that provokes discussion and rivets or repels the attention. And yet the musical feature of the concert of Saturday evening was the introduction of the symphonic poems of Mr. MacDowell.

The orchestra gave a robust performance of the Schumann symphony. The effect was marred at times by the untunefulness of the wind instruments. The concert was protracted to a late hour, and many left the hall before the opening measure of the "Meistersinger" overture.

PHILIP HALE.

JANUARY 29, 1893—

MUSICAL OFFERINGS.

Symphony Orchestra and Pianist Paderewski.

Second Week of "Lion Tamer"—Urania
Spectacle—Handel and Haydn.

Nordica and Damrosch Programmes—
Concert for Benefit of Veterans.

If there had been any doubts about the continuation of the Paderewski craze, the unbeliever who attempted to purchase tickets for the 13th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony would have found his or her incredulity sadly at fault last week. The simple announcement made by Manager Ellis, "All tickets for both performances are sold," was verified; for Music Hall was crowded at each entertainment with an audience of admiring (perhaps worshipping would be a more fitting term,) spectators, who insisted on recalling the wonderful pianist several times after each number.

It was given out that M. Paderewski had injured his hand before the rehearsal, but if he had no bad result was shown.

With the orchestra he played his A minor concerto for pianoforte, a work, although written by a pianist, which treats the piano as a single instrument without seeking to wander into the realms of orchestral effects.

Wonderfully was the piece played. The confidence of the composer, reinforced by the ability of the player, was a combination as near perfection as one could imagine.

The graceful romanza of the andante, the second movement, was perhaps the most delightful portion of the composition, for here the dainty melodic form is alternated between the piano and orchestra, and if ever harmony possessed soul this charming morceau must rank in that category of expression.

At the matinee his Chopin introductions awakened great applause. But whether it be Chopin, Liszt, Beethoven, Schubert, or any other composer, the great performer almost disarms criticism, and it is useless to further laud his phenomenal performances.

Two new poems, entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," written by the well-known Boston composer, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, were given by the orchestra with fine effect. They evidently are companion pieces, although the talented writer gives no further clue to the tone pictures than that conveyed in their titles.

Underlying the "Hamlet" number is the suggestion of the depressing moods of the young prince, illustrated by the generous measures allotted to the string basses and the brasses, broken at intervals by discordant notes, typifying, doubtless, the phantasies of the mind which conjures up shadowy visions from the spirit world.

The sad and gentle nature of the unfortunate maiden is shown in the "Ophelia" composition, by the plaintive and tender orchestration in which the strings have the principal work. Dissonants mark her madness, and a pathetic theme, pianissimo, shows her untimely "taking off."

A single hearing of the piece is insufficient for a proper analysis of its fine orchestration and originality of treatment. It was most favorably received, but it is of so delicate an order of composition that it appeals more successfully to the cultivated musician than to the average auditor.

Schumann's stately symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, and the prelude from "Meistersinger" were the other orchestral selections.

This week the programme will be as follows:

Overture, Coriolanus.....Beethoven
Skeleton in Armor, op. 28.....Arthur Foote
For chorus, orchestra and quartet.
Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith,
Mr. George J. Parker, Mr. Clarence E. Hay.
(First time.)

Song of Destiny.....Brahms
For chorus and orchestra.
Columbus March and Hymn.....Paine
For chorus and orchestra.
(First time in Boston.)

PADEREWSKI'S ART.

IT JUSTIFIES THE FERVOR OF ADMIRERS.

Music Hall Filled to Overflowing at Saturday's Symphony Concert, in Which the Great Pianist Was the Central Figure—A Unique Brilliancy of Harmonic Production.

The Symphony on Saturday was but the frame of the picture, for it was Paderewski, and Paderewski almost alone, who caused the aisles of Music Hall to overflow with a standing population, and the best orchestral numbers did not evoke a quarter of the enthusiasm that greeted a well-torn Chopin nocturne and waltz. In a certain sense the frenzy had its justification, for the pianist was at this concert heard with his appropriate surroundings, and in his own concerto he attained a greater height than in the groups of piano solos, more fit for chamber recitals, which have made up his preceding programmes.

One can only rhapsodize about his work in this concerto. Such brilliancy, such fervor, such bravura without an attempt to put virtuosity in the foreground, deserve paeans of praise. Naturally the composition is Klavier-maessig, but Paderewski has not committed the fault of Rubinstein and kept the piano unduly prominent; on the contrary, almost all the real development is given to the orchestra while the piano repeats, embellishes, or emphasizes the orchestral thoughts. Nor has the composer shown the Achilles' heel of Chopin, and betrayed weakness in dealing with tone-colors, made prominent by contrast with strength in the piano passages.

The cadenza of the first movement led in an unstrained manner from thematic material to the most brilliant display of virtuosity, and the final octave work was simply phenomenal in its power, rapidity and clearness. Originality is in every part of the work, although the burst of festivity in carillon-like clanger and the solemn organ-like second theme, in the finale, cause this movement to recall the spirit, if not the substance, of Schumann's "Cologne Symphony." The refined and melancholy character of some of the orchestral touches in the first movement, the ineffable sweetness of the romance, the exciting hurly-burly of the finale, and the powerful climax of the work, go to make up a composition that is likely to be more appreciated at each successive hearing.

The solos were less effective. Any piano pieces must lose in effect when brought in direct contrast with orchestral works, and it was probably this intermingling which caused the two Chopin numbers to seem less entrancing than usual. The works given were the nocturne in G and the waltz, op. 34, No. 1. The audience, however, went frantic over the playing and recalled the artist time after time, until it became evident that he did not propose to play an encore. The orchestral support in the concerto was especially good, the ensemble being without flaw, the conductor and musicians entering heartily into the spirit of the work.

Less commendation, however, must be given to the performance of the first movement of Schumann's B flat symphony, the introduction being made blatant to the verge of untunefulness, and like anything but the composer who was reserved even in his happiness, and who always avoided bombast. One may acknowledge the spirit of triumph which is in the first movement of this work, for Schumann, who often wrote his autobiography into his music, here celebrates the winning of his wife, or at least the happiness consequent upon it, but one can easily parody this outburst of joy, this combination of love and spring, and by exaggerated performance, metamorphose rejoicing into boisterousness.

There are passages in the first and last movements which call for the full power of the orchestra, but it may be questioned if this full power means forcing the strings to stridency, and causing the brass players to blow until their cheeks crack! The trombones especially can readily take the step from the sublime to the ridiculous; there was a time when they were too restrained in our orchestra, but the pendulum has now swung too far on the other side.

The larghetto, however, was finely played, and horns and cellos vied with each other in good shading and expression here. The scherzo, also, was taken up in good style, with just the right changes from earnestness to airiness. Schumann here gives a mood that is not easy either to define or musically interpret: He sweeps from lively to severe, if not from grave to gay, leaning just a little toward the darker side, and portraying Pleasure as Hawthorne has personified him in the wanderings of Daffydowndilly. Neither the mirth of Mozart nor the grotesqueness of Beethoven are in this scherzo, but the picture is not less true or artistic than these. Oboes, horns and especially to the solo flute (in the cadenza) deserve especial mention in connection with the last movement.

To the American auditor the most interesting part of the programme should have been the two poems (Poemes Symphoniques in the true sense of the word) by MacDowell, entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia." They are rather too deep to capture the multitude at once, but they are rich both in ideas and scoring. The composer has made of these two characters a sort of Faust and Marguerite, and the military tone of the first poem, and the tender and pathetic, yet simple character of the second, remind strongly of the contrast of the two first movements of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," especially as Ophelia, as Gretchen appears on the muted violins. In the portrayal of Hamlet the warlike element is well contrasted with moments of reverie and sorrow, and in the Ophelia movement there is something of foreboding and premonition. There is fluency of writing apparent in every measure, and though one may not find the ordinary conception of Shakespeare's pair present in the work, yet judged per se, the composition is one of the most worthy of the recent additions to the native repertoire. It does not belong to the average "programme music" school either, for the composer has here given a subjective rather than an objective work, and it is a presentation of emotions rather than of events.

With a fiery performance of the prelude

176
to "Die Meistersinger" the exciting programme ended in an exciting manner. There was much to commend in the performance of this. The broad theme of the Guild of Mastersingers was given with splendid power. It is not generally known that this is taken (at least its first score of notes) from an actual theme written by a mastersinger. The quick march on the woodwind was also very clearly and accurately played. There was, however, an occasional lack of perfect balance of parts, and a few of the sub-themes, which might have been seen by the eye in the score, were not audible to the ear in the performance. As a whole the concert was a successful one, but one cannot help regretting the swaggering Schumann who marched at the head of the procession.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Paderewski.

"The Lion Tamer" a Hit—Return of the Nordica Company—The Heinrich Song Concerts—Romantic Recitals by Scharwenka—Grossmith Again—Another Wagner Event—Notes.

The 13th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, made an ideal musical entertainment, and the immense audience present, limited in numbers only by the entire capacity of the auditorium, left no doubt of the impression given by the programme performed under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The Schumann symphony No. 1 made the first attraction of the evening, and the reading given its several movements realized all their beauties in the most artistic fashion, the men of the orchestra seeming to enter into the spirit of the work with unusual interest.

Following the symphony came the concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 17, by Mr. Paderewski, with the composer as solo player. The repetition of this work, which had a hearing here last season, made a memorable event of the evening, for the playing of Paderewski was superb, and left nothing to be desired by the most captious critic. The orchestra, which is made so prominent throughout the concerto, was heard at all times with equal satisfaction, and the remarkable scene of enthusiasm which followed the conclusion of the work was but natural. Repeated recalls were responded to by the well nigh exhausted artist, whose powers of endurance seem to equal his genius as a pianist and composer.

Mr. Nikisch then gave a first hearing of the two "poems for orchestra," named by Mr. E. A. MacDowell, the composer, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia." No descriptions of these "poems" have been made public by Mr. MacDowell, and the difficulty of deciding upon their realistic value is thereby greatly increased. Music is indefinite in its suggestions even to the most imaginative nature, and it appears only fair to assume that Mr. MacDowell has correctly reproduced the thoughts which he may be supposed to have had in mind while preparing these "poems." Apart from any definite significance, the two works are compositions well worthy the name they bear. They are excellent specimens of Mr. MacDowell's melodious tendencies, the leading themes being clear and definite, as well as full of character, and in the working out of the principal subjects Mr. MacDowell again shows his skill as a musician and his masterly ability in the use of the modern orchestra. The merits of the two "poems" were fully appreciated by the audience and the reading given them by Mr. Nikisch was most satisfactory.

The programme was further enriched by Mr. Paderewski's contribution of some solo selections in his best mood, and ended with a splendid performance of the great prelude to the "Meistersingers."

Next Saturday evening the programme will be as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus"; Arthur Foote's "Skeleton in Armor," op. 28, for chorus, orchestra and quartet, with Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay as soloists; Brahms' "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, and J. K. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn," for chorus and orchestra.

MUSICAL. Sarita

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was attended by an audience that completely packed Music Hall. Every available bit of standing room was filled. The concert opened with Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, for which, by the way, the conductor seems to have a special predilection. The work was given very effectively, though with much exaggeration of style, and untunefulness on the part of the wind instruments. The novelty of the concert was a work by Mr. E. A. MacDowell; two poems for orchestra, op. 22, and entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," respectively. We must confess that we failed to understand them on a first hearing. The music is well put together, is beautifully instrumented, and is delightful in tone color generally; but beyond this we do not feel competent to speak of it. Why Hamlet, and why Ophelia, we cannot understand. If the first be to describe the moods of Hamlet, the listener is left to discover what moods. What the wildness, the incoherency and the raving of the greater part of the first movement indicate, baffles us. If this music typifies Hamlet at all, it is a Hamlet who would have run his sword through the King, his uncle, the first time he saw him after having heard the story of the Ghost. The Ophelia movement is more lucid, and has a leading theme of great beauty. The work is musically from beginning to end, but it is a pity that it does not tell what it has to tell more clearly. It was well played, though again the wind instruments indulged in false intonation. There was much applause, and an evident desire to call the composer forward, but he did not appear. The soloist was Paderewski, who was welcomed with immense enthusiasm. He played his concerto in A minor, op. 17, the same work that he performed last year at these concerts. That he gave it with splendid brilliancy and impressiveness need not be said. In fact, it is no longer necessary to dwell on the perfections of this artist's playing. He was wildly applauded and recalled four times. Later in the evening he played the great Chopin Nocturne in G and the Valse Brillante by the same composer. We have heard him perform these works much better than he did on this occasion. He was evidently not in his best mood, and there were moments in the waltz when he was not equal to himself. Still it was Paderewski, and the audience rewarded him with thunders of plaudits after the nocturne, the orchestra giving also their stamp of approval; and after the waltz the applause was furious in its fervor, again encouraged by the orchestra. The artist was recalled three times, manifestly with the view of exacting an encore; but the piano lid was closed incontinently, and the recalls ceased. A fine appreciation of Wagner was shown by the exit of the larger part of the audience before the performance of the "Meistersinger" overture which ended the concert. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; "The Skeleton in Armor," by Arthur Foote; Brahms' "Song of Destiny," and the "Columbus March and Hymn," by John K. Paine. Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. G. J. Parker, Mr. Clarence E. Hay and the Boston Symphony chorus will assist.

CYNICISMS.

I have frequently wondered, in attending the Symphony concerts in Music Hall, at the eclectic tastes of the orchestral performers, especially of the outer row of first violins, which is particularly within my line of vision. These gentlemen applaud the performances of every soloist who assists at the concerts. The quality of the performance, be it good, bad, or indifferent, does not seem to affect them in the slightest. They applaud, and heartily. When a soloist chances to be a member of the orchestra, the applause is more vigorous than it is at any other time; but that should be looked at in a sympathetic rather than a cynical light; should be considered as an amiable weakness, an illustration of loving camaraderie, a manifestation of a highly laudable esprit du corps. So regularly and so industriously do these gentlemen give the cue to the audience, in the shape of plaudits, that I sometimes ask myself if this is among the other duties they have contracted to perform; or whether the orchestra is called upon to combine the services of players with those of a well-organized clique. I have sometimes thought that the audience might be permitted to all the applauding, as it may be very naturally surmised that it is they who are expressly privileged to manifest that they are well satisfied with the return that has been made to them for their money. However, this is, perhaps, to consider too curiously, if not too harshly. Their applause, however, would be more valuable and more impressive if they did not bestow it on everybody and everything. Perhaps, they feel themselves in an awkward position before the public, and that their motives may be misjudged if they do not testify their approbation of singers, violinists, and pianists in the way named. Perhaps, on the other hand, they entertain the opinion so largely prevailing among artists, that the public is an ass, and must be guided, by authority, in the direction of applauding in the proper places. For many years, have I attended these Symphony concerts, and I do not recall when the orchestra, especially the front row of violinists of which I have made mention, has failed to applaud with great fervency, the soloist of the evening. I have seen and heard them evidence by their applause, their pleasure, real or pretended, with some exceedingly poor singing, poor violin playing and poor piano playing. To do them justice, though, I must hasten to add, that I have always known them to give the heartiest evidence of enthusiasm toward one of their own number. Now, on the strength of all this, and full of memories more or less cheering, of their course toward other soloists, I was astonished, knocked off my perch, as it were, at their conduct toward the young violinist, Henri Marteau, on Saturday evening, the 21st inst. Here was a brilliant artist, a mere boy, and yet a thorough master of his instrument; one who has been approved of the most eminent and most exacting critics of Europe; a genius, in fact, who plays exquisitely, artistically, perfectly; who, few as are his years, is the superior, in many important essentials, of any of our resident violinists who has been heard at these concerts. Curious to relate, the violinists who have for so long been, to all intents and purposes, the clique of the organization, forget their familiar enthusiasm on such occasions, and failed to applaud the gifted young artist; or applauded so gingerly, so weakly, and with such calm perfunctoriness, as to excite the astonishment of all who witnessed it. The audience showed its independence of what I charitably call the volunteer clique, by going into extasies over young Marteau, by storming applause at him, and recalling him again and again in a perfect fury of delight. What puzzles me is the conduct of the hitherto always prompt orchestral applauders. Perhaps they were so overcome by the splendid talents of the violinist that they were paralyzed, for the time being. This, if true, would be creditable alike to their heads and their hearts. I wish that Mr. Kneisel, Mr.

177

to "Die Meistersinger" the exciting programme ended in an exciting manner. There was much to commend in the performance of this. The broad theme of the Guild of Mastersingers was given with splendid power. It is not generally known that this is taken (at least its first score of notes) from an actual theme written by a mastersinger. The quick march on the woodwind was also very clearly and accurately played. There was, however, an occasional lack of perfect balance of parts, and a few of the sub-themes, which might have been seen by the eye in the score, were not audible to the ear in the performance. As a whole the concert was a successful one, but one cannot help regretting the swaggering Schumann who marched at the head of the procession.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Paderewski.

"The Lion Tamer" a Hit—Return of the Nordica Company—The Heinrich Song Concerts—Romantic Recitals by Scharwenka—Grossmith Again—Another Wagner Event—Notes.

The 13th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, last evening, made an ideal musical entertainment, and the immense audience present, limited in numbers only by the entire capacity of the auditorium, left no doubt of the impression given by the programme performed under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

The Schumann symphony No. 1 made the first attraction of the evening, and the reading given its several movements realized all their beauties in the most artistic fashion, the men of the orchestra seeming to enter into the spirit of the work with unusual interest.

Following the symphony came the concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 17, by Mr. Paderewski, with the composer as solo player. The repetition of this work, which had a hearing here last season, made a memorable event of the evening, for the playing of Paderewski was superb, and left nothing to be desired by the most captious critic. The orchestra, which is made so prominent throughout the concerto, was heard at all times with equal satisfaction, and the remarkable scene of enthusiasm which followed the conclusion of the work was but natural. Repeated recalls were responded to by the well nigh exhausted artist, whose powers of endurance seem to equal his genius as a pianist and composer. Mr. Nikisch then gave a first hearing of the two "poems for orchestra," named by Mr. E. A. MacDowell, the composer, "Hamlet" and "Ophelia." No descriptions of these "poems" have been made public by Mr. MacDowell, and the difficulty of deciding upon their realistic value is thereby greatly increased. Music is indefinite in its suggestions even to the most imaginative nature, and it appears only fair to assume that Mr. MacDowell has correctly reproduced the thoughts which he may be supposed to have had in mind while preparing these "poems." Apart from any definite significance, the two works are compositions well worthy the name they bear. They are excellent specimens of Mr. MacDowell's melodious tendencies, the leading themes being clear and definite, as well as full of character, and in the working out of the principal subjects Mr. MacDowell again shows his skill as a musician and his masterly ability in the use of the modern orchestra. The merits of the two "poems" were fully appreciated by the audience and the reading given them by Mr. Nikisch was most satisfactory.

The programme was further enriched by Mr. Paderewski's contribution of some solo selections in his best mood, and ended with a splendid performance of the great prelude to the "Meistersingers."

Next Saturday evening the programme will be as follows: Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus"; Arthur Foote's "Skeleton in Armor," op. 28, for chorus, orchestra and quartet, with Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay as soloists; Brahms' "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, and J. K. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn," for chorus and orchestra.

MUSICAL. Sancti

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was attended by an audience that completely packed Music Hall. Every available bit of standing room was filled. The concert opened with Schumann's Symphony, No. 1 for which, by the way, the conductor seems to have a special predilection. The work was given very effectively, though with much exaggeration of style, and untunefulness on the part of the wind instruments. The novelty of the concert was a work by Mr. E. A. MacDowell; two poems for orchestra, op. 22, and entitled "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," respectively. We must confess that we failed to understand them on a first hearing. The music is well put together, is beautifully instrumented, and is delightful in tone color generally; but beyond this we do not feel competent to speak of it. Why Hamlet, and why Ophelia, we cannot understand. If the first be to describe the moods of Hamlet, the listener is left to discover what moods. What the wildness, the incoherency and the ravings of the greater part of the first movement indicate, baffles us. If this music typifies Hamlet at all, it is a Hamlet who would have run his sword through the King, his uncle, the first time he saw him after having heard the story of the Ghost. The Ophelia movement is more lucid, and has a leading theme of great beauty. The work is musically from beginning to end, but it is a pity that it does not tell what it has to tell more clearly. It was well played, though again the wind instruments indulged in false intonation. There was much applause, and an evident desire to call the composer forward, but he did not appear. The soloist was Paderewski, who was welcomed with immense enthusiasm. He played his concerto in A minor, op. 17, the same work that he performed last year at these concerts. That he gave it with splendid brilliancy and impressiveness need not be said. In fact, it is no longer necessary to dwell on the perfections of this artist's playing. He was wildly applauded and recalled four times. Later in the evening he played the great Chopin Nocturne in G and the Valse Brillante by the same composer. We have heard him perform these works much better than he did on this occasion. He was evidently not in his best mood, and there were moments in the waltz when he was not equal to himself. Still it was Paderewski, and the audience rewarded him with thunders of plaudits after the nocturne, the orchestra giving also their stamp of approval; and after the waltz the applause was furious in its fervor, again encouraged by the orchestra. The artist was recalled three times, manifestly with the view of exacting an encore; but the piano lid was closed incontinently, and the recalls ceased. A fine appreciation of Wagner was shown by the exit of the larger part of the audience before the performance of the "Meistersinger" overture which ended the concert. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Coriolanus," Beethoven; "The Skeleton in Armor," by Arthur Foote; Brahms' "Song of Destiny," and the "Columbus March and Hymn," by John K. Paine. Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. G. J. Parker, Mr. Clarence E. Hay and the Boston Symphony chorus will assist.

CYNICISMS.

I have frequently wondered, in attending the Symphony concerts in Music Hall, at the eclectic tastes of the orchestral performers, especially of the outer row of first violins, which is particularly within my line of vision. These gentlemen applaud the performances of every soloist who assists at the concerts. The quality of the performance, be it good, bad, or indifferent, does not seem to affect them in the slightest. They applaud, and heartily. When a soloist chancies to be a member of the orchestra, the applause is more vigorous than it is at any other time; but that should be looked at in a sympathetic rather than a cynical light; should be considered as an amiable weakness, an illustration of loving camaraderie, a manifestation of a highly laudable esprit du corps. So regularly and so industriously do these gentlemen give the cue to the audience, in the shape of plaudits, that I sometimes ask myself if this is among the other duties they have contracted to perform; or whether the orchestra is called upon to combine the services of players with those of a well-organized claque. I have sometimes thought that the audience might be permitted to all the applauding, as it may be very naturally surmised that it is they who are expressly privileged to manifest that they are well satisfied with the return that has been made to them for their money. However, this is, perhaps, to consider too curiously, if not too harshly. Their applause, however, would be more valuable and more impressive if they did not bestow it on everybody and everything. Perhaps, they feel themselves in an awkward position before the public, and that their motives may be misjudged if they do not testify their approbation of singers, violinists, and pianists in the way named. Perhaps, on the other hand, they entertain the opinion so largely prevailing among artists, that the public is an ass, and must be guided, by authority, in the direction of applauding in the proper places. For many years, have I attended these Symphony concerts, and I do not recall when the orchestra, especially the front row of violinists of which I have made mention, has failed to applaud with great fervency, the soloist of the evening. I have seen and heard them evidence by their applause, their pleasure, real or pretended, with some exceedingly poor singing, poor violin playing and poor piano playing. To do them justice, though, I must hasten to add, that I have always known them to give the heartiest evidence of enthusiasm toward one of their own number. Now, on the strength of all this, and full of memories more or less cheering, of their course toward other soloists, I was astonished, knocked off my perch, as it were, at their conduct toward the young violinist, Henri Marteau, on Saturday evening, the 21st inst. Here was a brilliant artist, a mere boy, and yet a thorough master of his instrument; one who has been approved of the most eminent and most exacting critics of Europe; a genius, in fact, who plays exquisitely, artistically, perfectly; who, few as are his years, is the superior, in many important essentials, of any of our resident violinists who has been heard at these concerts. Curious to relate, the violinists who have for so long been, to all intents and purposes, the claque of the organization, forget their familiar enthusiasm on such occasions, and failed to applaud the gifted young artist; or applauded so gingerly, so weakly, and with such calm perfunctoriness, as to excite the astonishment of all who witnessed it. The audience showed its independence of what I charitably call the volunteer claque, by going into extasies over young Marteau, by storming applause at him, and recalling him again and again in a perfect fury of delight. What puzzles me is the conduct of the hitherto always prompt orchestral applauders. Perhaps they were so overcome by the splendid talents of the violinist that they were paralyzed, for the time being. This, if true, would be creditable alike to their heads and their hearts. I wish that Mr. Kneisel, Mr.

Adamowski and Mr. Roth had applauded with their customary vigor. It would have left no cause for disapproving comments on the part of the audience, and for uncomplimentary remarks about jealousy of another violinist who was not of their number; about the enmity of German artists to those of French origin; about cliannishness, ungenerosity, small mindedness and other disagreeable things. Alas! the artistic nature is hard to understand.

CHATTERER.

JANUARY 30, 1893

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Opus 38.
Paderewski: Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor, Opus 17.

MacDowell: Two Poems for Orchestra; "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," Opus 22.

Pianoforte solos—

Chopin: Nocturne in G major, Opus 37, No. 2.
Valse Brillante in A-flat major, Opus 34, No. 1.

Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the pianist.

A glorious concert, if two hours long! The magnificent opening of the Schumann symphony was given as it deserved, and the passage where the same theme returns in the same slow tempo in the middle of the first movement, instead of seeming like something of a falling off, as it usually does, sounded even stronger and more heroic. Equally brilliantly done was the horn and trumpet fanfare near the end of the movement. These are effects after Mr. Nikisch's own heart, and he makes them stand out in almost unexampled splendor. The whole symphony was admirably read and played, albeit we have heard the slow movement done with greater delicacy, and with something more of smoothness of tone.

Mr. MacDowell's "Hamlet" and "Ophelia" do not throw much more light upon what this immensely talented, but enigmatic, young musician strives after in his compositions—unless his aim be to combine beauty of tone-color with emotional expressiveness, and nothing else. In the "Ophelia" there are some moments of approach to recognizable musical form and coherence; but for the most part these two poems sound very like mere rambling preluding, like the first tentative stage in the growth of a musical purpose. Or shall we say that they sound like the musical accompaniment to some unexpressed poetic thought, or to an unseen dramatic action? There is no little beauty in them, much vigor, with perhaps a leaning toward the fantastic; but of musical meaning we can find next to none in them, and of definite poetic meaning there can be none at all. They are like the incoherent happenings in a dream, which, to be sure, do not seem incoherent for the time being to the dreamer. Perhaps this music ought to be listened to when one is in a state of half somnolence, and the mind is not occupied with the outline of things.

The great "Meistersinger" prelude was grandly given, perhaps with a little blurring of musical outline in some of the more delicate passages, but with superb force and sustained power in the stronger places, and with positively enormous effectiveness in the final climax. The peroration was simply overwhelming.

Paderewski's A-minor concerto more than holds its own with repeated hearings. To us the slow romanza and the finale are the strongest movements in it; there is doubtless much that is admirable in the first Allegro, but, compared with the movements that follow it, it seems to show the difference between good and vigorous work and inspiration of genius. The poetic sensibility of the romanza, the musical beauty of its theme and development, have that poignancy of appeal that only a genuine afflatus can give; no amount of sincerity of feeling or musical constructive skill can give it when unkindled by the divine spark. The spirited dash of the last Allegro molto vivace, and the noble emotional impressiveness of its second theme show the same inspired power, if in another phase. That the construction and workmanship are strong and skilful throughout only adds to the efficacy of this power. And how Paderewski played it! and how the orchestra accompanied it! There was a moment in the romanza where one held one's breath and the heart thumped double-quick. Never has the great pianist shown himself more unconditionally great! The two Chopin pieces almost reconciled one to their appearance on a symphony concert programme—so exquisitely were they played. But of Paderewski's playing of these things we have spoken before. The enthusiasm of the vast audience was unbounded.

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Coriolan," opus 62; Arthur Foote, "The Skeleton in Armour," for chorus, quartet and orchestra, opus 28; Brahms, "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, opus 54; Paine, "Columbus March and Hymn," for chorus and orchestra. Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillie an Carlismith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay will sing the solo parts.

NO TICKETS LEFT.

The quickest sale on record was made in disposing of the tickets for the rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Monday and Tuesday of this week. The soloist is to be Paderewski the pianist.

For the rehearsal on Friday there were 450 or more seats in the upper balcony at 25 cents each, and about 300 admission tickets at the same price. It took just 33 minutes to sell these.

For the Saturday night concert only the admission tickets are sold, and these were disposed of in just 11 minutes.

There are no tickets of any kind for either of these performances left at the box office.

TIGHT BINDING

PADEREWSKI AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concerts continue their successful course and while varying as regards interest, invariably attract large audiences. The concert last evening had its unusual attraction in the appearance of Ignace Paderewski, the pianist whose rendering of his own concerto in A minor was a treat of the highest order.

By itself considered also the programme was of strong interest, containing as it did the "Spring Symphony" by Schumann and the two new poems by MacDowell; but there are few amateurs indeed who could not be drawn to a concert by such a reputation as Paderewski's and to use a commonplace phrase, limiting it, of course, to the musical elite in this city, "everybody was there" last evening and the greatest interest and enthusiasm prevailed. One does not care to rob the alphabet from A to Z in order to do justice to an artist like Paderewski. Looking in the glare of his qualities as a genius and searching for some point of defect, and then only finding to a limited extent such deficiencies as have been admitted in connection with his pianoforte recitals in this city, such an analysis will afford the pessimist the satisfaction of knowing that the most enthusiastic things a critic can say of Paderewski's performances will scarcely equal the enthusiasm of such as place the spiritual nobility of an artist's effort upon a higher plane than its scholastic or theoretical excellence. As we listened to Paderewski's performance of his concerto in A Minor last evening we were impressed that, possessing the truest, rarest and most charming tokens of his art, Paderewski is in the best sense one of the most interesting and masterly tone-poets that the musical world has known. In his piano-forte concert one finds an epitome of his characteristics as a genius. The whole work displays abundant spirit and concentrates attention between piano-forte and orchestra in about as perfect an ensemble as one would care to hear. That the work of any composer who has not been dead for a score of years or more is the offspring of genius is the last thing in the world that a contemporaneous wise-acre will feel disposed to admit; but it is difficult to understand how there can be a dissentant to the verdict that this A Minor concerto is one of the genuine creations in music. As equally true of the Chopin and Saint Saens concertos, with which works it may not improperly be compared, but very rare traces of borrowed thought can be found in it. It is also a work overflowing with rich musical conceptions, the merit of which was recognized when it was performed here before. Its workmanship alone proclaims that study and learning, combined with a spontaneous regard for the interests of the virtuoso, have guided the pen of its author.

The performance of the work by Paderewski was eminently beautiful and satisfying. In it there was freedom within strictness and, paradoxical though it may seem, strictness within freedom, while throughout both composer and pianist, the two in one, had their say in a perfectly natural and candid manner, and with all the vigor, skill and mastery also of the whole-souled and superbly educated musician.

The symphony given last evening seems to have been the logical outcome of the happiest period of Schumann's life. The obstacles to the composer's marriage with Clara Nieck had been overcome, and he had won high position as a musician and critical authority. Writing to Dorn in 1839, Schumann complains of the pianoforte as "too narrow a field for his thoughts," and he announces his intentions of applying himself to orchestral writing in order to make up for his want of practice. The B flat is the first published creation in his new and large field. Years before when a student at Heidelberg and when he was undecided between the professions of law and music, he wrote to Wieck, his former pianoforte teacher, and future father-in-law: "I detest theory pure and simple as you know, and I have been living very quietly, improvising a good deal, but not playing much from notes. I have begun many a symphony, but finished nothing and every now and then have managed to edge in a Schubert waltz between Roman law and the pandects, etc." Of these juvenile attempts in the symphonic form one at least in G minor was played in public at Schneeberg in 1833. Schumann's love for Clara Wieck was the incentive which led him to persistent work in mastering the science of music and in overcoming his youthful detestation of theory. This earliest of the four symphonies was first performed at Leipzig, Mendelssohn conducting, on March 31, 1841, having been composed but shortly before. A few weeks before he wrote to a friend: "I have now a household of my own and my circumstances are different from what they were. The time since you last heard from me has passed in happiness and work. I wished for you to hear my symphony. How happy I was at the performance! I and others also, for it had such a favorable reception as I think no symphony has had since Beethoven." The title, "Spring Symphony," is Schumann's own. In the volume of letters ("Robert Schumann's Briefe neue Folge," new series, Brestkoff and Haertel, Leipzig) the first mention of it occurs. "Fancy," he says, "a whole symphony and a 'Spring' symphony, too!" Schumann has also put on record the fact that its connection with the bursting season of spring was his original idea; for an inscription on a portrait of himself which follows the first two bars of the symphony reads: "Beginning of a symphony occasioned by a poem of Adolf Bottger's. To the poet, in remembrance, from Robert Schumann, Leipzig, 1842."

"Schumann," writes Wasielanski, "conceived and treated the symphonic form in a peculiar spirit based on the study of masterpieces especially those of Beethoven. The ideas are thoroughly Schumannic; and higher artistic value is placed upon them from the fact that these ideas are expressed in the old established form. They seldom reveal the arbitrary enormities expressed so often in his earlier works."

The symphony for the most part was roughly and carelessly played. The remaining events of the concert included Paderewski's charming performances of the nocturne in G major and waltz in A flat major by Chopin; the two poems for orchestra referred to; op. 22, by MacDowell, and the overture to Wagner's "Meistersinger." The poems by MacDowell will rank with the most interesting specimens of the composer's genius that have yet been heard here. The concert was by far too long, lasting until after ten o'clock.

Arthur Nikisch, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the New York Philharmonic Society last week, gave a notable instance of his friendship for the profession with which he is associated in his adopted home, by taking the initiative in sending a floral offering to the Philharmonics from the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Adamowski and Mr. Roth had applauded with their customary vigor. It would have left no cause for disapproving comments on the part of the audience, and for uncomplimentary remarks about jealousy of another violinist who was not of their number; about the enmity of German artists to those of French origin; about clannishness, ungenerosity, small mindedness and other disagreeable things. Alas! the artistic nature is hard to understand.

CHATTERER.

JANUARY 30, 1893

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Opus 38, Paderewski: Concerto for Pianoforte, in A minor.

Opus 17. MacDowell: Two Poems for Orchestra; "Hamlet" and "Ophelia," Opus 22.

Pianoforte solos—Chopin: Nocturne in G major, Opus 37, No. 2.

Valse Brillante in A-flat major, Opus 34, No. 1.

Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the pianist.

A glorious concert, if two hours long! The magnificent opening of the Schumann symphony was given as it deserved, and the passage where the same theme returns in the same slow tempo in the middle of the first movement, instead of seeming like something of a falling off, as it usually does, sounded even stronger and more heroic. Equally brilliantly done was the horn and trumpet fanfare near the end of the movement. These are effects after Mr. Nikisch's own heart, and he makes them stand out in almost unexampled splendor. The whole symphony was admirably read and played, albeit we have heard the slow movement done with greater delicacy, and with something more of smoothness of tone.

Mr. MacDowell's "Hamlet" and "Ophelia" do not throw much more light upon what this immensely talented, but enigmatic, young musician strives after in his compositions—unless his aim be to combine beauty of tone-color with emotional expressiveness, and nothing else. In the "Ophelia" there are some moments of approach to recognizable musical form and coherence; but for the most part these two poems sound very like mere rambling preluding, like the first tentative stage in the growth of a musical purpose. Or shall we say that they sound like the musical accompaniment to some unexpressed poetic thought, or to an unseen dramatic action? There is no little beauty in them, much vigor, with perhaps a leaning toward the fantastic; but of musical meaning we can find next to none in them, and of definite poetic meaning there can be none at all. They are like the incoherent happenings in a dream, which, to be sure, do not seem incoherent for the time being to the dreamer. Perhaps this music ought to be listened to when one is in a state of half somnolence, and the mind is not occupied with the outline of things.

The great "Meistersinger" prelude was grandly given, perhaps with a little blurring of musical outline in some of the more delicate passages, but with superb force and sustained power in the stronger places, and with positively enormous effectiveness in the final climax. The peroration was simply overwhelming.

Paderewski's A-minor concerto more than holds its own with repeated hearings. To us the slow romanza and the finale are the strongest movements in it; there is doubtless much that is admirable in the first Allegro, but, compared with the movements that follow it, it seems to show the difference between good and vigorous work and inspiration of genius. The poetic sensibility of the romanza, the musical beauty of its theme and development, have that poignancy of appeal that only a genuine afflatus can give; no amount of sincerity of feeling or musical constructive skill can give it when unkindled by the divine spark. The spirited dash of the last Allegro molto vivace, and the noble emotional impressiveness of its second theme show the same inspired power, if in another phase. That the construction and workmanship are strong and skilful throughout only adds to the efficacy of this power. And how Paderewski played it! and how the orchestra accompanied it! There was a moment in the romanza where one held one's breath and the heart thumped double-quick. Never has the great pianist shown himself more unconditionally great! The two Chopin pieces almost reconciled one to their appearance on a symphony concert programme—so exquisitely were they played. But of Paderewski's playing of these things we have spoken before. The enthusiasm of the vast audience was unbounded.

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Coriolan," opus 62; Arthur Foote, "The Skeleton in Armour," for chorus, quartet and orchestra, opus 23; Brahms, "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, opus 54; Paine, "Columbus March and Hymn," for chorus and orchestra. Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lilli an Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay will sing the solo parts.

NO TICKETS LEFT.

The quickest sale on record was made in disposing of the tickets for the rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Monday and Tuesday of this week. The soloist is to be Paderewski the pianist.

For the rehearsal on Friday there were 450 or more seats in the upper balcony at 25 cents each, and about 300 admission tickets at the same price. It took just 33 minutes to sell these.

For the Saturday night concert only the admission tickets are sold, and these were disposed of in just 11 minutes.

There are no tickets of any kind for either of these performances left at the box office.

TIGHT BINDING

PADEREWSKI AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concerts continue their successful course and while varying as regards interest, invariably attract large audiences. The concert last evening had its unusual attraction in the appearance of Ignace Paderewski, the pianist whose rendering of his own concerto in A minor was a treat of the highest order.

By itself considered also the programme was of strong interest, containing as it did the "Spring Symphony" by Schumann and the two new poems by MacDowell; but there are few amateurs indeed who could not be drawn to a concert by such a reputation as Paderewski's and to use a commonplace phrase, limiting it, of course, to the musical elite in this city, "everybody was there" last evening and the greatest interest and enthusiasm prevailed. One does not care to rob the alphabet from A to Z in order to do justice to an artist like Paderewski. Looking in the glare of his qualities as a genius and searching for some point of defect, and then only finding to a limited extent such deficiencies as have been admitted in connection with his pianoforte recitals in this city, such an analysis will afford the pessimist the satisfaction of knowing that the most enthusiastic things a critic can say of Paderewski's performances will scarcely equal the enthusiasm of such as place the spiritual nobility of an artist's effort upon a higher plane than its scholastic or theoretical excellence. As we listened to Paderewski's performance of his concerto in A Minor last evening we were impressed that, possessing the truest, rarest and most charming tokens of his art, Paderewski is in the best sense one of the most interesting and masterly tone-poets that the musical world has known. In his pianoforte concert one finds an epitome of his characteristics as a genius. The whole work displays abundant spirit and concentrates attention between pianoforte and orchestra in about as perfect an ensemble as one would care to hear. That the work of any composer who has not been dead for a score of years or more is the offspring of genius is the last thing in the world that a contemporaneous wise-acre will feel disposed to admit; but it is difficult to understand how there can be a dissentant to the verdict that this A Minor concerto is one of the genuine creations in music. As equally true of the Chopin and Saint Saens concertos, with which works it may not improperly be compared, but very rare traces of borrowed thought can be found in it. It is also a work overflowing with rich musical conceptions, the merit of which was recognized when it was performed here before. Its workmanship alone proclaims that study and learning, combined with a spontaneous regard for the interests of the virtuoso, have guided the pen of its author.

The performance of the work by Paderewski was eminently beautiful and satisfying. In it there was freedom within strictness and, paradoxical though it may seem, strictness within freedom, while throughout both composer and pianist, the two in one, had their say in a perfectly natural and candid manner, and with all the vigor, skill and mastery also of the whole-souled and superbly educated musician.

The symphony given last evening seems to have been the logical outcome of the happiest period of Schumann's life. The obstacles to the composer's marriage with Clara Wieck had been overcome, and he had won high position as a musician and critical authority. Writing to Dorn in 1839, Schumann complains of the pianoforte as "too narrow a field for his thoughts," and he announces his intentions of applying himself to orchestral writing in order to make up for his want of practice. The B flat is the first published creation in his new and large field. Years before when a student at Heidelberg and when he was undecided between the professions of law and music, he wrote to Wieck, his former pianoforte teacher, and future father-in-law: "I detest theory pure and simple as you know, and I have been living very quietly, improvising a good deal, but not playing much from notes. I have begun many a symphony, but finished nothing and every now and then have managed to edge in a Schubert waltz between Roman law and the pandects, etc." Of these juvenile attempts in the symphonic form one at least in G minor was played in public at Schneeberg in 1833. Schumann's love for Clara Wieck was the incentive which led him to persistent work in mastering the science of music and in overcoming his youthful detestation of theory. This earliest of the four symphonies was first performed at Leipzig, Mendelssohn conducting, on March 31, 1841, having been composed but shortly before. A few weeks before he wrote to a friend: "I have now a household of my own and my circumstances are different from what they were. The time since you last heard from me has passed in happiness and work. I wished for you to hear my symphony. How happy I was at the performance! I and others also, for it had such a favorable reception as I think no symphony has had since Beethoven." The title, "Spring Symphony," is Schumann's own. In the volume of letters ("Robert Schumann's Briefe neue Folge," new series, Brestkoff and Haertel, Leipzig) the first mention of it occurs. "Fancy," he says, "a whole symphony and a 'Spring' symphony, too!" Schumann has also put on record the fact that its connection with the bursting season of spring was his original idea; for an inscription on a portrait of himself which follows the first two bars of the symphony reads: "Beginning of a symphony occasioned by a poem of Adolf Bottger's. To the poet, in remembrance, from Robert Schumann, Leipzig, 1842."

"Schumann," writes Wasielanski, "conceived and treated the symphonic form in a peculiar spirit based on the study of masterpieces especially those of Beethoven. The ideas are thoroughly Schumannic; and higher artistic value is placed upon them from the fact that these ideas are expressed in the old established form. They seldom reveal the arbitrary enormities expressed so often in his earlier works."

The symphony for the most part was roughly and carelessly played. The remaining events of the concert included Paderewski's charming performances of the nocturne in G major and waltz in A flat major by Chopin; the two poems for orchestra referred to; op. 22, by MacDowell, and the overture to Wagner's "Meistersinger." The poems by MacDowell will rank with the most interesting specimens of the composer's genius that have yet been heard here. The concert was by far too long, lasting until after ten o'clock.

Arthur Nikisch, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the New York Philharmonic Society last week, gave a notable instance of his friendship for the profession with which he is associated in his adopted home, by taking the initiative in sending a floral offering to the Philharmonics from the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE to "Coriolan," in C minor, op. 62.

ARTHUR FOOTE.

"THE SKELETON IN ARMOR." Ballad for
CHORUS, QUARTET, and ORCHESTRA, op. 28.
Conducted by the Composer.
(First time in Boston.)

MRS. MARIE BARNARD-SMITH,

MISS LILLIAN CARLSMITH,

MR. GEORGE J. PARKER,

MR. CLARENCE E. HAY.

JOHANNES BRAHMS.

"A SONG OF DESTINY." for CHORUS and ORCHESTRA, op. 54.

JOHN KNOWLES PAINE.

"COLUMBUS MARCH AND HYMN."
(First time in Boston.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHORUS.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

A FUNNY ROW,

In Which Our Own Nikisch
Reverend Figures.

NEW YORK, Feb. 2.—The funniest row of the winter is now going on between Harry Cannon and Nikisch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra leader, also leader of the orchestra that played last week at Harry Cannon's subscription concert.

Harry Cannon is a little blond, mussy-pated chappie of New York, who may have been spoiled by having had a good time all his life, with lots of money to spend.

Nikisch the brunette accuses Cannon the blond of having been very rude and arbitrary to him on the occasion of Nikisch's Orchestra being hired to give a performance at Cannon's house.

The word "hire" is the stumbling block. What does an artist lose or gain when he is hired to play in a private house?

Harry Cannon claims that Nikisch gains his price and cold supper and stale champagne thrown in for himself and musicians.

Nikisch claims that he gains social recognition, hot oysters a la poulette and "fizz" galore, freshly opened and poured into goblets.

Moreover, Nikisch and his men were admitted by a side door of the Cannon house, and he claims the front door only should have been opened for them.

Always in Good Form.

The quarrel is a very pretty one all round.

However much Harry Cannon may have been spoiled, he has not been found lacking in those generous impulses which amateurs often show to professionals.

As a sculptor of no mean fame, Harry Cannon maintained a studio uptown and has over and over again called in professional talent to assist at the exhibitions of his works of art.

At no one of these somewhat famous symposiums of luxurious society and talented professionals have I ever heard a word of disagreement as to the standing of the professionals or the graceful seated pose of society.

It cannot be that Harry Cannon and his pretty wife have intentionally slurred so great an artist.

The Symphony.

It was chorus night at the Symphony concert on Saturday, and by no means so artistic an occasion (as far as performance goes) as when the orchestra is heard unaided. The body of vocalists gathered as an auxiliary to the instrumental forces is by no means on a par with them. In a city which possesses an Apollo Club, a Cecilia, or a Handel and Haydn Society, this is a great shortcoming, and one that must become speedily palpable to the general public, no matter how omnivorous that many-headed monster may be. This criticism may be tempered at once with the statement that the chorus sang much better on this occasion than when it appeared in the ninth symphony. But it may sing much better still, and not be the peer of the organizations mentioned above, or of the orchestra which is its yoke fellow. The American composer has become epidemic this week, and in two days Paine, Chadwick and Foote have been heard in new works. Foote's "Skeleton in Armor" was the longest work on the programme on Saturday. It was a cruel thing to place this cantata between a warlike Beethoven overture and a most dignified Brahms cantata. Under these circumstances the Viking became a very respectable, even pious, individual, rather addicted to religious tones, a much better party than most of the old Norsemen, but scarcely the one depicted by Longfellow. Mr. Foote with all his great ability (and he is one of the most skillful of American composers) seems utterly deficient in dramatic power, and therefore one finds him habitually choosing the most dramatic subjects for his musical setting. He has never succeeded in grasping the direct power and strong contrasts of Longfellow's poetry, often as he has had recourse to this fount of inspiration. To give the sentiments of the Viking (which at once suggest a solo for baritone or tenor robusto) to a chorus and quartette for interpretation, avoiding solos altogether, was inartistic. Let the composer study Bruch's "Frithjof" with its sombre baritone work if he desires to see how a Norse subject can be graphically presented, or let him refer to George E. Whiting's "Tale of the Viking" if he desires to see a stronger presentation of this very subject. Yet one must praise the fluency of writing amid all the disappointment entailed by the mistakes alluded to, and the repetitions (caused by contrapuntal imitations) which marred the setting of "The Wreck of the Hesperus" are but seldom apparent here. The orchestral prelude was striking, but the setting of the stanza beginning

"But when I older grew, joining a corsair's crew" was as suggestive of a "Y.M.C.A." as of a "Corsair's crew." The love episode, on the other hand, was beautiful in a high degree, although perhaps a little too pastoral. In this part the tender harmonies, the tasteful orchestration, and the melodic themes, combine to make a number that will live. Entirely ineffective was the succeeding scene of Hildebrand's banquet hall. Here one might well have expected a flavor of bardic music, a burst of harps, something akin to the rhapsodical character which Bruch has given in the banquet in "Odysseus"; there was nothing of this, nor was there anything of northern revelry, there was only a degree of trumpet-blowing, and after these fanfares some use of the battery of percussive instruments that was conventional amidst all its noise.

It would be mere repetition to follow the rest of the work in detail: the well-written and meaningless music is continued to the very end. One may except the Andantino Grazioso at the words "Three weeks we westward bore," which is certainly graceful; but at the very close, as if to emphasize the undramatic character of it all, there is not an iota of difference between the lines "Skool! to the Northland! Skool!" and "Thus the tale ended." The performance may not have done full justice to the work, for the balance between chorus and orchestra was poor, and there was many a blur to condone. The solo quartette, consisting of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Carlsmith, Mr. Geo. J. Parker, and Mr. Hay, was the redeeming feature of the execution of the work.

Brahms' "Song of Destiny" began well. The dignified prelude was well played. But from the entrance of the vocal parts there was much inequality, and much seemed spasmodic in a work where this was the unpardonable sin. It may be doubted whether the chorus ought, in its present state, to undertake such ambitious work. The postlude was not so well given by the orchestra as the prelude had been. Before speaking of the final number of the programme, tribute must be paid to the excellent orchestral execution in the "Coriolanus" overture; the Beethoven work has seldom has a better performance. The reading was broad and massive, yet quite free from exaggeration.

Prof. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn," an artistic outcome of the Chicago fair, closed the concert. It was not well performed, but here at least one may acquit the chorus of all blame; they sang with heroic effort, but they were numerically too weak to cope with a work that was intended for a vast festival occasion. As well examine the head of Bartholdi's Statue of Liberty in the rooms of the Boston Art Club with a hope of getting its true effect, as expect to judge of such a work in the surroundings and with the forces of a symphony concert. One cannot help thinking of the march which our last international exhibition brought forth, and drawing a parallel between the two. Paine's composition is a worthier one than Wagner's; it is clearer, and works to a better climax. The element of bombast may be detected in both, but that is permissible, almost to be demanded, in such music of national self-glorification. Peace and prosperity are rarely the parents of a national anthem, and those who hoped for a better successor to that English drinking-song, "The Star Spangled Banner," were disappointed. The beginning of the march was military enough, and presented trumpet fanfares galore, and as much "Turkish Music" (bass-drum, cymbals, and other percussion) as would fill the vast Chicago auditorium, and it more than filled Music Hall. The two themes of the work are well contrasted and broadly treated, always with a view to heavy effects, for the Western occasion would not permit of delicate touches. Artificial groupings occur frequently and prevent any trace of monotony. The climax is a most worthy one, and is, in the opinion of the writer, decidedly higher than if the composer had culminated with one of our national tunes. The lofty theme of the chorus reminds of that subject with which the composer culminated his second symphony, and like that majestic theme it is in 3-2 rhythm. Words and music form just the right keystone to the arch, and while such a work can never make its due impression in the calm atmosphere of Music Hall, it has formed a worthy prelude to one of the most important of American events.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

SYMPHONY AND SONG.

New Works by Arthur Foote and Prof. Paine.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra was made particularly attractive by Mr. Nikisch, who introduced two numbers, new to this city, both of which were written by prominent resident musicians. The concert consisted of Beethoven's overture, "Coriolan," Arthur Foote's "Skeleton in Armor," for the first time, Brahms' "Song of Destiny," and John K. Paine's Columbus march and hymn for the first time here.

The Beethoven overture is one of this master's grandest works, being full of dramatic effects and furious orchestration. Short and melodic phrases are repeated by the different instruments to be suddenly interrupted by a storm of brassy. It has been called "an overture in a new form," because of Beethoven's departure from the accepted canons of overture compositions.

The orchestra, especially the strings, played the number grandly. The phrase variations illustrated the homogeneity of team work of the different instruments, the passages being given with precision and unity.

Mr. Arthur Foote's musical setting of Longfellow's "Skeleton in Armor" was given by the orchestra, Boston Symphony chorus, and the soloists, Mrs. Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Foote conducting. After a short and sombre orchestral introduction the chorus takes up the line, "Speak, Speak! Thou Fearful Guest."

which is the keynote as it were, to Mr. Foote's introductory music. The spirit then changes to the heroic style, and in this allegro the chorus sang with splendid results.

In gentler strain the quartet then follows; after which the story of the Viking's flight is told, closing with song of the sea. The passing away of the Viking's lady love and his violent death close the cantata.

Mr. Foote has written a work which may be classed as artistic and musical; musical in the sense of continued harmonious forms which are not over-elaborated or intricate.

The text of the poem is beautifully illustrated by the orchestra as well as the vocal setting, and the instruments are used as a background and seldom appearing prominently excepting in the dramatic portions of the work.

The allegro, "Scarce had I put to Sea," is a charmingly breezy bit of writing, and the descriptive, "Death Without Quarter," is broadly scored for both contingents of the performers.

In the closing quartet there is a dainty theme for strings and flutes, and the vocal part is also a fine example of sympathetic writing.

The composition must inevitably take high rank as a chorus composition, for to that body is given the principal work. The orchestra did very well as a whole, although the brass contingent showed unfamiliarity with the author's style of leading.

The solo roles were well sung by Mrs. Smith, Miss Carlsmith and Messrs. Parker and Hay. Mr. Foote was cordially received, and that his fine composition gave great pleasure to the large audience was shown by the liberal applause at the close of its rendition.

Brahms' "Song of Destiny" was given a satisfactory performance. The running accompaniments by the orchestra, with the chorus singing in unison, was very smoothly played.

The last number upon the programme was Prof. John Knowles Paine's Columbus march and hymn, written for the Columbian exhibition, and played for the first time in this city. The text is also by Prof. Paine, and the work is scored for the full modern orchestra.

The style of composition is, of course, martial, and it admits of heavy and sustained effects by the brasses and instruments of percussion.

Two themes are given to the orchestra in the march, which are worked out with stentorian modulations, these joining at the close and leading up to the hymn.

The chances for lights and shades in a work of this nature are so few that one is forced to view the piece from a patriotic rather than from an artistic standpoint.

Prof. Paine has scored the march grandly and with but little of the blatant element, when the style of the production is considered. The heroics are not tawdry or commonplace; the themes are developed harmoniously and clearly, and there are many passages which thrill the auditor, especially when that auditor is an American.

It was given without the organ, hardly a noticeable omission in this case, and with the quartet and chorus.

The vocal work was spirited and generally acceptable; although the volume of the instruments was sufficient to drown the efforts of the singers in many instances.

The next programme, to be given Feb. 17 and 18, is as follows: Thieriot, symphony in E major, op. 55, first time; Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte in G minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 7, in A major. Soloist, Mr. George M. Nowell.

PROF. JOHN K. PAINE.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "Coriolan," Opus 62.
Foote: "The Skeleton in Armor," Ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra. Opus 28.
Brahms: "A Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra. Opus 54.
Paine: "Columbus," March and hymn, for chorus and orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Chorus assisted, and Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay sang the solo parts.

These concerts in which a chorus sits round the orchestra are not the ones in which the orchestra sounds best. After three or four experiments, one is even in doubt whether they pay musically. The idea of having a chorus regularly associated with a symphony orchestra is by no means new; in certain conditions it is an excellent one. Take, for instance, the Conservatoire concerts in Paris; at these concerts a chorus always takes part. But the chorus is a small one, of professional trained singers, who are paid for their work, and who can consequently be employed without any regard for their own pleasure, but simply for the good of the concerts. Thus the chorus can be called into play whenever, and as often as, it is wanted. As a rule, there are one or two choral numbers at a concert; not more; and it should be remembered that the programmes are considerably longer than ours. The chorus is not grouped round the orchestra, as with us, but is massed together just in front of the orchestra; the singers invariably sing sitting. The orchestra is drawn up behind them on a permanent raised platform, the general form of which is that of an amphitheatre; it has the wall of the hall, or what other sound-reflecting surface there may be, immediately behind it. As the orchestra is thus raised above the singers, it plays over their heads, straight at the audience; the chorus being numerically small, it absorbs exceedingly little, if any, of the orchestral tone. The purely orchestral pieces make their full effect while, in the choral numbers, the chorus, singing directly into the audience from the front of the platform, tells "for all it is worth." These are perhaps ideal conditions for symphony concerts interspersed with choral selections.

But it is difficult to see how these conditions can be made to exist here in Boston. Our chorus singers are almost without exception amateurs; their voices, as a rule, are neither so strong nor so telling as those of trained professionals, and to get an effective chorus you must have more of them. This encumbers the platform. As amateurs, they all have their regular avocations, which they must give up to attend rehearsals and performances; they sing mainly for their own enjoyment or from good will toward the concerts, and cannot be worked as paid professionals can. To get them together is no slight task, and it is no mean effort on their part to go through the work of rehearsals and concert. Thus it is not rationally worth while to form and rehearse a chorus unless you get a good deal of singing out of it. To take all these pains for the sake of one choral number on a programme is out of all due proportion between effort and result. It is especially unwise, as the mere presence of the chorus on the platform injures the effect of all the orchestral numbers; and to ask volunteer singers to sing in one number, and wait in the green-room until their turn comes, thus preventing their hearing the rest of the concert, is not the part of common courtesy. The chorus can be made musically worth while only by giving it the lion's share of the programme; and this turns the whole thing from a symphony concert into a choral concert.

Now it is hard to see what sufficient reason there is for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's giving choral concerts; this field has been amply worked in Boston for the last ever so many years; we have already all the choral concerts we know what to do with. In this respect we are better off than they are in Paris, where, with the exception of the Société des Grandes Auditions Chorales (which gives fewer concerts a year than our Handel and Haydn does), the Conservatoire is about the only regular organization that gives choral performances. And Paris has three independent symphony orchestras that give their concerts invariably on the same afternoon! To have a choral annex, to add variety to what are mainly orchestral concerts—just as solo singers or players do—is a very different matter from giving essentially choral concerts. And we have shown why it is not easily practicable to have a chorus to do nothing more than add the desirable variety to symphony concerts in this city. The game is not worth the candle. And, in so far as choral concerts, properly so called, are concerned, that sort of thing is so done, and so well done, by other societies that there is no need of the Symphony Orchestra's putting its finger into the pie.

Last Saturday evening the "Coriolan" overture, evidently well played, made next to no effect at all: the tone of the orchestra was so damped and muffled by the surrounding ranks of chorus singers.

Mr. Foote's "Skeleton in Armor" (conducted by himself) is a work to be spoken of both with respect and admiration. Mr. Foote's affection for Longfellow's ballads is apparently unquenchable; so, in spite of our conviction that they are not the best material in the world for extended musical setting, we will say no more on this head. Let us say at once, however, that in this last work of his Mr. Foote seems to us to have been far more successful in catching and holding fast by the true ballad tone than in any of his previous attempts. That he has completely solved the problem—as Carl Loewe did in his ballads for a single voice—can hardly be said; in this "Skeleton in Armor" the absence of distinctly dramatic style results in certain instances in a corresponding loss of dramatic effect, notably in places where the suggestions of the text are essentially dramatic. He has not quite caught the art of dramatic coloring without doing violence to the even, lyrical flow of the ballad style. But he has come much nearer to it than ever before, and has at the same time preserved the ballad style in far greater purity. Instances of the musical rhythm running disturbingly counter to the poetic metre are quite exceptional here, whereas in his "Hiawatha" and "Wreck of the Hes-perus" they were far more frequent, and also far more striking. The whole "Skeleton in Armor," in spite of its rhythmic variety and frequent shiftings of keys, impresses one as springing from one inspiration, and being cast in a single mould. In musical workmanship it is thoroughly excellent; it is poetic in conception and admirably strong in execution. Its absolute clearness is something uncommon today. The performance was capital, the quartet of solo voices doing extremely good work. It was very enthusiastically received, the composer being repeatedly called out after it. Mr. Foote has scored one more success.

Brahms's "Song of Destiny" is a work of infinite beauty, but somehow it seemed singularly ineffective last Saturday evening. The orchestra sounded dull and muffled as it did in the "Coriolan" overture, and the chorus, although apparently singing well enough, was not impressive.

Columbus does not seem to have brought great luck to American composers. Dudley Buck once wrote an overture on him that proved to be one of his weakest works, and we mistake much if the "Columbus" march and hymn keeps a very high place in the list of Mr. Paine's compositions. It is a gorgeously instrumented, pompous march, terminating in a hymn broad three-two time sung by the chorus. But the work does not strike one at the first hearing as of finer quality than occasional compositions in general are. Mr. Paine has done far better things.

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Feb. 17, and Saturday evening, Feb. 18) is: Thérriot; sinfonietta in E major, opus 55; Saint-Saëns, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22; Beethoven, symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92. Mr. George M. Nowell will be the pianist. There will be no rehearsal nor concert next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, American Composers Honored.

The Nordica and Damrosch Operatic Programmes—"The Lion Tamer"—Recitals by Max Heinrich and Wife and Scharwenka—Grossmith's Return—Tonight's Handel and Haydn.

The American composers resident in this vicinity were duly recognized in last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony series, and the action of Conductor Nikisch in giving this prominence to native talent was productive of much satisfaction.

In commenting upon the evening's events first mention is due to Prof. John K. Payne's "Columbus March and Hymn," composed for orchestra and chorus, by request, for the dedicatory exercises of the Columbian Exposition at Chicago last October. It was very gratifying to have an opportunity to hear this composition under such favorable circumstances, for, with the chorus organized for these concerts and the Symphony orchestra, a combination of musical forces was had, which gave the grand composition a most complete interpretation.

The introduction of the orchestral movement is inspiring in its breadth and dignity, and at once stamps the work as that of a master in the use of all of the resources of the modern orchestra. In the march movement two themes of striking merit are used with rare skill and discretion, and the repetition of the introduction leads the hymn with excellent effect.

Prof. Paine's verses make an excellent subject for his genius as a composer, and in the choral movement he has used the voices of the choir in a way that brings the composition to a telling climax. The performance of the march and hymn created a marked impression, and the composer was duly honored by the applause which followed its termination.

Mr. Arthur Foote's ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra, being a musical setting of Longfellow's poem "The Skeleton in Armor," was also included in the evening's programme, its production, for the first time here, being made under the composer's baton.

The selection of this ballad for such elaborate treatment does not appear to be quite wise, and the composer has not been altogether happy in his assignment of the verses. The work is in cantata form, and despite the sterling ability shown in the orchestral and voice parts there is a lack of strength and contrast in the ballad, as a whole, which is hardly in keeping with the earlier works by Mr. Foote. The ballad is well suited for single voice, but hardly affords the opportunities demanded to use such a combination of vocal forces as have been employed by Mr. Foote. The orchestral score is rich in tone color, and much success has attended the treatment of this portion of the composition.

The chorus did commendable work in their numbers, and were well aided by Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay in the quartets.

A grandly effective performance of Brahms's "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, already heard in the Cecilia programmes, with the ever welcome "Coriolan" overture, completed the programme.

The reseating of the stage, by which the chorus and orchestra were both accommodated, has been very successfully accomplished, and the singers were well placed for effective results.

The orchestra is on one of its occasional tours the coming week, and on the evening of the 18th inst. the programme will be the E major symphonietta by Thérriot, Saint-Saëns' G minor piano concerto and Beethoven's seventh symphony, the soloist being Mr. George M. Nowell.

TIGHT BINDING

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Fourteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Second Concert of the Handel and Haydn Society.

"Phoenix Expirans" Set to Music by George W. Chadwick.

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Coriolan".....Beethoven
"The Skeleton in Armor," Ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra. (First time in Boston).....Foote
"A Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra.....Brahms
"Columbus March and Hymn." (First time in Boston.) Paine

Mrs. Barnard-Smith, Miss Carlsmith, Messrs. Geo. J. Parker and Clarence E. Hay sang the quartettes in Mr. Foote's ballad. The chorus was the Boston Symphony Chorus.

It may be said that Mr. Foote was unfortunate in his choice of a text, for Longfellow's poem does not appear to allow of rhythmic diversity in music, at least as far as Mr. Foote is concerned. The question is not whether the choice was judicious. The composer might have told of "Sir Patrick Spens," he might have dreamed over James Clarence Mangan's "Vision of Compnaught," the superb and mystical poem of the time and the years of Cahal Mor of the Wine red Hand; he might have taken from Percy's Reliques, "John Barleycorn" with its stirring lines,

"John Barleycorn has got a beard,
Like any other man."

Mr. Foote preferred "The Skeleton in Armor." The question is this, What did he do with it?

He that proposes to put music to a ballad full of panoramic incidents must, if he wishes to gain dramatic effect, treat the detail dramatically or choose two or three salient scenes and create as many moods, sharply defined and contrasting. If he consider carefully every point he is apt to lose sight of one great climax; or the effect is frittered away by italicizing so many sentences; or the work is prolonged unduly. The ballad then becomes as jejune and foolish as Dr. Johnson's celebrated burlesque:

"The tender infant, meek and mild,
Fell down upon the stone;
The nurse took up the squealing child,
But still the child squeal'd on."

Mr. Foote avoided these dangers, it is true. He also avoided, alas, dramatic intensity in his treatment of a few contrasting scenes. He employed a quartette for the expression of the gloom and the peaceful married life. He used the allegro in different degrees and with various modifications. In spite of these efforts the ballad is undramatic. The music seldom suits or intensifies the words.

A reader of imagination and well-trained voice could make a more vivid impression by reciting this poem of Longfellow. In Mr. Foote's setting the music often obscures the words and at times wars against the palpable meaning of them.

The questioner, the narrator and the skeleton that answers are all one and the same musical person. This one musical person is not a ventriloquist. The skeleton that once skated, led a wild life, asked the consent of Hildebrand, bore away the mail, and then, after years of quiet enjoyment, allowed his soul to go skyward by falling upon a spear, has the same voice in the episodes of his existence.

Is there horror in the first inquiry? No. Is awe inspired by the narration of the coming to life? No. Is the "dead man's curse" effective? No; for tempo, notation and leading of voices deny the possible existence of effect. And so throughout the catalogue of incidents. Once, it is true, Mr. Foote succeeded in giving comparative pleasure—in the pretty and conventional treatment of the few lines beginning, "Once, as I told in glee," the quartette, pp. 10-14.

The music is undramatic. The voices are at times treated so that their walk is stiff; at other times they are soled that the resulting harmony is dry, noisy and without effect. There is occasionally a sense of awkwardness in the reading, as in the eleventh and twelfth measures of the fifteenth page.

Nor can the instrumentation be praised. It is either thin or thick. The voice parts are too frequently doubled by instruments. The different choirs of instruments are not effectively used against each other. There seems to be little attention paid to the peculiar characteristics of the instruments.

Throughout the work there is a certain fever, but it is a slow fever. There are hints of dramatic effects that are postponed indefinitely. There are false prophecies concerning the arrival of a climax.

It is true that the ballad was not well sung. The chorus no doubt contains excellent material, but the parts are not well balanced; the intonation is not above reproach; the attack is not decisive. The ballad was conducted Saturday evening by its composer; it is therefore fair to say that it was read in accordance with the wishes of the composer. And yet his indications in the voice and pianoforte edition were not followed. The ballad is peppered hotly with these indications. But Saturday evening there was not one pianissimo observed, and p p p seemed as unintelligible as an hieroglyphic. There was a monotone of forte that was of close kin to fortissimo. There was little rhythmic sense. The musical sentences were not read as sentences, and there was always undue importance given to the first beat. Even the experienced singers of the quartette sang without full appreciation of the character of 9-8 movement.

Mr. Foote's work was applauded heartily, and he was recalled two or three times.

Prof. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn" was "written by official invitation for the opening ceremonies of the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago and performed there for the first time in October of last year." It was written with a view to performance in an immense hall, with an orchestra of 200 and a chorus of 5000. To judge of its merits when it is given under different conditions might be regarded properly as unfair. These general statements may, however, be made. First, nearly all of the compositions known to the French as "official machines" may have which they were written; they have seldom been of permanent worth; they have seldom preserved alone the name of the composer. Again, Prof. Paine had contributed to the musical reputation of his country by his music to "CE ious" and by orchestral works before the Columbian Exposition was a fact. The invitation extended to him by the managers of the exposition was a deserved tribute of respect and admiration. The acceptance of the invitation was the graceful act of a composer who knew full well the difficulties of the undertaking. To write a march that should be worthy of his reputation and of the occasion and at the same time be not devoid of the elements of popularity, that was indeed a task.

It would seem from the performance of Saturday evening that if Prof. Paine erred in the fulfillment of his task, it was in the desire to gain instantaneous popularity. Whatever may have been the effect produced at Chicago, this march cannot be classed among the most dignified, original and thoroughly musical works of the eminent composer.

The "Song of Destiny" has been heard in Music Hall under more favorable conditions. The Boston Symphony Chorus in its present state is not able to give such a work with proper effect.

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The programme of the rehearsal and concert of Feb. 17-18 will be as follows: Symphonietta, E major, op. 55, Thieriot; concerto, G minor, for pianoforte, Saint-Saens; Symphony, A major, No. 7, Beethoven. The pianist will be Mr. George M. Nowell.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

The concert in Music Hall, last evening, was for the most part given by the Boston Symphony Chorus, the only orchestral performance, strictly speaking, being that of the overture to "Coriolan," in C minor, opus 62, Ludwig van Beethoven. As Beethoven was well acquainted with the master works of Plutarch and Shakespeare. It may at first thought seem strange that he should have gone out of his way to make his overture serve as a prelude to the five-act tragedy by Collin on the subject of the famous Roman. Collin and Beethoven, however, were personal friends, and the overture was written at a time (1807) when the former was secretary to the war department of the Austrian Government. In this same year Beethoven also wrote the Ramoumoffsky quartettes, the pianoforte concerto in G; and the C minor symphony was also near at hand. Richard Wagner identifies the overture with the scene between Coriolanus, his mother and his wife on the battle field before the gates of his native city, when the chieftain yielding to feminine entreaties, refused to assault the place and thereupon suffered death at the hands of Volcan Atilus, his associate in the enterprise. Reichardt, however, has said that it is a better representation of Beethoven himself than of the Roman, whose name it bears, and it is also the opinion of the same authority that both in the overture and the "Herole" symphony, Beethoven was unconsciously painting his own portrait. The heroic elements of the work with all the intense energy and fever-heat in attendance upon them were oddly enough sterilized and rendered ineffective in the interpretation by Mr. Nikisch.

Following the overture was Mr. Arthur Foote's ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra, opus 23. The composer himself conducted, and the select quartet for the performance consisted of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. Making due allowances for a single hearing of Mr. Foote's work its psychical relation to the words of Longfellow is not wholly clear, and it would appear to have been more scholastically throughout than deeply felt. That the work is the production of a highly cultivated musician is as apparent as need be, but a certain monotony is engendered possibly by the composer's over anxiety to do justice to the spirit of the words at a consequent sacrifice of an adequate amount of spontaneity. The ballad, it is true, was somewhat inanimately sung by the chorus, but the select quartet for the performance was all that could have been wished. The Song of Destiny by Brahms, and the admirable Columbus March and Hymn, by John Knowles Paine were delightfully given. At the next concert Mr. George M. Nowell will appear as soloist with the pianoforte concerto in G minor, by Saint-Saens.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was largely attended. The programme was, with the exception of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture, devoted wholly to vocal works, Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker, Mr. Clarence Hay, and the Boston Symphony Chorus, assisting. The works presented were Mr. Arthur Foote's setting of "The Skeleton in Armor," for quartet, chorus, and orchestra, which was given for the first time; Brahms's "Song of Destiny," and Mr. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn" for chorus and orchestra. The choral body did not prove large enough to produce the desired effect; it, in fact, is too small for the purpose for which it was formed and is lopsided in respect to balance of voices. There are not enough tenors and basses, and the volume of tone is lacking in necessary fullness. The chorus singing was none of the best. We have become so accustomed to the almost perfect work of our prominent singing societies that we are scarcely prepared to derive pleasure, enjoyment or satisfaction from such unsteady, colorless and unfinished singing as that which the Boston Symphony chorus vouchsafed last night. It was not worthy the orchestra whose name it shares. If the body cannot be enlarged to the proper size, and if better results than were achieved on this occasion cannot be obtained, it would be wise to omit the performance of important choral works from the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thus far the chorus has not acquitted itself in a manner to justify the expectations that were aroused when its formation was first announced. Mr. Foote's cantata, which was conducted by the composer, was very disappointing. It shows but little invention, is without any marked contrasts, and is dull and monotonous generally. The orchestration is frequently tasteful, but on the whole sounds thin and ineffective. The work is strangely barren of climaxes. There is a constant reaching out for them but they are never achieved. The music is well made but it has the fatality to be uninteresting. Its melodies are labored and dry, and have no distinguishing individuality. In other words, it is deliberate, almost perfunctory, music, suggesting neither spontaneity nor inspiration. Though in nowise plagiaristic, yet it nowhere gives the impression of originality. Often it recalls the conventional church anthem, and often it is cloudy in both the orchestral and vocal writing. Its best moments are to be found in the two quartets, but even here there is nothing that rises above the purely conventional. Through out there is an apparent struggle for something that the composer constantly fails to attain. In fact, its effect is that of industriously and carefully manufactured music. Mr. Foote has proved himself capable of far better work. Of the performance there is not much to be said. It was uneven and steadily barren of light and shade. Sometimes the chorus obliterated the orchestra, and often the orchestra blotted out the chorus, while a lack of emphasis and rhythmical swing generally characterized the rendering as a whole. It was listened to with great attention, and at its end Mr. Foote was recalled three times with great enthusiasm. The Brahms chorus is not the most inspiring of works, but its clearness and its positiveness caused it to seem like a burst of musical sunshine after what had preceded it. The singing was not of the most tuneful and was monotonously dry, but the graceful orchestral prelude was beautifully played. We regret that Mr. Paine's march and hymn were not heard under more favorable circumstances. Here the richness and the fullness of the orchestration overwhelmed the small chorus. The work was written for an immense hall and the massive scoring was intended to be offset by five thousand voices. The small body of singers that sang on this occasion was therefore scarcely calculated to produce the effect intended by the composer. The introduction is impressively stirring, with its brilliant trumpet fanfares. The march is broad and flowing in its melodious themes and it moves with fine and imposing stateliness to a stirring climax as it breaks into the large and simple hymn. The composer's thorough knowledge of instrumental effect and of the full resources of the modern orchestra are displayed in a masterly manner throughout. At its conclusion the work was applauded with great enthusiasm. Still, as it was impossible to do it justice under prevailing conditions, it was a mistake to perform it. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonietta, by Thieriot (first time); Concerto for pianoforte, in G minor, Saint-Saens; Symphony, No. 7, Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mr. Busoni? No! Mr. Perabo? No! Mr. Baermann? No! Mr. George M. Nowell!

Two New Productions at Saturday Night's Symphony.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening, assisted by a body of singers, known as the Boston Symphony Chorus.

The programme consisted of overture to "Coriolanus," Beethoven; "The Skeleton in Armor," ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra, Arthur Foote; "A Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, Brahms, and "Columbus March and Hymn," John K. Paine. Mr. Foote's ballad and Prof. Paine's piece were given for the first time in Boston. The latter composition was written through invitation of the committee for the opening of the World's Fair at Chicago last October, and was produced on that occasion by the large orchestra and chorus of 5000 voices assembled to take part in the ceremonies.

It is a work worthy of the genius and ripe musicianship of its author, the most eminent American composer. It is broad and majestic in construction, melodic and flowing in its themes, and most brilliantly, but discretely, scored for the fullest orchestra. The trumpet passages at the beginning and the end are noble and stirring in their effects. The Hymn, (the words also by Prof. Paine,) although simple in structure is of majestic proportions in the effect gained. It appears at the climax of the composition, and is most happily joined to its orchestral preparation. Unfortunately the chorus was too feeble for obtaining the effect intended by the composer as it was written for a large body of singers, and being so fully scored the comparatively small number served their purpose on the occasion for which they were written; they have seldom been of permanent worth; they have seldom preserved alone the name of the composer. Again, Prof. Paine had contributed to the musical reputation of his country by his music to "Columbus" and by orchestral works before the Columbian Exposition was a fact. The invitation extended to him by the managers of the exposition was a deserved tribute of respect and admiration. The acceptance of the invitation was the graceful act of a composer who knew full well the difficulties of the undertaking. To write a march that should be worthy of his reputation and of the occasion and at the same time be not devoid of the elements of popularity, that was indeed a task.

It would seem from the performance of Saturday evening that if Prof. Paine erred in the fulfillment of his task, it was in the desire to gain instantaneous popularity. Whatever may have been the effect produced at Chicago, this march cannot be classed among the most dignified, original and thoroughly musical works of the eminent composer.

The "Song of Destiny" has been heard in Music Hall under more favorable conditions. The Boston Symphony Chorus in its present state is not able to give such a work with proper effect.

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The programme of the rehearsal and concert of Feb. 17-18 will be as follows: Symphonietta, E major, op. 55, Thieriot; concerto, G minor, for pianoforte, Saint-Saens; Symphony, A major, No. 7, Beethoven. The pianist will be Mr. George M. Nowell.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

The concert in Music Hall, last evening, was for the most part given by the Boston Symphony Chorus, the only orchestral performance, strictly speaking, being that of the overture to "Coriolan," in C minor, opus 62, Ludwig van Beethoven. As Beethoven was well acquainted with the master works of Plutarch and Shakespeare, it may at first thought seem strange that he should have gone out of his way to make his overture serve as a prelude to the five-act tragedy by Collin on the subject of the famous Roman. Collin and Beethoven, however, were personal friends, and the overture was written at a time (1807) when the former was secretary to the war department of the Austrian Government. In this same year Beethoven also wrote the Ramonouffsky quartettes, the pianoforte concerto in G; and the C minor symphony was also near at hand. Richard Wagner identifies the overture with the scene between Coriolanus, his mother and his wife on the battle field before the gates of his native city, when the chieftain yielding to feminine entreaties, refused to assault the place and thereupon suffered death at the hands of Volcan Attius, his associate in the enterprise. Reichardt, however, has said that it is a better representation of Beethoven himself than of the Roman, whose name it bears, and it is also the opinion of the same authority that both in the overture and the "Heroic" symphony, Beethoven was unconsciously painting his own portrait. The heroic elements of the work with all the intense energy and fever-heat in attendance upon them were oddly enough sterilized and rendered ineffective in the interpretation by Mr. Nikisch.

Following the overture was Mr. Arthur Foote's ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra, opus 28. The composer himself conducted, and the select quartet for the performance consisted of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker and Mr. Clarence E. Hay. Making due allowances for a single hearing of Mr. Foote's work its psychical relation to the words of Longfellow is not wholly clear, and it would appear to have been more scholastically throughout than deeply felt. That the work is the production of a highly cultivated musician is as apparent as need be, but a certain monotony is engendered possibly by the composer's over anxiety to do justice to the spirit of the words at a consequent sacrifice of an adequate amount of spontaneity. The ballad, it is true, was somewhat inanimately sung by the chorus, but the select quartet for the performance was all that could have been wished. The Song of Destiny by Brahms, and the admirable Columbus March and Hymn, by John Knowles Paine were delightfully given. At the next concert Mr. George M. Nowell will appear as soloist with the pianoforte concerto in G minor, by Saint-Saens.

The Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was largely attended. The programme was, with the exception of Beethoven's "Coriolanus" Overture, devoted wholly to vocal works, Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Lillian Carlsmith, Mr. George J. Parker, Mr. Clarence Hay, and the Boston Symphony Chorus, assisting. The works presented were Mr. Arthur Foote's setting of "The Skeleton in Armor," for quartet, chorus, and orchestra, which was given for the first time; Brahms's "Song of Destiny," and Mr. Paine's "Columbus March and Hymn" for chorus and orchestra. The chorus body did not prove large enough to produce the desired effect; it is, in fact, too small for the purpose for which it was formed and is lopsided in respect to balance of voices. There are not enough tenors and basses, and the volume of tone is lacking in necessary fulness. The chorus singing was none of the best. We have become so accustomed to the almost perfect work of our prominent singing societies that we are scarcely prepared to derive pleasure, enjoyment or satisfaction from such unsteady, colorless and unfinished singing as that which the Boston Symphony chorus vouchsafed last night. It was not worthy the orchestra whose name it shares. If the body cannot be enlarged to the proper size, and if better results than were achieved on this occasion cannot be obtained, it would be wise to omit the performance of important choral works from the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thus far the chorus has not acquitted itself in a manner to justify the expectations that were aroused when its formation was first announced. Mr. Foote's cantata, which was conducted by the composer, was very disappointing. It shows but little invention, is without any marked contrasts, and is dull and monotonous generally. The orchestration is frequently tasteful, but on the whole sounds thin and ineffective. The work is strangely barren of climaxes. There is a constant reaching out for them but they are never achieved. The music is well made but it has the fatality to be uninteresting. Its melodies are labored and dry, and have no distinguishing individuality. In other words, it is deliberate, almost perfunctory, music, suggesting neither spontaneity nor inspiration. Though in nowise plagiaristic, yet it nowhere gives the impression of originality. Often it recalls the conventional church anthem, and often it is cloudy in both the orchestral and vocal writing. Its best moments are to be found in the two quartets, but even here there is nothing that rises above the purely conventional. Throughout there is an apparent struggle for something that the composer constantly fails to attain. In fact, its effect is that of industriously and carefully manufactured music. Mr. Foote has proved himself capable of far better work. Of the performance there is not much to be said. It was uneven and steadily barren of light and shade. Sometimes the chorus obliterated the orchestra, and often the orchestra blotted out the chorus, while a lack of emphasis and rhythmical swing generally characterized the rendering as a whole. It was listened to with great attention, and at its end Mr. Foote was recalled three times with great enthusiasm. The Brahms chorus is not the most inspiring of works, but its clearness and its positiveness caused it to seem like a burst of musical sunshine after what had preceded it. The singing was not of the most tuneful and was monotonously dry, but the graceful orchestral prelude was beautifully played. We regret that Mr. Paine's march an hymn were not heard under more favorable circumstances. Here the richness and the fullness of the orchestration overwhelmed the small chorus. The work was written for an immense hall and the massive scoring was intended to be offset by five thousand voices. The small body of singers that sang on this occasion was therefore scarcely calculated to produce the effect intended by the composer. The introduction is impressively stirring, with its brilliant trumpet fanfares. The march is broad and flowing in its melodious themes and it moves with fine and imposing stateliness to a stirring climax as it breaks into the large and simple hymn. The composer's thorough knowledge of instrumental effect and of the full resources of the modern orchestra are displayed in a masterly manner throughout. At its conclusion the work was applauded with great enthusiasm. Still, as it was impossible to do it justice under prevailing conditions, it was a mistake to perform it. The programme for the next concert is: Symphonietta, by Thieriot (first time); Concerto for pianoforte, in G minor, Saint-Saens; Symphony, No. 7, Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mr. Busoni? No! Mr. Perabo? No! Mr. Baermann? No! Mr. George M. Nowell!!!

Two New Productions at Saturday Night's Symphony.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening, assisted by a body of singers known as the Boston Symphony Chorus.

The programme consisted of overture to "Coriolanus," Beethoven; "The Skeleton in Armor," ballad for chorus, quartet and orchestra, Arthur Foote; "A Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra, Brahms, and "Columbus March and Hymn," John K. Paine. Mr. Foote's ballad and Prof. Paine's piece were given for the first time in Boston. The latter composition was written through invitation of the committee for the opening of the World's Fair at Chicago last October, and was produced on that occasion by the large orchestra and chorus of 5000 voices assembled to take part in the ceremonies.

It is a work worthy of the genius and ripe musicianship of its author, the most eminent American composer. It is broad and majestic in construction, melodic and flowing in its themes, and most brilliantly, but discretely, scored for the fullest orchestra. The trumpet passages at the beginning and the end are noble and stirring in their effects. The Hymn, (the words also by Prof. Paine,) although simple in structure is of majestic proportions in the effect gained. It appears at the climax of the composition, and is most happily joined to its orchestral preparation. Unfortunately the chorus was too feeble for obtaining the effect intended by the composer as it was written for a large body of singers, and being so fully scored the comparatively small number of voices was completely overpowered. Mr. Foote's work shows the skilled musician that he is, both in the employment of voices and instruments, but it is not so spontaneous as other of his compositions, and failed of effect where one anticipated a climax. This might have been bettered by a more artistic rendering than it received. There are contrasts and nuances indicated in the score that did not appear in the performance. The Brahms piece is a graceful and clear composition, and was played by the orchestra in a commendable manner. The chorus did not achieve a success in either this or Mr. Foote's piece, and it was overwhelmed in Prof. Paine's Hymn. What is the use of the Boston Symphony Orchestra "fooling" in such a manner? Let it attend to its legitimate function, the performance of orchestral compositions. There will be no concert next Saturday evening, but on the following Saturday another pianistic venture takes place. A Mr. George M. Nowell was presented. Saint-Saens's G minor concerto will be played, and the seventh Beethoven symphony and a symphonietta by Theirot will complete the programme.

190

LAST week's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was quite as numerously attended as its forerunners, but its impression was scarcely as cheering. Mr. Nikisch is not always happy in making up a programme, and on this occasion he was even less felicitous than he generally is; the chief soloist of the evening, too, proved a distinct disappointment. Even the performance of the band was less admirable than usual: there were flaws in the rendering of the Eighth Symphony, for example, that rather surprised the habitués of these functions, accustomed, as a rule, to wellnigh perfect work on the part of the musicians. "The Dance of the Sylphs," from "La Damnation de Faust," however, was one of those exquisite bits of execution that would make any concert memorable. Concerning the principal soloist, a youthful Italian pianist, Signorina Eugenia Castellano by name—I refer to her as the principal soloist because Mr. Adamowski, who interpreted two movements of Bruch's violin concerto No. 1, is no stranger to the New York public—it is only necessary to say that she disclosed in Mendelssohn's G minor concerto a remarkable mastery of technique and a painful deficiency of musical feeling. The artist that is deaf to the melodious charm of music of this sort, and subordinates sentiment and expression to a show of digital dexterity, ranks no higher, in my opinion, than an automaton to which one might entrust the turning of the crank of an organ.

— Why will the sprightly and entertaining N. Y. Recorder take such "half views of men and things" as the following? "The funniest row of the winter is now going on between Harry Cannon and Nikisch, the Boston fiddler and leader of the orchestra that played last week at Harry Cannon's subscription concert. Nikisch is a little, dark, mussy-haired musician, who has been petted and spoiled in Boston by Mrs. Jack Gardner and some others of her set. Harry Cannon is a little blond, mussy-pated chappie of New York, who may have been spoiled by having had a good time all his life, with lots of money to spend. Nikisch, the brunette, accuses Cannon, the blonde, of having been very rude and arbitrary to him on the occasion of Nikisch's orchestra being hired to give a performance at Cannon's house. The word "hire" is the stumbling block. What does an artist lose or gain when he is hired to play in a private house? Harry Cannon claims that Nikisch gains his price, and cold supper and stale champagne thrown in for himself and musicians. Nikisch claims that he gains social recognition, a high seat at the synagogue, hot oysters a la poulette, and 'fizz' galore, freshly opened and poured into goblets. Moreover, Nikisch and his men were admitted by a side door of the Cannon house, and he claims the front door only should have been opened for them. The quarrel is a very pretty one all round. However much Harry Cannon may have been spoiled, he has not been found lacking in those generous impulses which amateurs often show to professionals. As a sculptor of no mean fame, Harry Cannon maintained a studio up town, and has over and over again called in professional talent to assist at the exhibitions of his works of art. At no one of these somewhat famous symposiums of luxurious society and talented professionals have I ever heard a word of disagreement as to the standing of the professionals or the graceful seated pose of society. It may be that Nikisch has presumed too far. It cannot be that Harry Cannon and his pretty wife have intentionally slurred so great an artist." Feb 6 1893

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

FERDINAND THIERIOT.

SINFONIETTA, in E major, op. 55.

- I. Allegro moderato. E major.
- II. Romanze: Andante. B major.
- III. Tarantella: Presto. E minor.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, G minor, op. 22.

- I. Andante sostenuto. G minor.
- II. Allegro scherzando. E flat major.
- III. Presto. G minor.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 7, in A major, op. 92.

- I. Poco sostenuto. A major. Vivace. A major.
- II. Allegretto. A minor.
- III. Presto. F major. Assai meno presto. D major.
- IV. Allegro con brio. A major.

SOLOIST:

MR. GEORGE M. NOWELL.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

of voices was completely overpowered. Mr. Foote's work shows the skilled musician that he is, both in the employment of voices and instruments, but it is not so spontaneous as other of his compositions, and failed of effect where one anticipated a climax. This might have been bettered by a more artistic rendering than it received. There are contrasts and nuances indicated in the score that did not appear in the performance. The Brahms piece is a graceful and clear composition, and was played by the orchestra in a commendable manner. The chorus did not achieve a success in either this or Mr. Foote's piece, and it was overwhelmed in Prof. Pane's Hymn. What is the use of the Boston Symphony Orchestra "fooling" in such a manner? Let it attend to its legitimate function, the performance of orchestral compositions. There will be no concert next Saturday evening, but on the following Saturday another pianistic venture takes place. A Mr. George M. Nowell was presented. Saint-Saens's G minor concerto will be played, and the seventh Beethoven symphony and a symphonietta by Theirot will complete the programme.

LAST week's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert was quite as numerously attended as its forerunners, but its impression was scarcely as cheering. Mr. Nikisch is not always happy in making up a programme, and on this occasion he was even less felicitous than he generally is; the chief soloist of the evening, too, proved a distinct disappointment. Even the performance of the band was less admirable than usual: there were flaws in the rendering of the Eighth Symphony, for example, that rather surprised the habitués of these functions, accustomed, as a rule, to wellnigh perfect work on the part of the musicians. "The Dance of the Sylphs," from "La Damnation de Faust," however, was one of those exquisite bits of execution that would make any concert memorable. Concerning the principal soloist, a youthful Italian pianist, Signorina Eugenia Castellano by name—I refer to her as the principal soloist because Mr. Adamowski, who interpreted two movements of Bruch's violin concerto No. 1, is no stranger to the New York public—it is only necessary to say that she disclosed in Mendelssohn's G minor concerto a remarkable mastery of technique and a painful deficiency of musical feeling. The artist that is deaf to the melodious charm of music of this sort, and subordinates sentiment and expression to a show of digital dexterity, ranks no higher, in my opinion, than an automaton to which one might entrust the turning of the crank of an organ.

— Why will the sprightly and entertaining N. Y. Recorder take such "half views of men and things" as the following? "The funniest row of the winter is now going on between Harry Cannon and Nikisch, the Boston fiddler and leader of the orchestra that played last week at Harry Cannon's subscription concert. Nikisch is a little, dark, mussy-haired musician, who has been petted and spoiled in Boston by Mrs. Jack Gardner and some others of her set. Harry Cannon is a little blond, mussy-pated chappie of New York, who may have been spoiled by having had a good time all his life, with lots of money to spend. Nikisch, the brunette, accuses Cannon, the blonde, of having been very rude and arbitrary to him on the occasion of Nikisch's orchestra being hired to give a performance at Cannon's house. The word "hire" is the stumbling block. What does an artist lose or gain when he is hired to play in a private house? Harry Cannon claims that Nikisch gains his price, and cold supper and stale champagne thrown in for himself and musicians. Nikisch claims that he gains social recognition, a high seat at the synagogue, hot oysters a la poulette, and 'fizz' galore, freshly opened and poured into goblets. Moreover, Nikisch and his men were admitted by a side door of the Cannon house, and he claims the front door only should have been opened for them. The quarrel is a very pretty one all round. However much Harry Cannon may have been spoiled, he has not been found lacking in those generous impulses which amateurs often show to professionals. As a sculptor of no mean fame, Harry Cannon maintained a studio up town, and has over and over again called in professional talent to assist at the exhibitions of his works of art. At no one of these somewhat famous symposiums of luxurious society and talented professionals have I ever heard a word of disagreement as to the standing of the professionals or the graceful seated pose of society. It may be that Nikisch has premeditated too far. It cannot be that Harry Cannon and his pretty wife have intentionally slurred so great an artist." Feb 6

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

FERDINAND THIERIOT.

SINFONIETTA, in E major, op. 55.

- I. Allegro moderato. E major.
- II. Romanze: Andante. B major.
- III. Tarantella: Presto. E minor.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, G minor, op. 22.

- I. Andante sostenuto. G minor.
- II. Allegro scherzando. E flat major.
- III. Presto. G minor.

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 7, in A major, op. 92.

- I. Poco sostenuto. A major. Vivace. A major.
- II. Allegretto. A minor.
- III. Presto. F major. Assai meno presto. D major.
- IV. Allegro con brio. A major.

SOLOIST:

MR. GEORGE M. NOWELL.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme for the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Thieriot: Sinfonietta in E major, Opus 55.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, Opus 22.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, Opus 92.
Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist.

Of all novelties by men of local fame that have been brought out here for several years the Thieriot sinfonietta is by far the most pleasing. In fact, looking back over the things by Grädener, Baumgärtner, Bruckner, Herbeck, Humperdink, et al., that have been given here from time to time, this sinfonietta by Thieriot is the first work by a man of this class that has seemed really worth while giving at all. The composer is a Hamburg musician, born in that city, and living there now at the age of fifty-four; he studied in Altona under Eduard Marxsen—who was also Brahms's teacher—and later in Munich under Joseph Rheinberger. He has occupied the positions of music director and conductor in several German and Austrian towns. The sinfonietta is, like the earlier symphonies of Philipp Emanuel Bach's day, in three movements: an Allegro moderato in E major; a Romanze (andante) in B major; and a Tarantella (presto) in E minor. The first of these movements is strictly according to the sonata-form in its construction. It is not to be gainsaid that the thematic material in the work is not of the highest quality; it does not show melodic invention of a high order, and often grazes the commonplace. But, for all that, it does show melodic invention, and that most decidedly: the themes are spontaneous, natural, musical and easily flowing; and, moreover, their lack of the highest distinction is in a great measure atoned for by a certain unassuming air they have. But where the composer shows his musical inventiveness most unmistakably is in his treatment of his material, in his working-out. His inspiration, such as it is, does not flag after the first eight or sixteen measures; it persists to the end. The musical sense is delighted at every turning by some happy device, by some charming way of doing things that shows more than mere routine skill. It is this that lifts the work out of the domain of mere Kapellmeistermusik, and gives it true artistic life and vitality. Every phrase proclaims its divine right of being there; the music is not only coherent, but charmingly, naturally, genially coherent. One feels that the composer is never at a loss what to say next: the presence of a genuine talent is felt throughout. The sinfonietta was admirably played and made a very vivid impression.

In the performance of Beethoven's A-major symphony there was much to praise, also something to criticise. We must say, to begin with, that of all the now current fads in musical performance, the modern slow allegro seems most out of place when applied to Beethoven. We can well remember the time when it was the fashion to take almost every allegro with a rush, as if thrashed out to the crack of the ring master's whip. That was bad enough; but now the pendulum has swung over to the other side, and it seems as if conductors and pianists were bound to take off the vivace from the fair forehead of an innocent allegro, and set a moderato there? Why should brisk, lively movements like the first Vivace of this symphony be played as if they had an insatiable yearning to become Allegrettos? Why must they be made to creep along as if hired by the hour, and not by the course? What becomes of all Beethoven's so characteristic dash and brio with this tame ambling? And then that other modern fad: expressive modifications of the tempo! One gets tremendously tired of it. That holding back the rhythm on the last two or three syncopated horn notes in the trio of the third movement, just before the trumpets take the A's out of the violins' mouth, and the whole orchestra plunges fortissimo into the theme! To us it sounds cheap and trivial, like a Laputan flapper, to wake up the audience and call their attention to the fact that something important is coming. Beginning the long crescendo in the coda of the first movement at a markedly slower tempo than what has gone before is another instance of this, and to us equally unpalatable. If there ever were a composition in which inveterate rhythmic persistency was the prime feature, Beethoven's A-major symphony is that one; it is an apotheosis of the Dance from beginning to end. But, on the other hand, there were items in the performance which call for the highest praise. The dotted triplet throughout the first movement—one of the rhythmic figures most seldom played right—was given palpably as a dotted triplet, and not as an eighth-note followed by two-sixteenths. The long crescendo in the coda, if taken too slow for our taste, was played with incomparable beauty of tone and phrasing. The principal figure in the trio of the third movement (on the clarinets, bassoons and horns) was swelled and diminished just right. Here, by the way, we would bring up the question once more of whether double and triple grace notes and turns before the first note of a measure are to be considered as belonging to the measure in which they are written, or to the one immediately preceding. Each interpretation of these ornaments has its advocates; the best conclusion probably is that neither method should be applied invariably. Mr. Nikisch has these grace-notes played as belonging to the preceding measure, that is before the beat, instead of on the beat. We should have nothing to urge against this—as it is in most cases purely a matter of taste—were it not that in one place (the fifth and sixth measures of the second section of the trio) playing the three-note turn before the beat brings the C-sharp in the oboe and second clarinet and bassoon immediately over the low G-sharp in the second horn, thus making rather questionable fourths between the middle-voice and the bass. Four measures later the turn in the flute makes open octaves between the upper voice and the bass. This may be a slight point, but it is surely quite as important as that "trilling on every note of a triad" that Mendelssohn once noticed in Italy, which resulted in "the most terrible fifths!" The finale was played with all due brilliancy and dash. This movement presents one of those problems, not uncommon in Beethoven, which are exceedingly difficult for the conductor's ingenuity to solve. It is like the famous organ-point in the scherzo of the ninth symphony, of which Wagner wrote, "I call upon a musician to assert with a good conscience that he has ever heard this melody clearly in orchestral performances, yes, whether he would even know it, if he had not got it from reading the score or from playing the pianoforte arrangement!" Play the finale of the seventh symphony as it is written, and you cannot hear the theme in the first violins; tone down the wind instruments so as to make the theme audible, and you obliterate the whole character of the music. And here there can be no question of changing the scoring as in the passage from the ninth symphony already referred to; there a great part of the trouble arose from Beethoven's not having valve-horns and trumpets to write for; here it is nothing of the sort. To "improve" this movement there would be nothing for it but to distribute the second violin and viola parts among the violas divisi, and to double the first violins with the second—a liberty that should by no means be taken with Beethoven. There only remain the two different ways of playing it: right, with an inaudible or barely audible theme; or wrong, with an audible theme. Mr. Gericke used to do the latter; Mr. Nikisch does the former. We must say that we far prefer Mr. Nikisch's way.

194

Saint-Saëns's G minor concerto has not, we believe, been heard here for some time. It was good to hear it again, to find it holding its own against the hand of Time, the great Destroyer, and showing itself as fresh, strong and beautiful as when we first heard it. Surely this work is one of the finest pianoforte concertos written since Mendelssohn and Schumann; in inspiration, workmanship, form and style it is alike admirable. And it is all such pure pianoforte playing, too; never has the instrument been more congenially written for with orchestra. Never mind how much it owes to Mendelssohn, Berlioz, or whom you please. Mendelssohn owed a good deal to Bach, and Bach not a little to those who went before him. Let it suffice that it all bears the stamp of Saint-Saëns's style and individuality. The first movement is as strong and brilliant as steel; and the second and third movements may look long before finding their match in modern writing. Mr. George M. Nowell has gained much since we last (and first) heard him in Weber's Concertstück at the symphony concerts some years ago. It must be admitted that he then made a decidedly feeble impression. But last Saturday evening he played the Saint-Saëns concerto both with brilliancy and musicianly authority. His technique is not to be compared to that of the great finger-knights, but he shirked none of the difficulties of the concerto, and carried through the most dangerous passages with unflinching bravura. We suspect him of having studied the work with the composer, for he plays it—excepting a little over-rapid tempo in the second theme of the second movement—just as he does. There is no great opportunity for showing depth of feeling in the work; but Mr. Nowell fully satisfied all the demands it makes upon a player's emotional expressiveness. He played it with great distinction of style, clearness, and effect. He fully earned the repeated recalls he got at the end.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to "Fingal's Cave," opus 26; Saint-Saëns, concerto for violin, in A major; Grieg, suite No. 2 from "Peer Gynt;" Dvorák, symphony No. 2, in D minor, opus 70. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

Symphony Concert.

The strictly orchestral music of the Saturday symphony concert consisted of symphonietta in E major, of 53 by Ferdinand Thieriot, and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Certain portions of the symphonietta were admirable, notably its first movement, an allegro moderato in which there is an always pure and spontaneous flow of inspiration, combined with grace, with subtilty, too, and a bountiful supply of skillful treatment. The romanza conveys a somewhat vague impression as to what it really means, and this is rendered all the more ambiguous by the intrusion of a weirdly dry, a scrambling, stupid intermezzo. As for the tarantella with which the symphonietta closes, it would seem but a trifle too severe to characterize it as a weakly cooked-up sham, which should have found no place in one of the symphony concerts. Mr. G. M. Nowell then played Saint-Saëns' G minor concerto.

The seventh symphony of Beethoven followed the sixth, or "Pastoral," after an interval of four years, and at a time, too, when the composer's hearing had already become seriously impaired. Writing to Neate in November, 1813, Beethoven says: "Among my best works, I can boldly pronounce my symphony in A." Beethoven left no record, however, of his purpose when composing it, and after its first performance in the hall of the University of Vienna, Dec. 8, 1813, diverse speculations were then as now rife respecting the meaning of the work, and ever since then commentators have been widely at variance regarding it. Berlioz and Ambros, however, would seem to agree that the first movement is intended as a true picture of some rustic wedding. Lenz regards the symphony as one result of the military enthusiasm which produced the "Battle of Vittoria" symphony. Marks discerns a Moorish knight-hood, Onbicheff, a masked ball, etc.

In the performance last evening the composer's manifest intentions were not always clearly presented, but the technique of the performance was, for the most part, admirable.

The Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Symphonietta, E major, op. 55.....Thieriot
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G minor.....Saint-Saëns Symphony No. 7, A major.....Beethoven

Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist.

It is said that the ending "etta" in the Italian language indicates diminution with the accessory idea of fondness, loveliness, compassion, tenderness. This composition by Thieriot does not call for compassion; it may be patted on the head and called "a pretty little symphony." The first movement is the most pleasing of the three. The themes are graceful and fresh, although the chief theme bears a passing resemblance to a well-known tune by Meyer-Helmund. The harmonization is agreeable, and, at times, beautiful. The instrumentation abounds in color that is discreetly applied. The second movement, a romanza, is interrupted by an intermezzo that is, perhaps, in too strong contrast, and neither the romanza nor the intermezzo is of unusual strength or beauty.

The tarantella after the exposition of the chief theme sounded like all the other pieces of music that are supposed to assuage the feelings of the victim of the spider, which grows to horrific size in Tarentum. Although the two last movements of the symphonietta did not seem equal in value to the first, the composition as a whole gave much pleasure on account of its modesty, its melodiousness, its reasonable length. The day may come when the symphony fashioned after old and approved models will be presented only in sections; and it may be supplanted by the "symphonic-poem" or even the symphonietta. Bruckner, however, would dispute this proposition; for his eighth symphony, played lately in Vienna, ate the whole time allotted to the concert. The adagio alone lasted 28 minutes; but as, according to the analytical programme, this same adagio represented "the all-loving Father in His boundless wealth of mercy," the time was none too long. Thieriot's symphonietta was played in Leipzig in 1891.

The symphonietta was played Saturday evening with an apparent appreciation of its pleasant qualities, and the performance of the symphony was admirable. It is true one or two liberties of interpretation were taken in the vivace of the first movement, as at the very start and also at the beginning of the long pianissimo and following crescendo that bring the exultant close; and the effect thus gained was, if not absolutely injurious to precision and rhythm, at least of doubtful value. With these exceptions the reading and the performance were of unusual excellence. The impressive and finely proportioned rendering of the allegretto was especially worthy of praise.

The pianoforte concerto in G minor was played for the first time at a Concert Populaire in Paris, and by the composer, Dec. 13, 1868. It afterward served as a test piece in the competition of pianoforte pupils at the Paris Conservatory. There is no need at this late day of speaking of its surpassing merit.

From the merely technical standpoint there was much to praise in the performance of Mr. Nowell.

He has good fingers.

His runs were smooth and clean; his arpeggio work was characterized by its evenness; he did not smear; he did not pound; his delivery was frank, his bearing was modest.

His performance showed the results of patience, industry and excellent instruction.

Now, accuracy, honesty of purpose and ability to overcome mechanical obstacles are characteristics that lead to success in many of the callings of life.

These characteristics mark the experienced bookbinder, the trusted surveyor, the ship pilot.

Other characteristics enter into the supreme success of the man that moves, persuades, commands by the display of his art.

Above all things in the performance of the G minor concerto is temperament imperiously demanded.

From the intellectual or the sensuous standpoint there was little to commend in the performance of Mr. Nowell.

Take the first movement, for instance: there was little or no distinction made between the delivery of the imposing prelude on the pedal-point and the impassioned theme in G minor that follows; they had alike the same defined, hewn-out hardness; the style of Bach and the style of the ultra-modern were called one.

One might pass over without objection Mr. Nowell's breaking of the aforesaid pedal-octave and the breaking of chords that might have been better attacked boldly; one might allow the liberty taken in the opening of the cadenza; but the lack of rhythmic swing in the second movement and of demoniac energy in the stormier passages cannot so easily be overlooked.

Again, the performance of Mr. Nowell was colorless, or rather it was monochromatic. The tones were soft or loud, but they were all of the same color, and that color was a cold tint.

There was no one great effect produced that startled or moved the hearer by an irresistible display of feeling, brilliancy or that mixture of sinking self in the composer and at the same time intensifying the speech of the composer by the rare individuality of the interpreter, that singular attribute of a great player that for want of a better word is vaguely called intellectuality. There was no apparent appreciation of a climax.

And so Mr. Nowell's playing of the noble, brilliant and entrancing concerto of Saint-Saëns may be justly described as an exhibition of well-trained fingers that triumphed over the notation of the composer, but failed to grasp the spirit of which the notation is merely the superficial expression.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony Concert--Soloist,

George M. Nowell.

Tonight's Carney Hospital Concert--

The Wilbur Company's Operatic

Season--The Wagner Matinee--Mr.

Baermann's Programme -- Last

Scharwenka Recital--Russian Choir.

The 15th of the present season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction, at Music Hall last evening, had as its prominent feature the appearance of Mr. George M. Nowell, pianist, as soloist.

Undoubtedly, the choice of the pianists of the season makes a difficult matter for Mr. Nikisch to act upon, but in giving Mr. Nowell an appearance he not only justly recognized the claims of a thoroughly competent artist, but gave encouragement to the many local aspirants for a similar recognition.

Mr. Nowell is to be congratulated upon having made a pronounced success and with completely conquering the natural tendency to undervalue the merits of a home artist, which, unfortunately, characterizes the Symphony concert patrons.

In choosing the second concerto in C

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme chosen for the fifteenth symphony concert last evening in Music Hall had for its most noteworthy features the concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, op. 22, Camille Saint Saens, while its least important, yet by no means mediocre, selection was a sinfonietta in E major, op. 55, by Thieriot. The allegro with which the sinfonietta begins is characterised by a transparent, yet simple, clearness of design and a harmonious development of the parts; it is quasi classical art work against which no serious objection can be urged. The themes of its first movement are unaffectedly pleasing and are also naively yet carefully developed. The pathos of the romanza, the second movement, is by no means over done; but the finale a tarantella, presto in E major is inexplicably vulgar. The soloist for the ever welcome concerto in G minor by Camille Saint Saens was Mr. George M. Nowell.

Such an ideal performance of the work from any artist's standpoint of technique has not been heard here, while a superbly cultivated and sympathetic touch, and a touch more thoroughly musical, refined and poetic it would be difficult to imagine, often enabled the artist to contribute a wonderfully photographic representation of the music—a recognition of Mr. Nowell's ability that is especially applicable to his superlatively fine performance of the presto. There was no sacrifice of respect of the composer, and the entire rendition carried with it a merit of execution so delightfully unimpeachable that the enthusiastic plaudits received by the artist upon the conclusion of the work was indeed as highly merited a tribute as is seldom bestowed.

Of the concerto it can truly be said that it will always remain a master-piece. The themes of the first movement are spontaneous on the one hand, and impressively scholastic and dignified on the other. The allegro scherzando is a complete and charming contrast to the first movement, is jovial without being vulgar, and the piano and orchestra fairly seemed engaged in a friendly skirmish, yet always filling up the general structure and uniting to contribute a rich, warm tone to the general effect. The finale with all its cheerful themes and sparkling vivacity is full of just such individual traits as have so often suggested Saint-Saens as the most musical of Frenchmen.

Beethoven's seventh symphony has had two few hearings here of recent years not to make its appearance heartily welcome on the programme for last evening. Beethoven has left no record of his purpose while composing it, yet how highly he valued it may be inferred from his correspondence. In a letter to Salomon he says: "The grand symphony in it is one of my very best; and again he writes to Neate concerning it as follows: "Among my best works, which I can hardly say of my symphony in A." Commentators, who by reason of their intimate study of Beethoven, are regarded as authorities, disagree in interpreting the seventh symphony, whose composer has given them no other aid by which their differences might be settled. Berlioz would have us believe that the first movement is a rustic wedding, and we are therefore to suppose that it is drawn from the same scene of village mirth that suggested the dance in the "Pastoral" Symphony. Lenz looks on the symphony and its comparison, the Eighth, as one result of the military enthusiasm, which produced the "Battle of Vittoria" symphony, and as Grove says, "bends and warps every passage to give its warlike intention." But where "doctors differ who shall decide?" Marx sees in the work Moorish knighthood; Orblieff discovers a masked ball; Bischoff called it a sequel to the "Pastoral;" Ambrose sides with Berlioz, while Richard Wagner declares it is the apotheosis of the dance, the ideal embodiment in tones of the bodily movement.

The performance of the work lacked in positive clear outline, in accuracy of detail, in distinct and palpable contribution of each instrument. One also missed in the finale allegro the fine vitality of accent and free, buoyant onward movement that the music should have incited and would have done, doubtless, had it not been for the prevailing effeminacy and sterility of Mr. Nikisch's lead.

1910
Mr. Nowell set himself a task well calculated to test the skill of an artist of a far greater experience upon the concert stage, but his success justified the choice made for he met all the demands of the composition in a manner to disarm criticism, and won the hearty approval of the most critical on both sides the stage line, the men of the orchestra joining in the applause which rewarded his efforts with enthusiasm.

The most striking merit of Mr. Nowell's playing is the delightful touch he employs in all his work; it is clear and crisp, with both the breadth demanded for the strongest passages and the delicacy of a woman's hand in the lighter and more graceful measures, this characteristic giving a charm to his interpretations which is seldom realized.

The firm, broad style in which the player began the andante movement arrested the attention of the audience instantly, and indicated that a master sat at the piano. This impression was strengthened as the movement was continued, and at its conclusion Mr. Nowell was applauded with a spontaneous outburst which was honestly won. The airy grace of the allegro was most happily caught by the player, whose dainty treatment of this portion of the concerto was delightful. The brilliant presto again displayed the pianist to fine advantage, the technical demands of its intricate passages being met with a perfection, ease and beauty that aroused the audience to a high pitch of excitement, and gained an ovation of the grandest sort for the player as he concluded his task.

Mr. Nowell is primarily a musician, and he uses the pianoforte with a degree of taste and intelligence which, with his skill as an executant, puts him in the front rank of the world's players, and fully justifies his devotion to his profession.

The orchestra's novelty of the evening was the Sinfonietta in E major by F. Thieriot, a composer better known in Hamburg than in this country. The work made a good introduction for its composer, however, and its performance gave great pleasure. The opening allegro is built upon a tuneful theme, which is admirably treated, the scoring being for the lasso orchestra, with two horns and trumpets, but no trombones. The second movement, in romanza form, is also admirably well written, and the final presto, a tarantella, is peculiarly pleasing in its sudden changes of time and its tuneful characteristics. Its reading by Mr. Nikisch brought out all its merits, and the audience was quick in its appreciation of the good work done by the composer.

The seventh of the Beethoven symphonies concluded the programme, and a most satisfactory interpretation of it was given by Mr. Nikisch.

At next Saturday evening's concert Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist, playing the concerto for violin in A major, the other numbers of the programme being Dvorak's second symphony, Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" suite and the "Fingal's Cave" overture.

The Symphony Concert.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place at Music Hall on Saturday evening with the following programme: Sinfonietta in E major, op. 55, F. Thieriot; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, Saint Saens; Symphony, No. 7, Beethoven. Mr. George M. Nowell was the soloist. The Sinfonietta of Thieriot was the only novelty on the programme and it proved an interesting composition, fresh and melodious, of the most natural proportions as regards construction, harmonious and spontaneous in all its parts.

It was played with little expression and in a loud manner; especially rough was the effect of the piu animato of the second movement, while the Tarantella fared little better, with the additional drawback of a lack of precision between the parts in the execution. In the lack of delicacy, the absence of necessary contrast, a non-observance of the nuances and a general state of coarseness in the rendering, the playing of this composition was a marked example of the patois that afflicts the musical speech of this organization. The Beethoven symphony was hardly a whit better in the playing, the trumpets blowing with a violent and distorted sound, a Jericho triumph that would make a circus band green with envy.

The Saint-Saens concerto is a familiar work, a noble specimen of the genius of its eminent author. It is full of dramatic life, encompassing the gamut of musical expression from its most delicate touch to its broadest expansion. It calls for a pianist of fine qualities as essentially as for one of the more heroic element. Mr. Nowell played the work from beginning to end in a heavy, inelastic and expressionless manner. His interpretation failed to display the beauties of the composition, and left upon the listener the impression of a monotonous struggle with technical difficulties that gave no thought for the æsthetic demands.

Artistically it was not a creditable effort, the work being rather beyond the capacity of the performer, if the results achieved with this concerto by such players as Franz Rummel are taken as a comparative point in judging. The audience recalled Mr. Nowell at the end of the concerto.

Next Saturday evening Mr. Loeffler will be the soloist, playing Saint-Saens' concerto for violin in A major. Dvorak's Symphony No. 2; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite No. 2, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," will complete the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Symphony Concert.

There was an excellent audience in attendance at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, despite the storm. The programme was: Sinfonietta in E, op. 55, F. Thieriot; Concerto for piano No. 2, G-minor, Saint-Saens, and Symphony No. 7, Beethoven. The Sinfonietta is in three movements, the first of which, an allegro moderato, is the best. It is delightful in its freshness, its graceful orchestration and the pleasing individuality that distinguish it. The harmonies are rich without forcing, and there is no struggle for novelty, the music flowing easily and naturally, and the effect of the whole, with its warmly melodious themes, being charming. The second movement, a romanza with a spirited second part, was less interesting and more labored in style, while the finale, a tarantella, has little to commend it except the piquant brilliancy of its opening theme. The work was admirably performed. The Beethoven Symphony was fairly read along conservative lines, with the exception of certain portions of the first allegro, with which unauthorized liberties were taken with infelicitous results. The break into the vivace was awkwardly made. This followed evidently from a misconception of the composer's dynamic marks, which indicate and call for a crescendo from pianissimo to piano. The conductor, instead, made the crescendo culminate in forte, and then suddenly dropped to piano, by which curious innovation the attack was without precision, and the effect was confusing. This and a neglect to begin the movement with the vivacity demanded were, however, the only blemishes on the performance. Both reading and playing otherwise resulted in the best Beethoven interpretation the orchestra has given this season. Mr. George W. Nowell was the soloist. His rendering of the Saint-Saens concerto was very neat, brilliant and clean-cut in its finger-work, and was characterized generally by sincerity in style and fluency in execution. The reading was wanting in the fire necessary to give the concerto its just effect, and there was also a lack of contrasts in light and shade that imparted to the effort something of monotony, but, on the whole, Mr. Nowell acquitted himself very creditably. He was heartily applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for violin, Saint-Saens; Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 2, Grieg; and Symphony No. 2, Dvorak. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is the soloist.

NY No. 1, in D major.

HED SYMPHONY.

NY No. 3. "Eroica."

MUSIC.

THE FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme chosen for the fifteenth symphony concert last evening in Music Hall had for its most noteworthy features the concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, op. 22, Camille Saint Saens, while its least important, yet by no means mediocre, selection was a sinfonietta in E major, op. 55, by Thieriot. The allegro with which the sinfonietta begins is characterised by a transparent, yet simple, clearness of design and a harmonious development of the parts; it is quasi classical art work against which no serious objection can be urged. The themes of its first movement are unaffectedly pleasing and are also naively yet carefully developed. The pathos of the romanza, the second movement, is by no means overdone; but the finale a tarantella, presto in E major is inexplicably vulgar. The soloist for the ever welcome concerto in G minor by Camille Saint Saens was Mr. George M. Nowell.

Such an ideal performance of the work from any artist's standpoint of technique has not been heard here, while a superbly cultivated and sympathetic touch, and a touch more thoroughly musical, refined and poetic it would be difficult to imagine, often enabled the artist to contribute a wonderfully photographic representation of the music—a recognition of Mr. Nowell's ability that is especially applicable to his superlatively fine performance of the presto. There was no sacrifice of respect of the composer, and the entire rendition carried with it a merit of execution so delightfully unimpeachable that the enthusiastic plaudits received by the artist upon the conclusion of the work was indeed as highly merited a tribute as is seldom bestowed.

Of the concerto it can truly be said that it will always remain a master-piece. The themes of the first movement are spontaneous on the one hand, and impressively scholastic and dignified on the other. The allegro scherzando is a complete and charming contrast to the first movement, is jovial without being vulgar, and the piano and orchestra fairly seemed engaged in a friendly skirmish, yet always filling up the general structure and uniting to contribute a rich, cheerful themes and sparkling vivacity is full of just such individual traits as have so often suggested Saint-Saens as the most musical of Frenchmen.

Beethoven's seventh symphony has had two few hearings here of recent years not to make its appearance heartily welcome on the programme for last evening. Beethoven has left no record of his purpose while composing it, yet how highly he valued it may be inferred from his correspondence. In a letter to Salomon he says: "The grand symphony in it is one of my very best," and again he writes to Neate concerning it as follows: "Among my best works, which I can hardly say of my symphony in A." Commentators, who by reason of their intimate study of Beethoven, are regarded as authorities, disagree in interpreting the seventh symphony, whose composer has given them no other aid by which their differences might be settled. Berlioz would have us believe that the first movement is a rustic wedding, and we are therefore to suppose that it is drawn from the same scene of village mirth that suggested the dance in the "Pastoral" Symphony. Lenz looks on the symphony and its comparison, which Eighth, as one result of the military enthusiasm, which produced the "Battle of Vittoria" symphony, and as Grove says, "bends and warps every passage to give its warlike intention." But where "doctors differ who shall decide?" Marx sees in the work Moorish knighthood; Oribicheff discovers a masked ball; Bischoff called it a sequel to the "Pastoral;" Ambrose sides with Berlioz, while Richard Wagner declares it is the apotheosis of the dance, the ideal embodiment in tones of the bodily movement.

The performance of the work lacked in positive clear outline, in accuracy of detail, in distinct and palpable contribution of each instrument. One also missed in the finale allegro the fine vitality of accent and free, buoyant onward movement that the music should have incited and would have done, doubtless, had it not been for the prevailing effeminacy and sterility of Mr. Nikisch's lead.

minor, by Saint Saens, for his appearance. Mr. Nowell set himself a task well calculated to test the skill of an artist of a far greater experience upon the concert stage, but his success justified the choice made for he met all the demands of the composition in a manner to disarm criticism, and won the hearty approval of the most critical on both sides the stage line, the men of the orchestra joining in the applause which rewarded his efforts with enthusiasm.

The most striking merit of Mr. Nowell's playing is the delightful touch he employs in all his work; it is clear and crisp, with both the breadth demanded for the strongest passages and the delicacy of a woman's hand in the lighter and more graceful measures, this characteristic giving a charm to his interpretations which is seldom realized.

The firm, broad style in which the player began the andante movement arrested the attention of the audience instantly, and indicated that a master sat at the piano. This impression was strengthened as the movement was continued, and at its conclusion Mr. Nowell was applauded with a spontaneous outburst which was honestly won. The airy grace of the allegro was most happily caught by the player, whose dainty treatment of this portion of the concerto was delightful. The brilliant presto again displayed the pianist to fine advantage, the technical demands of its intricate passages being met with a perfection, ease and beauty that aroused the audience to a high pitch of excitement, and gained an ovation of the grandest sort for the player as he concluded his task.

Mr. Nowell is primarily a musician, and he uses the pianoforte with a degree of taste and intelligence which, with his skill as an executant, puts him in the front rank of the world's players, and fully justifies his devotion to his profession.

The orchestral novelty of the evening was the Sinfonietta in E major by F. Thieriot, a composer better known in Hamburg than in this country. The work made a good introduction for its composer, however, and its performance gave great pleasure. The opening allegro is built upon a tuneful theme, which is admirably treated, the scoring being for the classic orchestra, with two horns and trumpets, but no trombones. The second movement, in romanza form, is also admirably well written, and the final presto, a tarantella, is peculiarly pleasing in its sudden changes of time and its tuneful characteristics. Its reading by Mr. Nikisch brought out all its merits, and the audience was quick in its appreciation of the good work done by the composer.

The seventh of the Beethoven symphonies concluded the programme, and a most satisfactory interpretation of it was given by Mr. Nikisch.

At next Saturday evening's concert Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist, playing the concerto for violin in A major, the other numbers of the programme being Dvorak's second symphony, Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" suite and the "Fingal's Cave" overture.

The Symphony Concert.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place at Music Hall on Saturday evening with the following programme: Sinfonietta in E major, op. 55, F. Thieriot; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, Saint Saens; Symphony, No. 7, Beethoven. Mr. George M. Nowell was the soloist. The Sinfonietta of Thieriot was the only novelty on the programme and it proved an interesting composition, fresh and melodious, of the most natural proportions as regards construction, harmonious and spontaneous in all its parts.

It was played with little expression and in a loud manner; especially rough was the effect of the piu animato of the second movement, while the Tarantella fared little better, with the additional drawback of a lack of precision between the parts in the execution. In the lack of delicacy, the absence of necessary contrast, a non-observance of the nuances and a general state of coarseness in the rendering, the playing of this composition was a marked example of the patois that afflicts the musical speech of this organization. The Beethoven symphony was hardly a whit better in the playing, the trumpets blowing with a violent and distorted sound, a Jerichoic triumph that would make a circus band green with envy.

The Saint-Saens concerto is a familiar work, a noble specimen of the genius of its eminent author. It is full of dramatic life, encompassing the gamut of musical expression from its most delicate touch to its broadest expansion. It calls for a pianist of fine qualities as essentially as for one of the more heroic element. Mr. Nowell played the work from beginning to end in a heavy, inelastic and expressionless manner. His interpretation failed to display the beauties of the composition, and left upon the listener the impression of a monotonous struggle with technical difficulties that gave no thought for the aesthetic demands.

Artistically it was not a creditable effort, the work being rather beyond the capacity of the performer, if the results achieved with this concerto by such players as Franz Rummel are taken as a comparative point in judging. The audience recalled Mr. Nowell at the end of the concerto.

Next Saturday evening Mr. Loeffler will be the soloist, playing Saint-Saens's concerto for violin in A major. Dvorak's Symphony No. 2; Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite No. 2, and Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," will complete the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT,

The Symphony Concert.

There was an excellent audience in attendance at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, despite the storm. The programme was: Sinfonietta in E, op. 55, F. Thieriot; Concerto for piano No. 2, G-minor, Saint-Saens, and Symphony No. 7, Beethoven. The Sinfonietta is in three movements, the first of which, an allegro moderato, is the best. It is delightful in its freshness, its graceful orchestration and the pleasing individuality that distinguish it. The harmonies are rich without forcing, and there is no struggle for novelty, the music flowing easily and naturally, and the effect of the whole, with its warmly melodious themes, being charming. The second movement, a romanza with a spirited second part, was less interesting and more labored in style, while the finale, a tarantella, has little to commend it except the piquant brilliancy of its opening theme. The work was admirably performed. The Beethoven Symphony was finely read along conservative lines, with the exception of certain portions of the first allegro, with which unauthorized liberties were taken with infelicitous results. The break into the vivace was awkwardly made. This followed evidently from a misconception of the composer's dynamic marks, which indicate and call for a crescendo from pianissimo to piano. The conductor, instead, made the crescendo culminate in forte, and then suddenly dropped to piano, by which curious innovation the attack was without precision, and the effect was confusing. This and a neglect to begin the movement with the vivacity demanded were, however, the only blemishes on the performance. Both reading and playing otherwise resulted in the best Beethoven interpretation the orchestra has given this season. Mr. George W. Nowell was the soloist. His rendering of the Saint-Saens concerto was very neat, brilliant and clean-cut in its finger-work, and was characterized generally by sincerity in style and fluency in execution. The reading was wanting in the fire necessary to give the concerto its just effect, and there was also a lack of contrasts in light and shade that imparted to the effort something of monotony, but, on the whole, Mr. Nowell acquitted himself very creditably. He was heartily applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for violin, Saint-Saens; Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 2, Grieg; and Symphony No. 2, Dvorak. Mr. C. M. Loeffler is the soloist.

NY No. 1, in D major.

HED SYMPHONY.

NY No. 3. "Eroica."

198

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN. OVERTURE. "Fingal's Cave."

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 1, in A major. op. 20.
I. Allegro. A major.
II. Andante espressivo. D major.
III. Tempo primo. A major.

EDVARD GRIEG.

ORCHESTRAL SUITE No. 2, from the Music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55.

- I. Der Brautraub (Ingrids Klage), Allegro furioso.
G minor. Andante doloroso. G minor.
- II. Arabischer Tanz, Allegretto vivace. C major.
- III. Peer Gynts Heimkehr (Stuermischer Abend an der Kueste). Allegro agitato. F sharp minor.
- IV. Solvejgs Lied. Andante. A minor.
- V. Tanz der Bergkoenigstochter. Allegretto alla burla.
D major.

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D minor. op. 70.

- I. Allegro maestoso. D minor.
- II. Poco adagio. F major.
- III. Scherzo; vivace. D minor. Poco meno mosso. G major.
- IV. Finale: Allegro. D minor.

SOLOIST:

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

199

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Opus 36.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for violin, No. 1, in A major, Opus 20.

Grieg: Orchestral suite No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55.

Dvorák: Symphony No. 2, in D minor, Opus 70.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" ("Hebrides") was given one of the best and most satisfying performances we can remember. The music was played wholly in accord with its intrinsic character, with nicety of finish, buoyancy of phrasing, and immense beauty of effect. Especially good was the way in which the staccato episode in the third part of the work was treated.

In strong contrast with this admirable work, in which romantic imaginativeness and picturesqueness go hand in hand with classic beauty of form, was the new suite by Grieg that came next but one on the programme. One can not help looking with a certain distrust at these "second" suites from incidental music to plays; one feels that the cream of the music must have gone into the first suite, and that the second must be made up largely of discarded leavings. This one of Grieg's is made up of five numbers: I. "The Abduction of the Bride" (Ingrid's Lament). II. Arabian Dance. III. "Peer Gynt's Return" (Stormy Evening on the Coast). IV. Solveig's Song. V. Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter. It is impossible to deny this music a certain amount of emotional force; one feels that one has to do with a man who is something more than merely clever. Nevertheless his forms of expression are so reckless of artistic dignity, so forgetful of beauty, that one hesitates to welcome this music of his to the concert-room. In its place, as melodramatic music, it is undoubtedly strongly effective; but such music was never meant to stand in the foreground and take up the listener's undivided attention; it is but a musical background to a dramatic scene. No doubt composers of high artistic aim have written melodramatic music that was far better than the bare necessities of the case demanded, and could stand closer inspection as music on its own merits. But we cannot feel that Grieg has done this in the present case; this "Peer Gynt" music does not rise to the concert level; it is too merely melodramatic. He has not even shown his usual cleverness; his scoring of Solveig's song for strings, with a few wind instruments, weakens the peculiar wild accent of the music, and goes far to spoil what was in its original shape a tolerably good song. The "Stormy Evening on the Coast" sounds as if it had been made up from the waste baskets of any composers you please, who had tried their hand at thunder-and-lightning effects. The "Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter" is avowedly a piece of burlesque extravagance, for in the story Peer Gynt gets himself into decidedly hot water by laughing at it; but burlesque extravagance got by xylophones, fancy "champion drum corps" effects, and playing on stringed instruments with the bow upside down, is rather a cheap business. Upon the whole, this second "Peer Gynt" suite is not only inferior to the first, but is utterly unworthy a place on the programme of a serious concert. That it was admirably played did not mend matters very much.

Dvorák's second symphony wears better than we expected. There is not a measure in it that begins to compare, for brilliancy of inspiration, with the wonderful beginning of the first symphony; but it is as a whole a far better-written and more coherent work. When it was first played here some years ago a good deal in it sounded rather cheap and melodramatic; one felt that Dvorák had fallen into the trap into which many another composer had stumbled before him, in being merely theatrical where he meant to be dramatic, but this first impression has pretty well worn off by this time, and the real earnestness of purpose that underlies the music is beginning to show through. For one thing, we know of no other work of Dvorák's in which there is so much real beauty of color, so little that is merely conventionally brilliant in the orchestration. How thoroughly he has made his four horns pay in that passage in the slow movement! Since Weber's "Freischütz" overture we can recall no other instance of such really refined and poetic use of a combination which too often produces one of the cheapest effects in all modern orchestration. And this is but one instance out of many in the symphony. Then the whole work has an individual atmosphere of its own; one feels a real man behind it. The performance was of a very high character, and showed the work in its true light.

Saint-Saëns's A major violin concerto is an eminently genial, pleasing composition, and one wonders a little how it could have remained so long in manuscript after its two (to our thinking, far inferior) successors were published. It belongs to Saint-Saëns's best period, to a time when that ambition to write for the stage which possesses every Frenchman was as yet in embryo, and the composer was still devoting his best strength to writing for the concert-room. The form of the work, if not wholly original, is admirably adapted to its purpose, and is well worth imitating by other concerto writers. The plan of it is this: Instead of the regulation three (or four) movements, Saint-Saëns has here taken the standard sonata form—usually applied to first movements of concertos—and cut it in two through the middle; into the gap thus formed he inserts a short, slow movement. Thus the work begins as other concertos do, and goes on regularly through the first part of the first movement up to about the middle of the working out; here it breaks off, and we have the little andante espressivo episode, which is really an independent movement in itself. This episode over, the working-out of the "first" movement is taken up again and carried through, leading to the regular third part and the final coda. If the cantabile second theme does not make its appearance again in this third part, this is but a matter of detail, and by no means unprecedented in modern writing. This form is simply

The Sixteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin, No. 1, A major.....Saint-Saens Suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt," Op. 55.....Grieg
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony, D minor, No. 2, Op. 70.....Dvorak

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the solo violinist. Saint-Saens's violin concerto, Op. 20, was dedicated to Sarasate, and it was played by the great Spaniard at a concert at the Chatelet. It is my impression that it was brought out in Boston by Mr. Adamowski in March, 1885, at a Symphony concert, and the work was then called a "concertstueck."

This concerto is a work of eminent distinction, pure and refined, graceful in melody, always interesting in harmonic structure, and elegant in the discreet simplicity of instrumental color. It was played most sympathetically by Mr. Loeffler. His performance, faultless from the technical standpoint, was marked by purity of style, warmth of expression, and a largeness, a liberality of conception. In whole and in detail it was a noteworthy performance. It was a lesson to the student, a pleasure to the professional as well as the amateur, an honor to the orchestra of which Mr. Loeffler is a member. Not the least agreeable feature was the modesty of the player, the modesty that is characteristic of the true artist.

Mr. Loeffler, it is said, wrote the cadenza that he introduced. The cadenza is a relic of the past. In a work of to-day it seems a mere survival, like unto the organ of unknown use in the human body that endangers the life, and might perhaps be extirpated.

Who was the first that invented the habit of flourishing with breath, or bow or fingers while accompanists and audience were silent spectators of ingenuity employed chiefly for self-glorification? Alas, the habit is apparently as old as the vanity of mankind. To be sure there are wiseacres who say boldly the cadenza was invented in such a year and by a certain person. They are not unlike the well-known lecturer in a Western law school. Although, as Judge, he was a worthy follower of Chief Justice Skinner's "grandson on the Royal Bench of British Themis," he was nervous when he addressed the students, and so he had recourse to alcoholic preparation. Thus fortified, he laid everything to the Corsican, and he would blandly begin as follows: "Bills of exchange, young gentlemen, and promissory notes were invented by the First Napoleon."

Mr. Loeffler's interpolation was in good taste, and it displayed his virtuosoship; but the concerto would have pleased as much without the addition.

Grieg wrote incidental music (op. 23) for Ibsen's long-winded dramatic poem, "Peer Gynt." The music contains numbers for solo voices, chorus and orchestra. The first suite (op. 46) is well known. The second suite (op. 55) was played here last week for the first time.

This second suite is not equal to the first. With the exception of the beautiful arrangement of "Solvejg's Song" the music is cheap stuff. It may serve in the theatre to enhance strange scenic effects or grotesque situations, but in the concert room it is without value. The "Return of Peer Gynt" has echoes of "The Flying Dutchman," but each echo seems a burlesque. The "Arabian Dance" suggests the invasion of Arabia by the Salvation Army, personally conducted by one of the numerous relatives of General Booth; and there was a time during the dance when all necks in the audience were stretched in joyful expectation of the apparition of Miss Lottie Collins. However, the number was written long before the ingenious arrangement of music to "Ta-ra-ra, Boom-de-ay."

This "Arabian Dance" is local color with a vengeance; that is, it is Grieg's idea of Arabian music. He that wishes to know the real character of Arabian music, with a description of instruments, melodies, tonality and the "danse du ventre," may consult with pleasure Tiersot's "Musiques pittoresques."

The last number, "Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter," is a wretched replica of the last movement, a wretched original of the first suite. Throughout the movements, with the above-named delightful exception, the "doubbling drum is beat with furious heat;" not only kettle-drums, but other pulsatile instruments strive laboriously for effect. The xylophone puts an end to the charivari. Now, the xylophone is an instrument of antiquity. Holbein introduced it in his "Dance of Death," and the skeleton beats upon it there with ghastly glee. Saint-Saens used it with prodigious effect in the "Danse Macabre." As used by Grieg, it brings to mind the variety show.

"Solvejg's Song" was applauded. The other numbers met with a cold reception, although there was a desire to laugh after the finale.

The symphony and the overture were played with marked effect, and the performance of the latter was, indeed, brilliant.

The programme of the next rehearsal and concert is as follows: Overture "Der Freischuetz;" Brahms's Fourth Symphony; Riemenschneider's "Dance of Death;" Nicolai's overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor."

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Echoes from the Sixteenth Symphony.

Piano Recital by Mr. Nikisch—Gros-smith's Merry Entertainment.

Grand Opera at the Boston—Big Banjo Concert—Gossip and Coming Events.

Mr. Nikisch introduced as the soloist at the Symphony rehearsal and concert last week the well-known artist and composer, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, the fourth member of the violin contingent of the orchestra that has appeared as soloist under Mr. Nikisch's baton during the season. Saint-Saens' concerto No. 1, for violin, although in three parts, is linked by cadenza-like passages, making it practically one movement, a slow episode being inserted in the middle.

Mr. Loeffler's playing was, in the main, commendable. He has an excellent command of his bow, and his broad tones were sweetly resonant and devoid of harshness. The repeated trills in the andante were clearly given and well sustained, and his leading themes were clean cut and firm, though lacking somewhat in strength.

The slides running through the composition were unpleasantly frequent, although that was probably not the first of the series.

206

Without being particularly brilliant, Mr. Loeffler played with facility and commendable dash. Just before the close of the piece he introduced a cadenza of his own, which was in keeping with the general tone of the composition and very well performed.

The artist was enthusiastically received, being recalled several times at the close of his performance.

Mendelssohn's fantastic overture, "Fingal's Cave," was played with great effect. Each part of the orchestra did its work splendidly. The fragments of themes which the great composer introduces throughout the work are impartially distributed among the instruments, and the fine contrasts and changes in tempo and harmony were given in such a manner as to realize a tone picture of great beauty.

Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," was a novelty, Norwegian in treatment and at times startling in its grotesque orchestration, the cellos being added to the instruments of percussion by the performers striking the strings with the back of the bow.

It was played with great spirit and the proper abandon, the dance, "The Mountain King's Daughter," with its glissando terminal by the xylophone, being the sensational feature of the number.

Dvorak's symphony in D minor, No. 2, closed the concert. The beautiful orchestral coloring of the first two movements were effectively presented, and the Slavic characteristics of the composer in the last numbers were given with admirable contrasting energy and boldness.

The programme for the next rehearsal and concert will consist of the overture from "Der Freischuetz," Weber; symphony No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; "Todtentanz," for orchestra, first time, Riemenschneider; and overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai.

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Concert.

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday evening at Music Hall. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; concerto for violin No. 1 in A minor, Saint-Saens; orchestral suite, No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Dvorak. Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist. The orchestra gave more attention to detail in both the Mendelssohn overture and the Grieg suite (the latter hardly worthy a place on the programme) than it is customary to expect from it nowadays, and consequently the works were not without some effect in the renderings.

In the symphony, however, the orchestra fell into its accustomed coarse and over-loud manner, paying little regard to the nuances of the composition, and failing to give the least indication of repose or delicacy anywhere. Even the adagio, which demands the most expressive playing, was given with a monotone of loudness, every half tint of shading being exaggerated in a stereotyped and vulgar manner. The playing of the finale resulted in little less than a continuous noise. Now this symphony is a work that demands the greatest care in the playing, for it is full of wide and sudden contrasts, is bold and impassioned, changeable in rhythm and glows with a rich color. Its themes are at times tender and delicate, and demand a most considerate treatment in the rendering.

Nothing of the sort was brought forth in the playing, however, and the effect fell flat. Mr. Loeffler played as he always does in a manner at once denoting the skilful performer, able musician and the ripe artist. The Saint-Saens concerto, worthy of its eminent author, met with a splendid interpretation upon the part of Mr. Loeffler, his own cadenza serving to display his grasp of the technical difficulties of the instrument, his pure intonation and his firm and well-restrained tone. He was recalled three times.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was very well attended, notwithstanding the miserable weather. The programme was: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in A, op. 20, Saint-Saens; Orchestral Suite, No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55, Grieg; Symphony in D minor, No. 2, op. 70, Dvorak. The Grieg Suite, which, if we are not mistaken, had not been heard at these concerts before, is not especially interesting. As music, pure and simple, it says very little that was worth the saying, and though by no means lacking in clearness, is somewhat unmeaning without the text that it was intended to illustrate and emphasize. It is a curious medley of commonplace and pretentiousness; of spasms of tune-fulness and throes of melodrama; the whole seasoned with spice and frequently novel orchestral effects which are now and then more vulgar than edifying. The suite was remarkably well played, but it made no very strong effect, despite its eccentricities and its bid for popular favor. The fiery Dvorak symphony was also very well played, and with great spirit. Mr. Loeffler played the fine violin concerto with exquisite taste, perfect finish of style, purity and brilliancy of technique, and nobility of sentiment. The warm and graceful artistic feeling, and the conscientious devotion to the composer that always give a characteristic distinction to his playing, were manifested at their fullest, and proved a potent element in the pleasure that his performance afforded. He was applauded with exceptional enthusiasm, and was three times recalled with tremendous fervor. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Der Freyschutz," Weber; Symphony, No. 4, E minor, Brahms; "Todtentanz," Riemenschneider (first time); Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai. There will be no soloist.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

KARL MARIA VON WEBER. OVERTURE to "Der Freischuetz," in C.

JOHANNES BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor.

- I. Allegro non troppo. E minor.
- II. Andante moderato. E major.
- III. Allegro giocoso. C major.
- IV. Allegro energico e passionato. E minor.

GEORG RIEMENSCHNEIDER. "TODTENTANZ"

Moderately slow (constantly modulating)
Very lively and restless. A minor.
(First time.)

OTTO NICOLAI.

OVERTURE. "Merry Wives of Windsor."
Andantino moderato. F major.
Allegro vivace. F major.

that was probably not the fault of the performer.

Without being particularly brilliant, Mr. Loeffler played with facility and commendable dash. Just before the close of the piece he introduced a cadenza of his own, which was in keeping with the general tone of the composition and very well performed.

The artist was enthusiastically received, being recalled several times at the close of his performance.

Mendelssohn's fantastic overture, "Fingal's Cave," was played with great effect. Each part of the orchestra did its work splendidly. The fragments of themes which the great composer introduces throughout the work are impartially distributed among the instruments, and the fine contrasts and changes in tempo and harmony were given in such a manner as to realize a tone picture of great beauty.

Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt," was a novelty. Norwegian in treatment and at times startling in its grotesque orchestration, the cellos being added to the instruments of percussion by the performers striking the strings with the back of the bow.

It was played with great spirit and the proper abandon, the dance, "The Mountain King's Daughter," with its glissando terminal by the xylophone, being the sensational feature of the number.

Dvorak's symphony in D minor, No. 2, closed the concert. The beautiful orchestral coloring of the first two movements were effectively presented, and the style is characteristic of the composer in the last numbers were given with admirable contrasting energy and boldness.

The programme for the next rehearsal and concert will consist of the overture from "Der Freischuetz," Weber; symphony No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; "Todtentanz," for orchestra, first time, Riemenschneider, and overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai.

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Concert.

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday evening at Music Hall. The programme was as follows: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; concerto for violin No. 1 in A minor, Saint-Saens; orchestral suite, No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Dvorak. Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist. The orchestra gave more attention to detail in both the Mendelssohn overture and the Grieg suite (the latter hardly worthy a place on the programme) than it is customary to expect from it nowadays, and consequently the works were not without some effect in the renderings.

In the symphony, however, the orchestra fell into its accustomed coarse and over-loud manner, paying little regard to the nuances of the composition, and failing to give the least indication of repose or delicacy anywhere. Even the adagio, which demands the most expressive playing, was given with a monotone of loudness, every half tint of shading being exaggerated in a stereotyped and vulgar manner. The playing of the finale resulted in little less than a continuous noise. Now this symphony is a work that demands the greatest care in the playing, for it is full of wide and sudden contrasts, is bold and impassioned, changeable in rhythm and glows with a rich color. Its themes are at times tender and delicate, and demand a most considerate treatment in the rendering.

Nothing of the sort was brought forth in the playing, however, and the effect fell flat. Mr. Loeffler played as he always does in a manner at once denoting the skilful performer, able musician and the ripe artist. The Saint-Saens concerto, worthy of its eminent author, met with a splendid interpretation upon the part of Mr. Loeffler, his own cadenza serving to display his grasp of the technical difficulties of the instrument, his pure intonation and his firm and well restrained tone. He was recalled three times.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was very well attended, notwithstanding the miserable weather. The programme was: Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Concerto for Violin, No. 1, in A, op. 20, Saint-Saens; Orchestral Suite, No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55, Grieg; Symphony in D minor, No. 2, op. 70, Dvorak. The Grieg Suite, which, if we are not mistaken, had not been heard at these concerts before, is not especially interesting. As music, pure and simple, it says very little that was worth the saying, and though by no means lacking in clearness, is somewhat unmeaning without the text that it was intended to illustrate and emphasize. It is a curious medley of commonplace and pretentiousness; of spasms of tunelessness and throes of melodrama; the whole seasoned with spice and frequently novel orchestral effects which are now and then more vulgar than edifying. The suite was remarkably well played, but it made no very strong effect, despite its eccentricities and its bid for popular favor. The fiery Dvorak symphony was also very well played, and with great spirit. Mr. Loeffler played the fine violin concerto with exquisite taste, perfect finish of style, purity and brilliancy of technique, and nobility of sentiment. The warm and graceful artistic feeling, and the conscientious devotion to the composer that always give a characteristic distinction to his playing, were manifested at their fullest, and proved a potent element in the pleasure that his performance afforded. He was applauded with exceptional enthusiasm, and was three times recalled with tremendous fervor. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Der Freischuetz," Weber; Symphony, No. 4, E minor, Brahms; "Todtentanz," Riemenschneider (first time); Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai. There will be no soloist.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

KARL MARIA VON WEBER. OVERTURE to "Der Freischuetz," in C.

JOHANNES BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor.

- I. Allegro non troppo. E minor.
- II. Andante moderato. E major.
- III. Allegro giocoso. C major.
- IV. Allegro energico e passionato. E minor.

GEORG RIEMENSCHNEIDER. "TODTENTANZ"

Moderately slow (constantly modulating)
Very lively and restless. A minor.
(First time.)

OTTO NICOLAI.

OVERTURE. "Merry Wives of Windsor."
Andantino moderato. F major.
Allegro vivace. F major.

Y. MARCH 6, 1893.

MUSIC AND DRAMA. June

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Weber: Overture to "Der Freischütz."

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Opus 98.

Riemenschneider: "Todtentanz."

Nicolai: Overture to "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor."

The overture to the "Freischütz" began with a long-held C such as we never experienced before. There are some famous long notes in music—think, for instance, of the thirteen measures of A in the soprani in the ninth symphony—but they are for the most part organ-points, against which other voices do something interesting; but this long C stands all by itself, nothing accompanies it, nothing has preceded it, and, after a while, it seems as if nothing were destined to follow it. One feels like calling out, "Enough! stop! assez! basta! we understand! the note is C; yes, we know it!" What is Mr. Nikisch thinking of, to take the tempo at such a crawl that you absolutely lose all interest in every note before the next note comes? When it came to the Samiel business, he had to hurry up, as we were glad to note. The quick movement was played with great dash and effect—albeit we do not like that little jump in the phrasing of the Agathe theme in the flute, clarinet and bassoon—and the great C-major chords rang out grandly; in the coda Mr. Nikisch followed Wagner's idea of starting in piano with the theme, after the first dash; this does seem really an improvement upon the old fortissimo way, and Wagner's clever sophistry proves quite conclusively enough that Weber must have intended the passage to go so.

With the Brahms symphony we again struck upon the snag of Mr. Nikisch's passion for making things slow. Ah! come, now! There is only one slow movement in this symphony, and Mr. Nikisch gives us three! The opening Allegro non troppo was played as an Andante poco moto; the final Passacaglia, marked Allegro energico e passionato, was played Allegretto moderato. The only move the ear could recognize as a distinctly quick movement was the third, Allegro giocoso. The result of this slow tempo in the first and last movements, added to the rather morose Phrygian mode of the slow movement and the forbidding cross-relation in the second measure of the theme of the third, was to give the whole symphony a singularly sinister expression. No doubt a certain sombre grandeur and impressiveness was at times gained thereby; but it was a very Sahara-like sort of grandeur, of which the ear soon tires, and in not a few places the effect seemed rather over-sentimental than grand. Now, likely enough, Mr. Nikisch can say that he has been through this very symphony with Brahms himself, and that he takes it just as the composer wished it to go. Were the first part of this true, the second part does not necessarily follow. One can not imagine Brahms having the queer fancy Rubinstein had at one time, of marking some of his movements as he did not want them to go. Once, when Rubinstein came to Vienna to conduct some new works of his which the orchestra had already rehearsed under its regular conductor, every one was surprised at the last rehearsal, which Rubinstein conducted in person, to find how very differently he took some tempi; the conductor who had conducted the preliminary rehearsals excused himself to the composer for the blunder he had apparently made in taking some of his movements wrong, by saying, "How could you expect me to divine that you meant the music to go so slow, when you have marked it allegretto?" Rubinstein answered, "Oh! that is nothing; the term allegretto has certain personal associations for me in this connection, and I marked the movement so, more for my own satisfaction than for anything else; it is true it does not give a very clear notion of the proper tempo, but I did not mind that." But, if Rubinstein can do things of this sort, one can not well imagine Brahms being so impractical; when he says allegro, it may be taken as at least prima facie evidence that he means allegro. Another argument on our side is that Mr. Nikisch took both the first and last movements of this symphony even slower at the Friday-afternoon rehearsal than at the Saturday-evening concert; both tempi can not be right even from his point of view. But the strongest argument on our side is, after all, this—that an especial fondness for very slow allegros is a strongly-marked trait in Mr. Nikisch's conducting in general, no matter who the composer may be; the opportunities a deliberate tempo gives for expressive phrasing, for highly potentized emotional coloring, and for producing impressive effects, seem peculiarly tempting to him. He is an "emotional" conductor, if ever there were one, and his instinctive bent is to make things as dramatic as possible. Well, if a man have a right to anything, it is to his own individuality: he has a right to his, and we to ours. It is not our fault if what seems strongly dramatic and impressive to him, often seems merely theatrical and trivial to us. And we may be pardoned for being a little tired of the monotony of having to say so often: like enough, he is just as tired of hearing us say so. The symphony was, upon the whole, excellently played, although some few passages might have been given with greater clearness and accuracy of ensemble; the great Passacaglia of the last movement was enormously impressive; to us it is one of the grandest of Brahms's orchestral movements, to be ranked with the first movement and finale of his C minor symphony. Nothing but its inherent force, but the genius in it, could have made it palatable in its place in the symphony, especially after the preceding Allegro giocoso, which sounds so much like a finale itself.

Riemenschneider's "Todtentanz," written on a queer ballad by Goethe, is a work that can fairly be dismissed without comment, as the audience dismissed it without applause. Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture did one good to hear. It was played with immense and contagious brilliancy, in a way that was wholly new to us. We should have liked to hear the violins take that demure, roguish little second theme more delicately, with someblackening up before its last appearance, and making a marked ritenuto on its first measure or two! Is not this sort of thing, in the last analysis, nothing more nor less than the familiar, hackneyed effect that belongs properly to concert performances of Strauss waltzes? But, with these exceptions, the overture was given with tremendous dash and vim.

210

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," opus 9; Rubinstein, pianoforte concerto No. 4, in D minor, opus 70; Wagner, "Siegfried Idyll;" Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Rhenish"), opus 97. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Symphony Concert—The Durell Opera Season.

A Notable Sunday Programme for the "Music Hall Popular"—The Public School Music Question Reopened—A Nordica Matinee—News Notes, Comment, Gossip.

No soloist appeared at the 17th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening; the programme given under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction being as follows: Weber, overture to "Der Freischütz"; Brahms, symphony No. 4 in E minor, opus 98; Riemenschneider, "Todtentanz" for orchestra (first time); Nicolai, overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

Director Nikisch rather had those who have studiously avoided a rehearsing of Mr. Brahms' fourth symphony at a disadvantage in this return to the Henschel arrangement of the programme at these concerts. Even the old city reporter, who in this day, after a generation of service in Boston churches, brags that he has "never heard a prayer and never missed a text," would be puzzled to have timed his arrival so as to have avoided a hearing of Mr. Brahms' over-elaboration of short musical phrases which he dignifies with the title of symphony.

Mr. Nikisch and his men were very faithful in their efforts to give the work a good performance, and the followers of the composer appeared well satisfied with the results.

The novelty of the evening, "The Dance of Death," proved a very fascinating bit of bizarre writing. It is designed to describe the scene of Goethe's poem, which tells of the experiences of a watchman stationed upon a tower which overlooks a graveyard. The traditional visit to earthly scenes by the inhabitants of the tombs below him and their usual revels occur, the dancery casting aside the habiliments of the grave to gain greater freedom. Thinking to play a practical joke and to send one ghost back to his abiding place in a condition to be troubled with rheumatism, the watchman steals down from the tower and abstracts one pite of grave clothes, which he carries back to his point of observation.

As the dancers tire of their revelry they are supposed to stand, one by one, to their graves, showing the same indifference to personal property as they had, presumably, while in the flesh after similar enjoyment. Of course, the last ghost left has no clothes, and, spying the watchman in possession of the lost garment, makes an effort to regain it by climbing the tower. Just as he is about to clutch the watchman and his clothes the clock strikes 1, and down he tumbles into his usual resting place.

As abstract music, the composition is full of tuneful ideas, cleverly elaborated and making a most enjoyable impression at a first hearing. As to whether the act of disrobing and the scenes of excitement incidental to the discovery that all the other fellows have gone has been correctly depicted in this "tone poem" is, at least, an open question. The composer has given the ghosts the usual instruments to dance by, and has written some music that set many a foot tapping at the measures as they were played under Mr. Nikisch's baton.

The "Freischütz" overture was given a somewhat dull and dreary performance, but Nicolai's brilliant "Merry Wives" overture had a splendid performance, and sent the audience away full of its tuneful themes.

Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist, is the soloist next Saturday, and the programme will be Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte, in D minor; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and Schumann's symphony No. 3 (Rhenish), in E flat.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, did not attract a very large audience. The slim attendance was probably owing to the fact that there was no soloist, though the programme was not particularly enticing. It was: Overture, "Der Freyschütz," Weber; Symphony No. 4, Brahms; "Todtentanz," Riemenschneider (first time); and overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai. The new work did not make any very favorable impression. It is merely capelmelster music of no special musical value. As a "Dance of Death," it will not bear anything like favorable comparison with Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre." It is unimaginative, without marked character, suggests nothing grim or grotesque, and is barren of interest of any description. Mr. Riemenschneider seems to be of the same order of composers as is Mr. Humperdink, who was also introduced to the Boston public at these concerts. The Nicolai Overture was a pleasing innovation, and now that the ice has been broken, it is to be hoped that we may hear more bright and inspiring opera overtures, by Auber, Herold, Rossini and others. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Concerto for piano, D-minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyll," Wagner, and Symphony No. 3, Schumann. The soloist is to be Madam Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It was a rather oddly arranged programme that was given at the concert of Saturday, in which the earnest and the spectral were sandwiched between the romantic and the jovial. It began with the overture to "Der Freischütz." A great deal of liberty is to be allowed in the reading of a Weber work, for this composer was of the theatre and employed the devices of the stage more freely than other great composers; but there was a tendency to exaggerate these points in the performance, an evident desire to prolong pauses into acute suspense, and to increase the bursts of sound to cyclones of fury. Spite of these shortcomings, and they jarred but little in such a work, the performance was a memorable one. The clarinette theme was most charmingly played; to Weber, in fact, belongs the credit of having discovered the true possibilities of the instrument, and the dark, spectral tone-color of the lower register (the "Chalumeau") is here used to excellent advantage. Although Mozart had given prominence to the clarinette more than 30 years before, he seems never to have grasped the effect of this register; only Mendelssohn, in "Elijah" and in the Scotch Symphony, may be ranked with Weber in the masterly use of the clarinette. Not less striking as a remarkable bit of tone color is the pizzicato A, which follows the horn quartette; it is the most graphic effect ever produced on a single note on the contrabasses. The famous horn quartette (progenitor of hymns innumerable) has been much better given in Boston than it was on this occasion. There was no actual break of tone, but the whole passage was too loud, and altogether lacked the tenderness and romance which should have characterized it.

The placing of a Brahms' symphony in the centre of the programme had the advantage that the audience heard it all; generally, when a symphony by this master ends the programme, the audience file out after one or two movements, believing either that Brahms is too dull to listen to, or that he is too deep for the average comprehension. The symphony received a performance that may be called magnificent. Every musician played as if he loved the work, and the reading, if a trifle too heavy at times, was yet full of power and virility. The writer of this can never forget the remark made by Dr. Hiller shortly before his death, "Who have we today in the symphonic school? Brahms, and Brahms alone!" It is true, development is the keystone of the symphonic construction, and no other living man is such a master of thematic development; no one can present the logic of music as Brahms does. The symphony is the most difficult form to master because two diverse styles of writing are represented in it. Beethoven remains unrivalled in this field because intellectuality and emotion are in such perfect equipoise in his work. Brahms falls short of the great master, chiefly in the fact that with him the intellectual side outweighs the emotional, but how wonderfully this intellect shines forth in the grand last movements! What marvellous treatment the unpromising chief theme receives in the first movement, and with what ease the kaleidoscopic transformations are accomplished! The final variations are worthy of Beethoven: in fact one might imagine that Beethoven had inspired the simple theme which leads so naturally up to grandeur, for the older master frequently used just such devices. The Passacaglia, which is here the subject for variation, is little else than a simple diatonic scale. It is an ancient Spanish dance that is often misunderstood in its modern reproductions; the very name might mislead the composer, for Calle is Spanish for "street," and the word means "running the streets." But the Passacaglia was the most inflated and bombastic dance of the Spanish court, where it was danced by the grandes one or two at a time and in full costume. There is, therefore, nothing of street life to be sought for in the Passacaglia, and the word probably comes from an Italian source; "Passo Gallo"—"The Rooster's Step" might explain it all. The tempo in which this movement was taken calls for commendation; it is often spoiled by being taken too fast. Its performance was most brilliant; the violins were thrillingly effective in their incisive power, and the flute solo, with its Oriental flavor and its drone-bass was remarkably well done.

211

One may call the second movement the most effective slow movement that Brahms has ever composed. Wonderful new touches are brought out of a very old scale-form; the first eight measures alone are sufficient to stamp the composer as a genius. The cellos did some admirable work here, as also did the woodwind.

The third movement, one of the deviations from the scherzo which Brahms has established, is the weakest of the work, yet the performance brought out beauties which I had never perceived before. A spirit of mediæval revelry, such as Wagner has depicted in the prentice life of Nuremberg, seemed to permeate it all, and it was at least exciting. All in all, a great performance.

After this, Herr Riemenschneider told us a ghost story. While it did not thrill the auditor as the dance inspired by Sieur Maccaber, it gave a dash of tamtam, of piccolo, and of other cemetery adjuncts as usually presented in the concert room. In this spectral Soiree Dansante the participants were rather phlegmatic Teutonic ghosts, and even the energetic one who climbed the tower in pursuit of the party who had robbed the coat-room while the dance was in progress, was tame in comparison with the living skeletons exhibited by Saint-Saens. The overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" was enjoyable—a draught of musical champagne; but one may question the fitness of such a work after a Brahms' symphony. If the object is simply to please, and if the bid is purely for popularity, it is all right; but if the intention is to uplift and educate, to give a true appreciation of the masterworks, then it is all wrong.

Naturally this overture received abundance of applause, and it deserved it, for it was a charming work admirably played; but, for all that, it seemed to the reviewer the right thing in the wrong place.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

thing more of siren fascination. And then that slackening up before its last appearance, and making a marked ritenuto on its first measure or two! Is not this sort of thing, in the last analysis, nothing more nor less than the familiar, hackneyed effect that belongs properly to concert performances of Strauss waltzes? But, with these exceptions, the overture was given with tremendous dash and vim.

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," opus 9; Rubinstein, pianoforte concerto No. 4, in D minor, opus 70; Wagner, "Siegfried Idyll," Schumann, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Rhenish"), opus 97. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Symphony Concert—The Durell Opera Season.

A Notable Sunday Programme for the "Music Hall Popular"—The Public School Music Question Reopened—A Nordica Matinee—News Notes, Comment, Gossip.

No soloist appeared at the 17th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening, the programme given under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction being as follows: Weber, overture to "Der Freischütz"; Brahms, symphony No. 4 in E minor, opus 98; Riemenschneider, "Todtentanz" for orchestra (first time); Nicolai, overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

Director Nikisch rather had those who have studiously avoided a rehearing of Mr. Brahms' fourth symphony at a disadvantage in this return to the Henschel arrangement of the programme at these concerts. Even the old city reporter, who in this day, after a generation of service in Boston churches, brags that he has "never heard a prayer and never missed a text," would be puzzled to have timed his arrival so as to have avoided a hearing of Mr. Brahms' over elaboration of short musical phrases which he dignifies with the title of symphony.

Mr. Nikisch and his men were very faithful in their efforts to give the work a good performance, and the followers of the composer appeared well satisfied with the results.

The novelty of the evening, "The Dance of Death," proved a very fascinating bit of bizarre writing. It is designed to describe the scene of Goethe's poem, which tells of the experiences of a watchman stationed upon a tower which overlooks a graveyard. The traditional visit to earthly scenes by the inhabitants of the tombs below him and their usual revels occur, and the dancery castingside the habiliments of the grave to gain greater freedom. Thinking to play a practical joke and to send one ghost back to his abiding place in a condition to be troubled with rheumatism, the watchman steals down from the tower and abstracts one pite of grave clothes, which he carries back to his point of observation.

As the dancers tire of their revelry they are supposed to return, one by one, to their graves, showing the same indifference to personal property as they had, presumably, while in the flesh after similar enjoyment. Of course, the last ghost left has no clothes, and, spying the watchman in possession of the lost garment, makes an effort to regain it by climbing the tower. Just as he is about to clutch the watchman and his clothes the clock strikes 1, and down he tumbles into his usual resting place.

As abstract music, the composition is full of tuneful ideas, cleverly elaborated and making a most enjoyable impression at a first hearing. As to whether the act of disrobing and the scenes of excitement incidental to the discovery that all the other fellows have gone has been correctly depicted in this "tone poem" is, at least, an open question. The composer has given the ghosts the usual instruments to dance by, and has written some music that set many a foot tapping at the measures as they were played under Mr. Nikisch's baton.

The "Freischütz" overture was given a somewhat dull and dreary performance, but Nicolai's brilliant "Merry Wives" overture had a splendid performance, and sent the audience away full of its tuneful themes.

Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist, is the soloist next Saturday, and the programme will be Berlioz's overture, "Le Carnaval Romain"; Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte, in D minor; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and Schumann's symphony No. 3 (Rhenish), in E flat.

MUSICAL.

The Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, did not attract a very large audience. The slim attendance was probably owing to the fact that there was no soloist, though the programme was not particularly enticing. It was: Overture, "Der Freyschütz," Weber; Symphony No. 4, Brahms; "Todtentanz," Riemenschneider (first time); and overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai. The new work did not make any very favorable impression. It is merely capelmeter music of no special musical value. As a "Dance of Death," it will not bear anything like favorable comparison with Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre." It is unimaginative, without marked character, suggests nothing grim or grotesque, and is barren of interest of any description. Mr. Riemenschneider seems to be of the same order of composers as is Mr. Humperdinck, who was also introduced to the Boston public at these concerts. The Nicolai Overture was a pleasing innovation, and now that the ice has been broken, it is to be hoped that we may hear more bright and inspiring opera overtures, by Auber, Herold, Roedel and others. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Concerto for piano, D-minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyll," Wagner, and Symphony No. 3, Schumann. The soloist is to be Madam Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

It was a rather oddly arranged programme that was given at the concert of Saturday, in which the earnest and the spectral were sandwiched between the romantic and the jovial. It began with the overture to "Der Freischütz." A great deal of liberty is to be allowed in the reading of a Weber work, for this composer was of the theatre and employed the devices of the stage more freely than other great composers; but there was a tendency to exaggerate these points in the performance, an evident desire to prolong pauses into acute suspense, and to increase the bursts of sound to cyclones of fury. Spite of these shortcomings, and they jarred but little in such a work, the performance was a memorable one. The clarinette theme was most charmingly played; to Weber, in fact, belongs the credit of having discovered the true possibilities of the instrument, and the dark, spectral tone-color of the lower register (the "Chalumeau") is here used to excellent advantage. Although Mozart had given prominence to the clarinette more than 30 years before, he seems never to have grasped the effect of this register; only Mendelssohn, in "Elijah" and in the Scotch Symphony, may be ranked with Weber in the masterly use of the clarinette. Not less striking as a remarkable bit of tone color is the pizzicato A, which follows the horn quartette; it is the most graphic effect ever produced on a single note on the contrabasses. The famous horn quartette (progenitor of hymns innumerable) has been much better given in Boston than it was on this occasion. There was no actual break of tone, but the whole passage was too loud, and altogether lacked the tenderness and romance which should have characterized it.

The placing of a Brahms' symphony in the centre of the programme had the advantage that the audience heard it all; generally, when a symphony by this master ends the programme, the audience file out after one or two movements, believing either that Brahms is too dull to listen to, or that he is too deep for the average comprehension. The symphony received a performance that may be called magnificent. Every musician played as if he loved the work, and the reading, if a trifle too heavy at times, was yet full of power and virility. The writer of this can never forget the remark made by Dr. Hiller shortly before his death, "Who have we today in the symphonic school? Brahms, and Brahms alone!" It is true, development is the keystone of the symphonic construction, and no other living man is such a master of thematic development; no one can present the logic of music as Brahms does. The symphony is the most difficult form to master because two diverse styles of writing are represented in it. Beethoven remains unrivalled in this field because intellectuality and emotion are in such perfect equipoise in his work. Brahms falls short of the great master, chiefly in the fact that with him the intellectual side outweighs the emotional, but how wonderfully this intellect shines forth in the first and last movements! What marvellous treatment the unpromising chief theme receives in the first movement, and with what ease the kaleidoscopic transformations are accomplished! The final variations are worthy of Beethoven: in fact one might imagine that Beethoven had inspired the simple theme which leads so naturally up to grandeur, for the older master frequently used just such devices. The Passacaglia, which is here the subject for variation, is little else than a simple diatonic scale. It is an ancient Spanish dance that is often misunderstood in its modern reproductions; the very name might mislead the composer, for Calle is Spanish for "street," and the word means "running the streets." But the Passacaglia was the most inflated and bombastic dance of the Spanish court, where it was danced by the grandees one or two at a time and in full costume. There is, therefore, nothing of street life to be sought for in the Passacaglia, and the word probably comes from an Italian source; "Passo Gallo"—"The Rooster's Step" might explain it all. The tempo in which this movement was taken calls for commendation; it is often spoiled by being taken too fast. Its performance was most brilliant; the violins were thrillingly effective in their incisive power, and the flute solo, with its Oriental flavor and its drone-bass was remarkably well done.

One may call the second movement the most effective slow movement that Brahms has ever composed. Wonderful new touches are brought out of a very old scale-form; the first eight measures alone are sufficient to stamp the composer as a genius. The cellos did some admirable work here, as also did the woodwind.

The third movement, one of the deviations from the scherzo which Brahms has established, is the weakest of the work, yet the performance brought out beauties which I had never perceived before. A spirit of mediæval revelry, such as Wagner has depicted in the prentice life of Nuremberg, seemed to permeate it all, and it was at least exciting. All in all, a great performance.

After this, Herr Riemenschneider told us a ghost story. While it did not thrill the auditor as the dance inspired by Sieur Maccaber, it gave a dash of tamtam, of piccolo, and of other cemetery adjuncts as usually presented in the concert room. In this spectral Soiree Dansante the participants were rather phlegmatic Teutonic ghosts, and even the energetic one who climbed the tower in pursuit of the party who had robbed the coat-room while the dance was in progress, was tame in comparison with the living skeletons exhibited by Saint-Saens. The overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" was enjoyable—a draught of musical champagne; but one may question the fitness of such a work after a Brahms' symphony. If the object is simply to please, and if the bid is purely for popularity, it is all right; but if the intention is to uplift and educate, to give a true appreciation of the masterworks, then it is all wrong.

Naturally this overture received abundance of applause, and it deserved it, for it was a charming work admirably played; but, for all that, it seemed to the reviewer the right thing in the wrong place.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

212
MARCH 5, 1893

MUSICAL MATTERS.

No Soloist at Last Night's Symphony Concert.Lilian Durell Opera Company Soon to Sing at the Boston Theatre.Popular Sunday Concerts—Vocal and Piano Recitals—Personal Gossip.

There were no soloists introduced at the 17th symphony concert and rehearsal, Mr. Nikisch making up his programme entirely of orchestral numbers. Of the four selections but one was new, Riemenschneider's "Dance of Death," being given for the first time here. Weber's romantic overture to "Der Freischütz," Brahms's symphony No. 4, and Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" were the other offerings.

Weber's delightful work calls for little comment, the interpretation, as a whole, being admirable. In the beautiful adagio, in which occur the sylvan melodies, the charming themes were most daintily given by the strings and quartet of horns. The incantation music was also effectively played. The impressive finale, with its rushing, ascending passages, was at times indistinct, the full orchestra not following promptly their conductor's baton beat.

The Brahms number was marred by the imperfect tones of the brasses in the closing movement. The solemn and elaborate harmonies of the second part, given first to the wood winds and horns, and later to the strings, were, perhaps, the best portion of the performance.

The Riemenschneider "Dance of Death" is a musical setting of Goethe's ballad in which a watchman sees the corpses in a churchyard sally forth and indulge in a dance, after removing their shrouds.

The watchman steals a garment, and when the dancers return to their graves the skeleton who has been deprived of his habiliments seeks out the watchman, who has climbed to the top of the tower in affright. Just as the skeleton is about to regain his winding-sheet the clock strikes 1 and the spirit falls to the pavement below, shattered to atoms.

The character piece is of an order which may be called "diabolique," and is orchestrated to carry out the ghostly ideas of the story. The opening theme is very pretty and the first of the dance movement is melodious, but the work soon becomes chaotic and weird and is only to be judged by its effect, which certainly is symbolic of an internal revel. The orchestra evidently achieved the results intended by the composer. As a contrast to the foregoing number Nicolai's "Merry Wives" overture was most welcome, and the merry, fairy-like composition, a notable example of pure comic opera, seemed particularly enjoyable. The dash and spirit which the orchestra infused into its work was marked, and the audience evinced its pleasure by according this number the most liberal plaudits of the evening.

The programme for the rehearsal and concert, March 10 and 11, will be as follows: Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for piano, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, E flat. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeissler will be the pianist.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

The seventeenth symphony concert last evening had a programme against which no serious objections could be urged. It was no such programme as either Conductor Nikisch or the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra might have chosen for their own edification. For this reason it was certainly none the less a popular programme. It contained two well worn yet ever acceptable overtures, "Der Freischütz," and "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" also Brahms' most easily intelligible symphony No. 4, in E minor; and for a novelty the Todtentanz, by Georg Riemenschneider.

In a small book entitled "Der Freischütz Buch" by Frederic Kind, who was von Weber's librettist, it is stated, that at its first performance, in Paris in 1824, "Der Freischütz" was hissed—a singular exception to the popularity of an opera that in this respect has probably never been surpassed either before or since Weber's time. It is even recorded that its music once became, so familiar in London, and among all classes of people that a gentleman advertising for a servant conspicuously stipulated that no applicant would be accepted who could whistle its airs.

It is hardly possible that "Der Freischütz" was exceptionally unpopular in Paris owing to the revolutionary spirit that Weber exhibited towards the art works of his immediate predecessors and contemporaries, whose overtures were nearly all independent compositions of themselves; the Weberian form of overture being a very complete epitome of the opera which follows, especially the overtures to "Oberon," "Euryanthe" and "Der Freischütz." In the performance last evening the ever delightful horn passage with which the overture begins was given with a slovenly untunefulness and inartistic apathy that were well nigh intolerable. The incantation music, Agathe's moonlight scene, which contains perhaps, the most familiar theme of the opera and the episodes connected with the action of Max and Casper, were for the most part performed in a manner so mediocre, that any member of the old Harvard Musical Association Orchestra might consistently have blushed for shame to have participated in such a performance; one that had indeed but a single noteworthy precedent, and that, when the overture was performed under Conductor Nikisch in Symphony concert series of two years ago.

Brahms fourth symphony in E minor will generally be regarded as containing by far the most genial and melodious specimens of symphonic material that have yet appeared from his pen. Throughout the work he is conspicuous in making the song form his central point, and with a success that he has certainly not surpassed if equalled in any other of his concerted works. Especially in the allegro non-troppo movements may be found an abundance of just such melody as has its basis, not in the profound scholastic's mind, but in the earnest, sympathetic feeling of the genius-born musician. Here the best of the three great "B's" is quite unlike himself in permitting the soul of his symphony to mold its own body, and the more technical laws of his art are nobly subordinated to the Supreme will. As the late Professor Tyndall would say, there is "a self-renunciation which has something noble in it."

This symphony more than almost any other work, composed since Beethoven's time, magnificently transcends the labored and pedagogic pursuit of music as a science, so called, and appears as the truest application of that genuine science that is invariably congenial to the exercise of the imagination and a love of the beautiful. Of what other symphony of Brahms can the same be said? No two votaries of musical art have so widely differed as Koestlin in theory, and Brahms, in practice; but with Brahms' opus 98 we find a "rich, expressive and subjective state of feeling," etc., that fairly "outkoestlins" Koestlin. Possibly it may seem that the andante is somewhat fantastic—too weirdly and mournfully conceived, but as a real tone poem of human sorrow, as a sad and painful yearning it has few equals outside the ever matchless Beethoven andantes. The scherzo is full of gay satiric humor, which now and then borders on the grotesque. It is richly colored and replete with charming changes. The finale has as its worthiest characteristic a short theme with variations, in which the intellectual side of the theme and its inherent sentiment becomes the predominating motive of each theme.

It is a pleasure to record that the symphony was performed in the orchestra's noblest manner. It was ably interpreted by Conductor Nikisch, and the tone contrasts throughout were excellently observed.

The Todtentanz, by Riemenschneider, is a weakly sensational specimen of programme music in its lowest estate. Both the Todtentanz and the well known overture by Nicolai were praiseworthy rendered.

MUSIC. Journal

The Seventeenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Der Freischütz" Weber
Symphony No. 4, in E minor Brahms
"Totentanz" (first time) Riemenschneider
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai

Louis Ehrhart, in an article, "The Concert System of Berlin," wrote in this manner: "For more than 25 years the same old master-works have been accepted and listened to, reproduced in the same old monotonous manner, and with the same contracted and affected conception of their meaning. Instead of opening the doors reluctantly, and on exceptional occasions only, to the important productions of contemporary composers, it were a better plan to close accounts with many of the departed ones. There is no longer a necessity annually to revive Weber's overtures, which have been heard hundreds of times; the day has come in which to limit them to their proper places before their respective operas."

We hear annually in Boston Weber's overtures, but under the present reign they are not always "reproduced in the same old monotonous manner." The adagio was taken at so slow a pace Saturday evening that the movement was adagiosissimo. The rhythm, therefore, fell to the ground, and the horn quartette suffered. There was exaggeration in the slackening of the pace, where the "Zamir and Max motives" enter for the last time, just before the great crash in C major.

In the measures that follow the Wagnerian theory was observed: In the thirteenth measure the mark Sforzato was interpreted as diminuendo, and the broad melody in C major was begun in sentimental fashion, not in a triumphant spirit. With these exceptions the performance was excellent, often intensely dramatic.

The overture to "Der Freischütz" was first played in 1821. Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" was first played in its proper place in 1849, although as a concert number it may have been given at the farewell concert of the composer in Vienna (1847), for several instrumental numbers from the then unfinished opera were included in the programme. The latter overture seems to-day the older work. Nevertheless it was welcome. It is to be hoped that light overtures by Auber, and others of the French school, may also find a place in Music Hall.

These overtures abound in sparkling melody, piquant harmony; and, as a rule, the instrumentation is a delight to the hearer and a lesson to the student.

Georg Riemenschneider was unknown to our audiences, although he is about 45 years old, the composer of orchestral pieces (such as "Donna Diana," "A Night in July," a Fest-

MARCH 5, 1893—7

MUSICAL MATTERS.

No Soloist at Last Night's Symphony Concert.

Lillian Durell Opera Company Soon to Sing at the Boston Theatre.

Popular Sunday Concerts—Vocal and Piano Recitals—Personal Gossip.

There were no soloists introduced at the 17th symphony concert and rehearsal, Mr. Nikisch making up his programme entirely of orchestral numbers. Of the four selections but one was new, Riemenschneider's "Dance of Death," being given for the first time here. Weber's romantic overture to "Der Freischütz," Brahms's symphony No. 4, and Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" were the other offerings.

Weber's delightful work calls for little comment, the interpretation, as a whole, being admirable. In the beautiful adagio, in which occur the sylvan melodies, the charming themes were most daintily given by the strings and quartet of horns. The incantation music was also effectively played. The impressive finale, with its rushing, ascending passages, was at times indistinct, the full orchestra not following promptly their conductor's baton beat.

The Brahms number was marred by the imperfect tones of the brasses in the closing movement. The solemn and elaborate harmonies of the second part, given first to the wood winds and horns, and later to the strings, were, perhaps, the best portion of the performance.

The Riemenschneider "Dance of Death" is a musical setting of Goethe's ballad in which a watchman sees the corpses in a churchyard sally forth and indulge in a dance, after removing their shrouds.

The watchman steals a garment, and when the dancers return to their graves the skeleton who has been deprived of his habiliments seeks out the watchman, who has climbed to the top of the tower in affright. Just as the skeleton is about to regain his winding-sheet the clock strikes 1 and the spirit falls to the pavement below, shattered to atoms.

The character piece is of an order which may be called "diabolique," and is orchestrated to carry out the ghostly ideas of the story. The opening theme is very pretty and the first of the dance movement is melodious, but the work soon becomes chaotic and weird and is only to be judged by its effect, which certainly is symbolical of an internal revel. The orchestra evidently achieved the results intended by the composer. As a contrast to the foregoing number Nicolai's "Merry Wives" overture was most welcome, and the merry, fairy-like composition, a notable example of pure comic opera, seemed particularly enjoyable. The dash and spirit which the orchestra infused into its work was marked, and the audience evinced its pleasure by according this number the most liberal plaudits of the evening. The programme for the rehearsal and concert, March 10 and 11, will be as follows: Overture, "Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for piano, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, E flat. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeissler will be the pianist.

TIGHT BINDING

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

The seventeenth symphony concert last evening had a programme against which no serious objections could be urged. It was no such programme as either Conductor Nikisch or the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra might have chosen for their own edification. For this reason it was certainly none the less a popular programme. It contained two well worn yet ever acceptable overtures, "Der Freischütz," and "The Merry Wives of Windsor;" also Brahms' most easily intelligible symphony No. 4, in E minor; and for a novelty the Todtentanz, by Georg Riemenschneider.

In a small book entitled "Der Freischütz Buch" by Frederic Kind, who was von Weber's librettist, it is stated, that at its first performance, in Paris in 1824, "Der Freischütz" was hissed—a singular exception to the popularity of an opera that in this respect has probably never been surpassed either before or since Weber's time. It is even recorded that its music once became, so familiar in London, and among all classes of people that a gentleman advertising for a servant conspicuously stipulated that no applicant would be accepted who could whistle its airs.

It is hardly possible that "Der Freischütz" was exceptionally unpopular in Paris owing to the revolutionary spirit that Weber exhibited towards the art works of his immediate predecessors and contemporaries, whose overtures were nearly all independent compositions of themselves; the Weberian form of overture being a very complete epitome of the opera which follows, especially the overtures to "Oberon," "Euryanthe" and "Der Freischütz." In the performance last evening the ever delightful horn passage with which the overture begins was given with a slovenly untunefulness and inartistic apathy that were well nigh intolerable. The incantation music, Agathe's moonlight scene, which contains perhaps, the most familiar theme of the opera and the episodes connected with the action of Max and Casper, were for the most part performed in a manner so mediocre, that any member of the old Harvard Musical Association Orchestra might consistently have blushed for shame to have participated in such a performance; one that had indeed but a single noteworthy precedent, and that, when the overture was performed under Conductor Nikisch in Symphony concert series of two years ago.

Brahms fourth symphony in E minor will generally be regarded as containing by far the most genial and melodious specimens of symphonic material that have yet appeared from his pen. Throughout the work he is conspicuous in making the song form his central point, and with a success that he has certainly not surpassed if equalled in any other of his concerted works. Especially in the allegro non-troppo movements may be found an abundance of just such melody as has its basis, not in the profound scholastic's mind, but in the earnest, sympathetic feeling of the genius-born musician. Here the best of the three great "B's" is quite unlike himself in permitting the soul of his symphony to mold its own way, and the more technical laws of his art are nobly subordinated to the Supreme will. As the late Professor Tyndall would say, there is "a self-renunciation which has something noble in it."

This symphony more than almost any other work, imposed since Beethoven's time, magnificently transcends the labored and pedagogic pursuit of music as a science, so called, and appears as the truest application of that genuine science that is invariably congenial to the exercise of the imagination and a love of the beautiful. Of what other symphony can the same be said? No two votaries of musical art have so widely differed as Koestlin in theory, and Brahms, in practice; but with Brahms' symphony we find a "rich, expressive and subjective state of feeling," etc., that fairly "outkoestlins" Koestlin. Possibly it may seem that the andante is somewhat fantastic—too weirdly and mournfully conceived, but as a sad and painful tone poem of human sorrow, as a sad and painful yearning it has few equals outside the ever matchless Beethoven andantes. The scherzo is full of gay satiric humor, which now and then borders on the grotesque. It is richly colored and replete with charming changes. The finale has as its worthiest characteristic a short theme with variations, in which the intellectual side of the theme and its inherent sentiment becomes the predominating motive of each theme.

It is a pleasure to record that the symphony was performed in the orchestra's noblest manner. It was ably interpreted by Conductor Nikisch, and the tone contrasts throughout were excellently observed.

The Todtentanz, by Riemenschneider, is a weakly sensational specimen of programme music in its lowest estate. Both the Todtentanz and the well known overture by Nicolai were praiseworthy rendered.

MUSIC. Journal

The Seventeenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows: Overture, "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
Totentanz (first time).....Riemenschneider
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai

Louis Ehrhart, in an article, "The Concert System of Berlin," wrote in this manner: "For more than 25 years the same old master-works have been accepted and listened to, reproduced in the same old monotonous manner, and with the same contracted and affected conception of their meaning. Instead of opening the doors reluctantly, and on exceptional occasions only, to the important productions of contemporary composers, it were a better plan to close accounts with many of the departed ones. There is no longer a necessity annually to revive Weber's overtures, which have been heard hundreds of times; the day has come in which to limit them to their proper places before their respective operas."

We hear annually in Boston Weber's overtures, but under the present reign they are not always "reproduced in the same old monotonous manner." The adagio was taken at so slow a pace Saturday evening that the movement was adagiosissimo. The rhythm, therefore, fell to the ground, and the horn quartette suffered. There was exaggeration in the slackening of the pace, where the "Zamir and Max motives" enter for the last time, just before the great crash in C major.

In the measures that follow the Wagnerian theory was observed: In the thirteenth measure the mark Sforzato was interpreted as diminuendo, and the broad melody in C major was begun in sentimental fashion, not in a triumphant spirit. With these exceptions, the performance was excellent, often intensely dramatic.

The overture to "Der Freischütz" was first played in 1821. Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" was first played in its proper place in 1849, although as a concert number it may have been given at the farewell concert of the composer in Vienna (1847), for several instrumental numbers from the then unfinished opera were included in the programme. The latter overture seems to-day the older work. Nevertheless it was welcome. It is to be hoped that light overtures by Auber, and others of the French school, may also find a place in Music Hall.

These overtures abound in sparkling melody, piquant harmony; and, as a rule, the instrumentation is a delight to the hearer and a lesson to the student.

Georg Riemenschneider was unknown to our audiences, although he is about 45 years old, the composer of orchestral pieces (such as "Donna Diana," "A Night in July," a "Festi-

214
 "The Maiden," which has never, I believe, been heard in public. The "Dance of the Dead" was his introduction to this city.
 Mr. Bayes in "The Rehearsal" prepared himself for literary work in this ingenious manner: "If I am to write familiar things, as sonnets to Armida, and the like, I make use of stew'd prunes only: but when I have a grand design in hand, I even take physic, and let blood; for, when you would have pure swiftness of thought and fiery flights of fancy, you must have a care of the pensive part. In fine, you must purge the stomach."

Ernst Theodor Amadeus Hoffmann recommended Rhine wines to him that would write a mass; Burgundy to the composer of a grand opera; champagne to the writer of a comic opera; a fiery Italian wine to the author of passionate canzonets, and arrack punch to the man who thought of a second "Don Giovanni."

Russell ate raw pork that he might arouse his imagination.

Mr. Riemenschneider seems to have prepared himself for his task by indulging in copious draughts of flaxseed tea.

In illustration of a wild and grotesque poem by Goethe, Riemenschneider wrote music that is devoid of character. He nailed his episodes together, and at times the nails appear. He started out with conventional commonplaces, and it suddenly occurred to him that his music was without diablerie. He then bethought him of pulsatile instruments and a piccolo for spectral purposes. But beat and blow as he would, the ghosts did not obey his incantation. His dance-tune was neither mocking in its sensuousness, nor fantastic in its melody or rhythm. The thoughts were neither horrible nor grotesque, and the expression was prosaic.

However this piece by Riemenschneider serves one useful purpose; it recalls, in contrast, that masterpiece of Saint-Saëns, the "Danse Macabre."

"Zig and zig and zag, Death keeps time,
 Beating on a tomb with his heel;
 Death plays at midnight a dance-tune,
 Zig and zig and zag, on his fiddle."

The symphony of Brahms, in which masterly workmanship is more apparent than inspiration, was given with breadth and intensity.

The programme of the rehearsal and concert of this week is as follows: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for piano-forte, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Schumann's Symphony No. 3 (Rhenish), E flat. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

That the conductor of the Symphony concerts is a man of impulses, no one sees more clearly than himself, and he has even admitted frankly that in his interpretations a planned and intended reading not infrequently slips away from the control of his will, if a strong mood, evoked by something in the music or associated with it, interposes and sways him. In the direction of his seventeenth programme he must have been carried away often by his feelings, because nothing else could explain the extreme relaxations of tempo into which he several times sank. The concert began with the "Freischütz" overture, the opening adagio had less "linked sweetness" than "long-drawn-out"-ness, for it was taken so slowly that the beautiful and gently melting horn quartette lost its persuasiveness in the effort the players had to make to find breath enough for their usual phrases, without attempting to give uniformity and smoothness to their union. The allegro swept almost as far in the other direction, and fairly rushed to its conclusion save when some special delay upon a note or two held it back before another plunge. In the symphony, too—which was that laboriously elaborated fourth of Brahms—the tempo was slackened in all but the last movement, thus opposing the composer's directions, but giving the hearer a better chance to follow and understand and the director a longer dwelling in his lingering mood. Yet be it understood that with this exception taken to the tempo, there could be no special criticism brought against either the technical handling of the parts or the energy and earnestness of the reading. After the Brahms came a kind of ghost story in music—a "Todtendanz"—by George Riemenschneider, which added nothing to the value of the concert, although it will count as one more in the list of the season's novelties. There is some fancy in it, but of the rather deliberate and intentional sort, and it has some clattering and rattling and some whistling shrieks of the piccolo. But it is not to be mentioned in the same epoch with Saint-Saëns's unrivalled "Danse Macabre," gloomy and impressive with its wild, persistent voice of the viola and its swift, weird dispersion of the gaunt, fleshless revellers whom the strange, compulsive strain has summoned. The evening ended with a brilliant but rather too exhilarated rendering of Nicolai's bright, gay and elegant "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture.

Tonight there will be no novelty. The symphony will be Schumann in E-flat—the "Rhenish"—and the overture, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." Between these stand the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and Rubinstein's D-minor pianoforte concerto, to be played by that able and passionate artist, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Concert.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall, Saturday evening. The following is the programme:

Overture, "Der Freischütz," Weber; Symphony No. 4, in E-minor, Brahms; "The Dance of the Dead," Riemenschneider; overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai.

One of the most commendable performances of the orchestra since the advent of the present incumbent of the conductor's position, was the playing of the Weber overture on Saturday evening. The strings were simply perfect, the wood wind in good tune and the brass less violent than usual, but still too loud and coarse.

Of course it is not expected that the first clarinet will always play in perfect tune, or that the tympani player will ever have his drums correctly tuned, but nevertheless much pleasure was enjoyed by the exacting listener, even, from the performance of this incomparably beautiful composition. The first movement was taken too slow, however. How vivid in the remembrance of many listeners are the wonderful performances of this overture under Mr. Gericke's conducting. It is not to be wondered at that he was called forth a half dozen or more times to acknowledge the enthusiastic delight of the audience as a unit, after each superb rendering. The playing of this overture on Saturday evening excited the most spontaneous applause that has greeted the orchestra for a long time.

One must acknowledge the mastery of Brahms over all that pertains to the science of music in the matter of development and elaboration contrapuntally of themes and movement, and the symphony in E minor is an evidence of his superior power in this direction. It must be admitted, also, that there are some charming themes and novel harmonies in this work in the first and second movements, but the work as a whole is labored and dry. It was played mostly in a too loud and rough manner by the orchestra, the coarseness of the rendering being often largely due to the excessive violence of the brass, the overblowing of which instruments was something horrible. One would not care to have the virility of Brahms's music emasculated, but discretion is better than valor in music as well as in other things. Mr. Gericke is a great lover of Brahms, and the splendid effects he brought out in his interpretation of this symphony are still clear in the writer's mind. There was nothing in the performance Saturday night, however, that would remind one of Mr. Gericke's achievements with this composition.

215

Riemenschneider's "Dance of the Dead," played in these concerts for the first time Saturday evening, showed well enough that the composer is a capable musician, but it lacked any distinguishing features to characterize it sufficiently to praise it much, if any. There was but little imagination exhibited consecutively in the idea presented.

A brilliant performance of the "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture gave delight to the audience. The repertoire of such works can be drawn upon with marked benefit to the programmes offered at these concerts.—Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the soloist next Saturday evening, and will play Rubinstein's D-minor concerto. The rest of the programme will consist of "La Carnaval Romain" overture, Berlioz; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Symphony No. 3, Schumann.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Mr. Nikisch and the Symphony Orchestra.

To the Editor of the Saturday Evening Gazette.

DEAR SIR: As you are presumably responsible for the musical criticisms which appear in your paper, may I write to you my complaint that this winter the weak points of our Symphony Orchestra have been hammered at incessantly by your critic, much to the neglect of its good points?

Now, good points it has, and it has seemed to others, if not to your critic, that one of those points has been the dignified behavior of its members. One had but to watch closely through the concerts given by the orchestras which have visited Boston this season, to see what some conductors will allow. Why, we should gasp to see Mr. Kneisel do what Mr. Brodsky did, and that was to leave the stage (when young Marteau came on to play a selection with an orchestral accompaniment), and, by way of leaving, to climb over the outstretched feet of the next violinist, as he would over a low, stone wall!

I think, Mr. Editor, your critic and I would be inclined to "lean back" in our chairs once in a while, if we had played in 124 concerts and rehearsals in seven months. I do not wonder that Mr. Nikisch appeared fatigued last Saturday evening, though very possibly, that was due to worry over not reaching Music Hall till after eight o'clock, owing to a delayed train.

I have attended, Mr. Editor, every Saturday evening concert in the course this winter, and not once have I seen such tittering and nudges as men permitted in one of the above-mentioned orchestras.

Another good point, although you, perhaps, will consider it a superficial one;—but I cannot agree to that—is the bearing of Mr. Nikisch when with baton in hand: no superfluous motion, no bending of the legs for extra emphasis, as if weak-kneed; no sawing the air with long arms, like val Prelude"), and the writer of an opera, "The Ice Maiden," which has never, I believe, been heard in public. The "Dance of the Dead" was his introduction to this city.

Mr. Bayes in "The Rehearsal" prepared himself for literary work in this ingenious manner: "If I am to write familiar things, as sonnets to Armida, and the like, I make use of stew'd prunes only; but when I have a grand design in hand, I even take physic, and let blood; for, when you would have pure swiftness of thought and fiery flights of fancy, you must have a care of the pensive part. In fine, you must purge the stomach."

Ernst Theodor Amadeus Hoffmann recommended Rhine wines to him that would write a mass; Burgundy to the composer of a grand opera; champagne to the writer of a comic opera; a fiery Italian wine to the author of passionate canzonets, and arrack punch to the man who thought of a second "Don Giovanni."

Fuseli ate raw pork that he might arouse his imagination.

Mr. Riemenschneider seems to have prepared himself for his task by indulging in copious draughts of flaxseed tea.

In illustration of a wild and grotesque poem by Goethe, Riemenschneider wrote music that is devoid of character. He nailed his episodes together, and at times the nails appear. He started out with conventional commonplaces, and it suddenly occurred to him that his music was without diablerie. He then bethought him of pulsatile instruments and a piccolo for spectral purposes. But beat and blow as he would, the ghosts did not obey his incantation. His dance-tune was neither mocking in its sensuousness, nor fantastic in its melody or rhythm. The thoughts were neither horrible nor grotesque, and the expression was prosaic.

However this piece by Riemenschneider serves one useful purpose: it recalls, in contrast, that masterpiece of Saint-Saens, the "Danse Macabre."

"Zig and zag and zag. Death keeps time,
Beating on a tomb with his heel;
Death plays at midnight a dance-tune,
Zig and zag and zag, on his fiddle."

The symphony of Brahms, in which masterly workmanship is more apparent than inspiration, was given with breadth and intensity.

The programme of the rehearsal and concert of this week is as follows: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; concerto for piano-forte, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Schumann's Symphony No. 3 (Rhenish), E flat. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

PHILIP HALE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

That the conductor of the Symphony concerts is a man of impulses, no one sees more clearly than himself, and he has even admitted frankly that in his interpretations a planned and intended reading not infrequently slips away from the control of his will, if a strong mood, evoked by something in the music or associated with it, interposes and sways him. In the direction of his seventeenth programme he must have been carried away often by his feelings, because nothing else could explain the extreme relaxations of tempo into which he several times sank. The concert began with the "Freischütz" overture, the opening adagio had less "linked sweetness" than "long-drawn-out"-ness, for it was taken so slowly that the beautiful and gently melting horn quartette lost its persuasiveness in the effort the players had to make to find breath enough for their usual phrases, without attempting to give uniformity and smoothness to their union. The allegro swept almost as far in the other direction, and fairly rushed to its conclusion save when some special delay upon a note or two held it back before another plunge. In the symphony, too—which was that laboriously elaborated fourth of Brahms—the tempo was slackened in all but the last movement, thus opposing the composer's directions, but giving the hearer a better chance to follow and understand and the director a longer dwelling in his lingering mood. Yet be it understood that with this exception taken to the tempo, there could be no special criticism brought against either the technical handling of the parts or the energy and earnestness of the reading. After the Brahms came a kind of ghost story in music—a "Todtendanz"—by George Riemenschneider, which added nothing to the value of the concert, although it will count as one more in the list of the season's novelties. There is some fancy in it, but of the rather deliberate and intentional sort, and it has some clattering and rattling and some whistling shrieks of the piccolo. But it is not to be mentioned in the same epoch with Saint-Saens's unrivalled "Danse Macabre," gloomy and impressive with its wild, persistent voice of the viola and its swift, weird dispersion of the gaunt, fleshless revellers whom the strange, compulsive strain has summoned. The evening ended with a brilliant but rather too exhilarated rendering of Nicolai's bright, gay and elegant "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture.

Tonight there will be no novelty. The symphony will be Schumann in E-flat—the "Rhenish"—and the overture, Berlioz's "Roman Carnival." Between these stand the "Siegfried Idyl" of Wagner and Rubinstein's D-minor pianoforte concerto, to be played by that able and passionate artist, Mme. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler.

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Concert.

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall, Saturday evening. The following is the programme:

Overture, "Der Freischütz," Weber; Symphony No. 4, in E-minor, Brahms; "The Dance of the Dead," Riemenschneider; overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai.

One of the most commendable performances of the orchestra since the advent of the present incumbent of the conductor's position, was the playing of the Weber overture on Saturday evening. The strings were simply perfect, the wood wind in good tune and the brass less violent than usual, but still too loud and coarse.

Of course it is not expected that the first clarinet will always play in perfect tune, or that the tympani player will ever have his drums correctly tuned, but nevertheless much pleasure was enjoyed by the exacting listener, even, from the performance of this incomparably beautiful composition. The first movement was taken too slow, however. How vivid in the remembrance of many listeners are the wonderful performances of this overture under Mr. Gericke's conducting. It is not to be wondered at that he was called forth a half dozen or more times to acknowledge the enthusiastic delight of the audience as a unit, after each superb rendering. The playing of this overture on Saturday evening excited the most spontaneous applause that has greeted the orchestra for a long time.

One must acknowledge the mastery of Brahms over all that pertains to the science of music in the matter of development and elaboration contrapuntally of themes and movement, and the symphony in E minor is an evidence of his superior power in this direction. It must be admitted, also, that there are some charming themes and novel harmonies in this work in the first and second movements, but the work as a whole is labored and dry. It was played mostly in a too loud and rough manner by the orchestra, the coarseness of the rendering being often largely due to the excessive violence of the brass, the overblowing of which instruments was something horrible. One would not care to have the virility of Brahms's music emasculated, but discretion is better than valor in music as well as in other things. Mr. Gericke is a great lover of Brahms, and the splendid effects he brought out in his interpretation of this symphony are still clear in the writer's mind. There was nothing in the performance Saturday night, however, that would remind one of Mr. Gericke's achievements with this composition.

Riemenschneider's "Dance of the Dead," played in these concerts for the first time Saturday evening, showed well enough that the composer is a capable musician, but it lacked any distinguishing features to characterize it sufficiently to praise it much, if any. There was but little imagination exhibited consecutively in the idea presented.

A brilliant performance of the "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture gave delight to the audience. The repertoire of such works can be drawn upon with marked benefit to the programmes offered at these concerts.—Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the soloist next Saturday evening, and will play Rubinstein's D minor concerto. The rest of the programme will consist of "La Carnaval Romain" overture, Berlioz; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner, and Symphony No. 3, Schumann.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Mr. Nikisch and the Symphony Orchestra.

To the Editor of the Saturday Evening Gazette.

DEAR SIR: As you are presumably responsible for the musical criticisms which appear in your paper, may I write to you my complaint that this winter the weak points of our Symphony Orchestra have been hammered at incessantly by your critic, much to the neglect of its good points?

Now, good points it has, and it has seemed to others, if not to your critic, that one of those points has been the dignified behavior of its members. One had but to watch closely through the concerts given by the orchestras which have visited Boston this season, to see what some conductors will allow. Why, we should gasp to see Mr. Kneisel do what Mr. Brodsky did, and that was to leave the stage (when young Marteau came on to play a selection with an orchestral accompaniment), and, by way of leaving, to climb over the outstretched feet of the next violinist, as he would over a low, stone wall!

I think, Mr. Editor, your critic and I would be inclined to "lean back" in our chairs once in a while, if we had played in 124 concerts and rehearsals in seven months. I do not wonder that Mr. Nikisch appeared fatigued last Saturday evening, though very possibly, that was due to worry over not reaching Music Hall till after eight o'clock, owing to a delayed train.

I have attended, Mr. Editor, every Saturday evening concert in the course this winter, and not once have I seen such tittering and nudges as men permitted in one of the above-mentioned orchestras.

Another good point, although you, perhaps, will consider it a superficial one;—but I cannot agree to that—is the bearing of Mr. Nikisch when with baton in hand: no superfluous motion, no bending of the legs for extra emphasis, as if weak-kneed; no sawing the air with long arms, like a wounded bird trying desperately to rise on wing. A careless observer would say there was not enough motion and emotion in the conducting of Mr. Nikisch to incite his men to highest action; but let that observer for once be less careless, and he will see concentrated power and magnetism in the quiet pose and steady hand. I have yet to see Mr. Nikisch fail to get a tremendous tour de force, or sudden emphasis, or quick tempo, if he so minded.

216

As I more than have hinted above, the bearing of a conductor seems to me of considerable importance. It is wearying to the spectator to see gymnastics on the conductor's stand, and moppings of brow; to see a conductor "make faces," as the children say, first to his fluteist, when it is time for a bit of a solo, then to the horns when they should come in, and, finally, with worst face of all, and arms on high, like a Dutch windmill, to the drums.

Oh, I have thanked over and over again the Fates, that they made Mr. Nikisch not that kind, thus giving us hearers and onlookers golden opportunities to digest good music, without such usual, I had almost said, distraction.

One more opinion as to our orchestra's worth will be of value, and that is of no less a person than Paderewski. Why should he have been so delighted with their work, if it were poor work? Is he not a good judge?

Of course, there is but one Mr. Gericke, but he has decidedly his limitations in this very modern day; and, by the way, did not the arduous work he did with this orchestra (perhaps, climate had a small share of responsibility) very nearly kill him?

But, if we cannot have Mr. Gericke, what then—is there no balm in Gilead? KAY.

Our correspondent undoubtedly meant well in addressing this letter to us; but, unfortunately, she has failed to make wholly clear the exact point at which she wished to arrive. She takes us to task for stating last week that some of the orchestra took their playing very leisurely, by leaning back in their chairs, and then excuses them on the ground that they have performed in one hundred and twenty-four concerts and rehearsals in seven months. This, however, does not provide any evidence that we stated what was untrue. Moreover, the orchestra has not, as yet, given as many concerts as are named by our censor, and their season is only five months old, instead of seven. As for Mr. Brodsky, he is the solo concert-master of the Dambrosch Orchestra, and his disappearance from the stage during the playing of M. Marteau, was doubtless by reason of an agreement, common enough under similar circumstances, that he should not be called on to play in the accompaniments, to any other soloist. As for the manner of his leaving, it was probably a case of necessity, owing to the crowded state of the stage, and there was nothing remarkable in it. If he had climbed over the head of the next violinist, as over a high stone wall, the case would have been otherwise. As we said nothing regarding the fatigued appearance of Mr. Nikisch, we do not feel called upon to make any explanation in that connection. As for the "tittering and nudges" to which our correspondent refers so reproachfully, we must say that if she has not seen similar tittering, if not nudging, in our orchestra, her attention could not have been deeply centered on the performers. But here, again, she has touched on a point to which we made no allusion. Nor did we comment on the bearing of Mr. Nikisch, and therefore her references to the bending of the legs, weak knees, sawing the air with long arms, gymnastics on the conductor's stand, moppings of the brow, or giving signals to the flautist or the horn player, seem to us wholly irrelevant not to say superfluous. "The lady doth protest too much, methinks." Of course it is desirable that the personal peculiarities of a conductor should not come between the public and an enjoyment of the music he is directing; but after all, something in the way of eccentricity may be conceded to one who produces the best possible effect with the players under his control; and for our own part, we should much prefer the conductor afflicted with a bent leg and a weak knee and a brow-mopping habit, who vouchsafes a perfect reading and an adequate performance of a great work, to the conductor whose legs and knees remain unobtrusive, while he gives an unsatisfying interpretation and an inadequate performance of the same work. It is a matter of results achieved, and not of a conductor's personality. When Paganini first appeared, and revolutionized the art of violin playing, a famous soloist of the old school, one Keyswetter, if we are not mistaken, exclaimed: "Why, the fellow is no artist; he plays with a stiff bow-arm!" Then somebody replied: "If you can do as well with a stiff bow-arm, nobody will find any fault. It is certain, however, that you do not equal him, even with a free bow-arm." It is what is accomplished, and not how it is accomplished, that is entitled to first consideration in matters of art. As far as "no less a person than Paderewski" is concerned, it may be conceded that his opinion of our orchestra's worth was sincere; but what then? He is a magnificent pianist; but that does not make him an infallible authority on orchestral performances. Our correspondent asks, "Is he not a good judge?" The only possible reply is, that if Paderewski finds nothing to condemn in much of the conductor's interpreting and much of the orchestra's playing, he is not a good judge. The work he approved of was work that pleased him, and may have been good work; but he has only heard two or three, or, at the most, a half-dozen performances by the orchestra, and it is impossible for him to answer for what he has not heard. The fact that Mr. Nikisch is fatigued with overwork, and that Mr. Gericke was nearly killed by it, has no bearing whatever on Mr. Nikisch's conducting or on that of the performances of the orchestra. Our correspondent, as it seems to us, does not controvert our critic; on the contrary, she rather endorses him, by giving a reason for the shortcomings which he has complained. Mr. Nikisch may be credited with perfect artistic sincerity of purpose in all that he has undertaken here, but he has made it clear that he is not at his best as a conductor of purely orchestral music. His method is so thoroughly impregnated with operative feeling that he imparts the tone of the opera to almost everything he interprets. This is eminently out of place in the more classic music written for the concert room. We read that he has been called to fill the place of musical director of the opera house at Buda-Pesth. We congratulate him, sincerely, on the appointment. In such an establishment he will be wholly in his element and can hardly fail to win deserved success and appreciation.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 11, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

HECTOR BERLIOZ.	OVERTURE. "Le Carnaval Romain." op. 9.
ANTON RUBINSTEIN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in D minor. No. 4, op. 70. I. Moderato. D Minor. II. Moderato assai. F major. III. Allegro assai. D minor.
RICHARD WAGNER.	SIEGFRIED IDYL.
ROBERT SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, op. 9. (Rhenish). I. Lebhaft. E flat major. II. Scherzo: Sehr maessig. C major. III. Nicht schnell. A flat major. IV. Feierlich. E flat minor. V. Lebhaft. E flat major.

SOLOIST:

MME. FANNY BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Berlioz: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Opus 9.
Rubinstein: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Opus 76.

Wagner: Siegfried-Idyll.
Schumann: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Rhenish"), Opus 97.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist.

Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" went with great spirit and force of accent; it was taken at just the rushing pace the composer must have wished for. The introductory Andante sostenuto was given with great delicacy and clearness.

Schumann's third symphony went exceedingly well, too; the first movement was taken at a good, brisk pace, as nearly as possible as Schumann marked it. The syncopations in the theme, too, were brought out with fine sureness of accent, without being overdone. In the second theme the wood-wind performed an actual tour de force in making a short crescendo followed immediately by piano; seldom have we heard this done more nicely. The four horns did nicely in that superb heralding of the return of the first theme at the beginning of the third part of the movement, and the theme itself was taken up by the orchestra in a double-fortissimo that did one good to hear. What a superb movement it is! With what unflagging vigor Schumann has carried through his magnificent theme! Here, too, one finds an appositeness in the orchestration, a harmony between form and color, such as even the greatest masters of scoring could not have surpassed. Looking at the orchestration by itself alone, one might perhaps find that Schumann had done a trifle too much with his horns, that the orchestra was somewhat too much charged with horn tone; but even in this matter Schumann has rather followed Beethoven's lead—look, for instance, at some of the fortissimo passages in the first movement of the seventh symphony—than forestalled the more modern composers, with many of whom the quartet of horns forms too constantly the real centre of gravity of the whole orchestra. And his horn tone is here eminently in place. Give this movement to any one you please of the present masters of orchestration, and let him re-score it; he might give it more volume of tone, a superior flash and glow of color, a more incisive brilliancy, but he would not make its form, outline and color go so beautifully hand in hand. Pick flaws in Schumann's orchestration as you will—and it often lays itself undeniably open to that—you find it, in the end, wonderfully well adapted to his purpose, wonderfully well able to help him say what he meant to say. The second and third movements were very sympathetically played, if one could have desired something more of technical perfection of finish. The grand "cathedral-scene" (third movement) was superbly given; it is in movements of this character that Mr. Nikisch is fairly at his best, and, when he is at his best, he is wellnigh incomparable. One might question his reading of the eighth-note after the double-dotted half, in the two great forte and fortissimo calls on the wind instruments just before the close of the movement; he gives the eighth-note its exact value—possibly just a thought more than this; but there is a tradition that a double-dotted note is, in every case, to be followed by the shortest possible note, and that the exact fractional value of each is to be disregarded. This is, to be sure, a matter open to considerable freedom of interpretation; but in this case we prefer a very short eighth-note; it is more in harmony with the character of the here strikingly prominent trumpets and trombones; it has a sharper bite to it. The finale was admirably played, and the peroration, in which the principal figure of the "cathedral-scene" returns in E-flat major, worked up with tremendous power.

Wagner's beautiful and poetic "Siegfried-Idyll" was given wellnigh to perfection. Mr. Nikisch reads it in a way to give its wondrous variety of mood and coloring full play, while he makes its musical coherency so plain as to forbid all tediousness of impression. The well-balanced prominence he gives to every phrase of real thematic importance is a notable factor in this. Only we missed our blithe "canary-chirping" (sixth measure on page twenty-nine of the full score); since Mr. Zarrahn first conducted the piece here, we have not heard this picturesque effect duly brought out.

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler carried everything before her in the Rubinstein concerto. We are quite willing to admit that we are growing reconciled to this work of Rubinstein's. The working-out of the first movement cannot be called masterly by any serious standard; Rubinstein was never strong in this matter. But the exposition in the first part of the movement is masterly; nothing could be clearer nor more concise; the themes lead, one into another, with perfect naturalness; up to the second theme they constantly grow in passionate intensity, while the idyllic suavity of the second subsidiary, with its almost playful accompanying figure on the pianoforte, forms just the desired contrast and gives passion breathing-time before the strenuous passages in the working-out. Then the themes themselves are of admirable quality. The super-sentimental slow movement we still heartily dislike; but the vim and go of the final rondo, its unflagging brilliancy, and the many beautiful effects of color and modulation in it, make it really exciting to listen to, while, as a piece of musical form, it is among the very best things Rubinstein has given to the world. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler's playing of the work was simply superb. To one point we take exception: We do not like her reading of the white-hot passionate second theme (first appearing in F major) in the first movement; she seems to us to over-sentimentalize it, to distort its true character. No doubt her playing of it shows great feminine delicacy of feeling; but, if ever there were a distinctly male theme, this one is. At the climax-point of this same theme Rubinstein himself used to make an effect (not down in the score, by the way, and even contradicting the indications in the score) of the most surpassing beauty, and one which no other pianist we have ever heard has been able to imitate or to recall. But effects of this sort may be regarded as Rubinstein's sole property; they were flashes of momentary inspiration. But, with this exception, her playing of the first movement was admirable indeed. Of all pianists we can remember, she plays the second movement best. Exactly wherein her superiority lies were hard to specify; may be that just that feminine delicacy of feeling, which we found out of place in the second theme of the first movement, helps her here to veil the rather cheap bänkelsängerisch sentimentality of the theme and give it a certain semblance of artistic refinement. Certainly we have never heard it sound less obnoxious than in her hands. In the finale she was brilliancy itself, and showed forth the whole magic of some of those sudden piano effects in unexpected keys. Comparing her performance with her playing of other things in previous seasons, one finds that she has made a vast stride towards artistic mastery. She was most enthusiastically recalled after the concerto.

The next programme is: Paul Gilson, "La Mer," symphonic sketch; Raff, "La Fée d'Amour," for violin and orchestra; Goldmark, "Ländliche Hochzeit." Mr. Otto Roth will be the violinist. The date of the concert is March 25.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler appeared as piano soloist at the symphony concert yesterday, and played Rubinstein's concerto, No. 4, in D minor, a favorite piece with many pianists, and the one given by the composer on his first appearance in this city. Mrs. Zeisler's reputation as a pianist is well established in the West, and her abilities have also received warm endorsements from Boston concert-goers, who enjoyed her playing here some years ago.

The difficult Rubinstein concerto was given with wonderful sustained vitality and power and precision of touch. Her style of playing is broad and confident, and her attacks, especially in the rapid fortissimo octave runs, were bold and animated, the tempo and force being retained to the end.

The beautiful theme in the second part was most delicately and sympathetically interpreted, the running passages being rapidly and clearly given, and the hearty plaudits at the close plainly indicated the appreciation the auditors felt for the artist's brilliant work.

In the closing number Mrs. Zeisler's energy was notable, for the elaborate rush of chords for the piano was not drowned by the heavy orchestration.

Her success was undoubted, and she was recalled again and again at the close of her performance.

The Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," began the programme. The composer's treatment of the brasses and instruments of percussion is particularly effective in this piece, and these contingents of the orchestra showed to marked advantage.

The rollicking saltarello was played with fine contrasts of rhythm and dynamic force, the strings singing their charming dance music with beautiful effect.

The Schumann "Rhenish" symphony, which closed the programme, was very satisfactorily played.

The programme for next week's rehearsal and concert, March 24 and 25, will be as follows: Paul Gilson's symphonic sketches for orchestra, "The Sea," "Le Fée d'Amour," for violin and orchestra by Raff, and Goldmark's symphony, "A Rustic Wedding."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday was slightly longer than usual, but was made up of interesting material from first to last. Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture began the concert. It was given a vigorous reading, and spite of the capricious effects, the orchestra was kept well in hand. The English horn solo at the beginning of the work was especially well played, and so were the viola passages which followed it. These passages breathe a tender melancholy that is peculiarly suited to the character of the instruments employed. There is contrast here, even in similarity, for the English horn pictures a dreamy sadness, as the viola does, but the change from wind to string tone prevents anything like sameness. After the serenade the revelry seems to burst forth in wildest fashion. It takes considerable technique to give the chromatic runs which usher in this hurly-burly without blurring, yet this passage was clearly played on this occasion. But the work is as spasmodic as its composer was, and, spite of its gaudy colors, it remains a thing of shreds and patches.

This is one great point of difference between Berlioz and Wagner in orchestral treatment: when the former attains even the greatest effects one feels the effort behind them, all is spasmodic and artificial, while the ability to sustain a high level is one of the characteristics of the German composer. Had Berlioz composed 1000 years he could not have attained the equality (to say nothing of the power) of the first act of "Die Walküre" or the last of "Die Meistersinger."

Yet Wagner was presented on the programme of this concert at a disadvantage; the "Siegfried Idylle" was a most charming birthday surprise for Mme. Wagner. Nothing more charming than the secret composition, the smuggling of the orchestra into the house, the placing the musicians along the stairway leading to the chamber, and the presentation of the poem explaining the purport of the music, can be imagined; but the very exigencies of the case militated against the conditions of the concert room: the orchestra was of necessity a small one, the scoring light, the themes (chiefly the "Melody of Peace" and "Siegfried, the World's Treasure") require explanation, and the entire work can appeal powerfully only to the initiated Wagnerian. The Swiss musicians who participated in the performance playfully called the work "Treppen-musik" (stairway music), and, truth to tell, its fullest power lay in the circumstances and surroundings of that first performance. Yet there are beautiful touches in it, even though the effect of the same themes in their place in the operas is not attained. It was a poetic thought to intertwine the melody of Peace with that of Siegfried (in augmentation) as a final phrase, for these two themes taken from the operas of "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," here typify Wagner's happiness in his Brunnhilde (Cosima Wagner) and his only child, Siegfried, and the lines in the poem which originally accompanied the music:—

And in the cadence I have held united Siegfried, our dearly-cherished son, and thee, make the intention very clear. But all of this was lost on the auditor who listened to the work as pure music, and while the figure treatment is very ingenious and the performance was very good, the composition did not do full justice to the great composer. There were some startling liberties taken with the first phrases, a very bold and extended ritenuto being introduced.

If Wagner's compositions are sometimes autobiographical, Schumann's almost invariably are, and if the B flat symphony speaks of the sunburst of happiness in the life of the composer, the one in E flat, which was performed on this occasion, tells us no less certainly of the last flickerings of that happiness, when the musician came to feel the charm of the Rhine-life, and was excited by the hearty ways of the dwellers in Dusseldorf and Cologne. Yet Schumann was never able to enter heartily into rollicking humor or joviality; even in this work the scherzo has the form but not the spirit of such a movement. There is mystery, tenderness, sweetness here, but not a trace of that playful abandon which Mendelssohn was able to portray so successfully, or of the grotesqueness in which Beethoven so frequently indulged. To the writer the two last movements seem the most striking, partly no doubt because of their graphic contrast. The effect of the trombone passages in the cathedral scene (the fourth movement) is that of a mighty organ in some old Catholic theme, and the chatter and vivacity of the finale (a nearer approach to the spirit of the scherzo is found in this than in the second movement) has been well compared to the holiday spirit which is apparent in the streets of Cologne when the crowd pours forth from the grand old edifice. The work was given in proper spirit and would have made a greater effect had not the audience been somewhat wearied with an exceptionally long programme. As it was, the organ theme seemed to be accepted as a sort of closing voluntary or postlude, to cover the footsteps of the departing congregation.

It remains to speak of an excellent soloist. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist, and she played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a manner calling only for commendation. A few mannerisms, such as the throwing about of the hands in an unnecessary fashion (and this might have been copied from Rubinstein himself) or an occasional excess of power, might be commented on, but the work as a whole, was played in a manner that places the artist in the front rank of female pianists. The ensemble was undisturbed throughout, and the shading of the second movement was especially commendable. Best of all was the fact that while there was abundant display of technique, it was made only the means to an end, the pianist entering into the spirit of the work in a manner that caused one to forget technicalities. She was recalled many times at the close of the concerto. There is one point in the instrumentation of the third movement of this concerto that shows that Rubinstein has taken a lesson of Berlioz. In the "Child Harold" symphony Berlioz imitates the tone of heavy and light bells by twangs of the harp, followed first by tones of the horn, and then by higher notes on clarinette and flute. Nothing closer to the reverberations of bells can be imagined. In this concerto Rubinstein produces a similar effect, but the impact of the bell-hammer is now given by violin pizzicati instead of by harp. But as St. Saens struck 12 o'clock on the harp in the Danse Macabre, and as composers need bell effects once in a while, perhaps the combination falls short of plagiarism.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY.

A programme that represented Berlioz, Rubinstein, Wagner and Schumann at their worthiest, as did the programme for the eighteenth symphony concert. Music Hall, Saturday evening, March 11, would ordinarily be pronounced by musicians as respectably chosen.

It is also true that Conductor Nikisch could not have been otherwise than artistically well disposed in ranging a programme that would have inevitably encountered popular failure but for the appearance so interesting a soloist as Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler with Rubinstein's fourth concerto in D minor. Furthermore there was lively melody and abundance of it in the overture "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz, and it brightened the audience into a humor that is seldom experienced from that composer. Following the overture and concerto came the Siegfried Idyl by Wagner and the symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, by Schumann. Neither of these two works owing to the peculiar arrangement of the programme, could have been heard at its fairest advantage, and the logical result of any such arrangement was to impose a sense of weariness which was artistically prejudicial not only in its effect upon the selections themselves, but in prolonging the concert until an all too late hour.

The pianist Rubinstein has composed at least a dozen piano-forte concertos—possibly one or two more. In the concerto in D minor the genius of the solo instrument seems to have been studied above any other consideration. The Nestor of contemporaneous musicians, as has been stated, is here at his worthiest, just as was Moscheles when he wrote his now well nigh obsolete concerto in G minor. The work is intensely personal in its relation to the composer. It is musically photographic of the pianist of broad and massive brow, and in the first movement especially it even suggests his swarthy complexion of some ten or fifteen years ago, a complexion that was then more like that of a Tartar or a Turk rather than of a Russian. With the second movement comes a change of mood. The lionine roarings of the opening moderate are indeed followed by a sentimentally pastoral and well nigh lamb-like andante—not a "moderato assai," as announced on the programme. In the finale the concerto loses even such paucity of substance as its earlier movements contained, and simply fritters itself away in a tuneful play of sounds devoid of any deeper meaning. In brief, it fairly seems as though the hand of the pianist and not the genius of a composer had incited this truly Rubinsteinish concert piece, and it is difficult of belief that anyone can derive other enjoyment from the work than that which may be derived by the numerous yet not over scrupulous devotees to piano-forte playing as an end per se and not as an art.

The performance by Mme. Zeisler was overflown with subjectiveness of the most intense kind. It was appealingly sympathetic in its quieter moods, yet without an affection and sentimentality that oft had a very obscuring affect upon the real music of the concerto. Technically considered, the wealth of exacting arpeggios, broken chords, scale passages and all the essentials of true piano-forte bravura with which the concerto is permeated, was easily at the artist's fingertips, and, notably in the first and last movements, despite the fact that Mrs. Zeisler was quite fortunately unsuccessful in her apparent attempt to break all the strings in the piano, she excellently responded to the virtuosic requirement of the composer. Perhaps, on the whole, Mrs. Zeisler's performance had its most characteristic tribute in the very much noise of the applause she received.

ing of the first movement was admirable indeed. Of all pianists we can remember, she plays the second movement best. Exactly wherein her superiority lies were hard to specify; may be that just that feminine delicacy of feeling, which we found out of place in the second theme of the first movement, helps her here to veil the rather cheap, bänkelsängerisch sentimentality of the theme and give it a certain semblance of artistic refinement. Certainly we have never heard it sound less obnoxious than in her hands. In the finale she was brilliancy itself, and showed forth the whole magic of some of those sudden piano effects in unexpected keys. Comparing her performance with her playing of other things in previous seasons, one finds that she has made a vast stride towards artistic mastery. She was most enthusiastically recalled after the concerto.

The next programme is: Paul Gilson, "La Mer," symphonic sketch; Raff, "La Fée d'Amour," for violin and orchestra; Goldmark, "Ländliche Hochzeit." Mr. Otto Roth will be the violinist. The date of the concert is March 25.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler appeared as piano soloist at the symphony concert yesterday, and played Rubinstein's concerto, No. 4, in D minor, a favorite piece with many pianists, and the one given by the composer on his first appearance in this city. Mrs. Zeisler's reputation as a pianist is well established in the West, and her abilities have also received warm endorsements from Boston concert-goers, who enjoyed her playing here some years ago.

The difficult Rubinstein concerto was given with wonderful sustained vitality and power and precision of touch. Her style of playing is broad and confident, and her attacks, especially in the rapid fortissimo octave runs, were bold and animated, the tempo and force being retained to the end.

The beautiful theme in the second part was most delicately and sympathetically interpreted, the running passages being rapidly and clearly given, and the hearty plaudits at the close plainly indicated the appreciation the auditors felt for the artist's brilliant work.

In the closing number Mrs. Zeisler's energy was notable, for the elaborate rush of chords for the piano was not drowned by the heavy orchestration.

Her success was undoubted, and she was recalled again and again at the close of her performance.

The Berlioz overture, "The Roman Carnival," began the programme. The composer's treatment of the brasses and instruments of percussion is particularly effective in this piece, and these contingents of the orchestra showed to marked advantage.

The rollicking salterello was played with fine contrasts of rhythm and dynamic force, the strings singing their charming dance music with beautiful effect.

The Schumann "Rhenish" symphony, which closed the programme, was very satisfactorily played.

The programme for next week's rehearsal and concert, March 24 and 25, will be as follows: Paul Gilson's symphonic sketches for orchestra, "The Sea," "Le Fée d'Amour," for violin and orchestra by Raff, and Goldmark's symphony, "A Rustic Wedding."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday was slightly longer than usual, but was made up of interesting material from first to last. Berlioz's "Carnaval Romain" overture began the concert. It was given a vigorous reading, and spite of the capricious effects, the orchestra was kept well in hand. The English horn solo at the beginning of the work was especially well played, and so were the viola passages which followed it. These passages breathe a tender melancholy that is peculiarly suited to the character of the instruments employed. There is contrast here, even in similarity, for the English horn pictures a dreamy sadness, as the viola does, but the change from wind to string tone prevents anything like sameness. After the serenade the revelry seems to burst forth in wildest fashion. It takes considerable technique to give the chromatic runs which usher in this hurly-burly without blurring, yet this passage was clearly played on this occasion. But the work is as spasmodic as its composer was, and, spite of its gaudy colors, it remains a thing of shreds and patches.

This is one great point of difference between Berlioz and Wagner in orchestral treatment: when the former attains even the greatest effects one feels the effort behind them, all is spasmodic and artificial, while the ability to sustain a high level is one of the characteristics of the German composer. Had Berlioz composed 1000 years he could not have attained the equality (to say nothing of the power) of the first act of "Die Walküre" or the last of "Die Meistersinger."

Yet Wagner was presented on the programme of this concert at a disadvantage; the "Siegfried Idylle" was a most charming birthday surprise for Mme. Wagner. Nothing more charming than the secret composition, the smuggling of the orchestra into the house, the placing the musicians along the stairway leading to the chamber, and the presentation of the poem explaining the purport of the music, can be imagined; but the very exigencies of the case militated against the conditions of the concert room: the orchestra was of necessity a small one, the scoring light, the themes (chiefly the "Melody of Peace" and "Siegfried, the World's Treasure") require explanation, and the entire work can appeal powerfully only to the initiated Wagnerian. The Swiss musicians who participated in the performance playfully called the work "Treppen-musik" (stairway music), and, truth to tell, its fullest power lay in the circumstances and surroundings of that first performance. Yet there are beautiful touches in it, even though the effect of the same themes in their place in the operas is not attained. It was a poetic thought to intertwine the melody of Peace with that of Siegfried (in augmentation) as a final phrase, for these two themes taken from the operas of "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," here typify Wagner's happiness in his Brunnhilde (Cosima Wagner) and his only child, Siegfried, and the lines in the poem which originally accompanied the music:—

And in the cadence I have held united Siegfried, our dearly-cherished son, and thee, make the intention very clear. But all of this was lost on the auditor who listened to the work as pure music, and while the figure treatment is very ingenious and the performance was very good, the composition did not do full justice to the great composer. There were some startling liberties taken with the first phrases, a very bold and extended ritenuto being introduced.

If Wagner's compositions are sometimes autobiographical, Schumann's almost invariably are, and if the B flat symphony speaks of the sunburst of happiness in the life of the composer, the one in E flat, which was performed on this occasion, tells us no less certainly of the last flickerings of that happiness, when the musician came to feel the charm of the Rhine-life, and was excited by the hearty ways of the dwellers in Dusseldorf and Cologne. Yet Schumann was never able to enter heartily into rollicking humor or joviality; even in this work the scherzo has the form but not the spirit of such a movement. There is mystery, tenderness, sweetness here, but not a trace of that playful abandon which Mendelssohn was able to portray so successfully, or of the grotesqueness in which Beethoven so frequently indulged. To the writer the two last movements seem the most striking, partly no doubt because of their graphic contrast. The effect of the trombone passages in the cathedral scene (the fourth movement) is that of a mighty organ in some old Catholic theme, and the chatter and vivacity of the finale (a nearer approach to the spirit of the scherzo is found in this than in the second movement) has been well compared to the holiday spirit which is apparent in the streets of Cologne when the crowd pours forth from the grand old edifice. The work was given in proper spirit and would have made a greater effect had not the audience been somewhat wearied with an exceptionally long programme. As it was, the organ theme seemed to be accepted as a sort of closing voluntary or postlude, to cover the footsteps of the departing congregation.

It remains to speak of an excellent soloist. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist, and she played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a manner calling only for commendation. A few mannerisms, such as the throwing about of the hands in an unnecessary fashion (and this might have been copied from Rubinstein himself) or an occasional excess of power, might be commented on, but the work as a whole, was played in a manner that places the artist in the front rank of female pianists. The ensemble was undisturbed throughout, and the shading of the second movement was especially commendable. Best of all was the fact that while there was abundant display of technique, it was made only the means to an end, the pianist entering into the spirit of the work in a manner that caused one to forget technicalities. She was recalled many times at the close of the concerto. There is one point in the instrumentation of the third movement of this concerto that shows that Rubinstein has taken a lesson of Berlioz. In the "Child Harold" symphony Berlioz imitates the tone of heavy and light bells by twangs of the harp, followed first by tones of the horn, and then by higher notes on clarinette and flute. Nothing closer to the reverberations of bells can be imagined. In this concerto Rubinstein produces a similar effect, but the impact of the bell-hammer is now given by violin pizzicati instead of by harp. But as St. Saens struck 12 o'clock on the harp in the Danse Macabre, and as composers need bell effects once in a while, perhaps the combination falls short of plagiarism.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY.

A programme that represented Berlioz, Rubinstein Wagner and Schumann at their worthiest, as did the programme for the eighteenth symphony concert, Music Hall, Saturday evening, March 11, would ordinarily be pronounced by musicians as respectably chosen.

It is also true that Conductor Nikisch could not have been otherwise than artistically well disposed in arranging a programme that would have inevitably encountered popular failure but for the appearance so interesting a soloist as Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler with Rubinstein's fourth concerto in D minor. Furthermore there was lively melody and abundance of it in the overture "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz, and it brightened the audience into a humor that is seldom experienced from that composer. Following the overture and concerto came the Siegfried Idyl by Wagner and the symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, by Schumann. Neither of these two works owing to the peculiar arrangement of the programme, could have been heard at its fairest advantage, and the logical result of any such arrangement was to impose a sense of weariness which was artistically prejudicial not only in its effect upon the selections themselves, but in prolonging the concert until an all too late hour.

The pianist Rubinstein has composed at least a pianoforte concertos—possibly one or two more. In the concerto in D minor the genius of the solo instrument seems to have been studied above any other consideration. The Nestor of contemporaneous musicians, as has been stated, is here at his worthiest, just as was Moscheles when he wrote his now well nigh obsolete concerto in G minor. The work is intensely personal in its relation to the composer. It is musically photographic of the pianist of broad and massive brow, and in the first movement especially it even suggests his swarthy complexion of some ten or fifteen years ago, a complexion that was then more like that of a Tartar or a Turk rather than of a Russian. With the second movement comes a change of mood. The lionine roarings of the opening moderate are indeed followed by a sentimentally pastoral and well nigh lamb-like andante—not a "moderato assai," as announced on the programme. In the finale the concerto loses even such paucity of substance as its earlier movements contained, and simply fritters itself away in a tuneful play of sounds devoid of any deeper meaning. In brief, it fairly seems as though the hand of pianist and not the genius of a composer had incited this truly Rubinsteinish concert piece, and it is difficult of belief that anyone can derive other enjoyment from the work than that which may be derived by the numerous yet not over scrupulous devotees to pianoforte playing as an end per se and not as an art.

The performance by Mme. Zeisler was overflown with subjectiveness of the most intense kind. It was appealingly sympathetic in its quieter moods, yet no without an affection and sentimentality that oft had a very obscuring affect upon the real music of the concerto. Technically considered, the wealth of exacting arpeggios, broken chords, scale passages and all the essentials of true piano-forte bravura with which the concerto is permeated, was easily at the artist's fingertips, and, notably in the first and last movements, despite the fact that Mrs. Zeisler was quite fortunately unsuccessful in her apparent attempt to break all the strings in the piano, she excellently responded to the virtuosic requirement of the composer. Perhaps, on the whole, Mrs. Zeisler's performance had its most characteristic tribute in the very much noise of the applause she received.

NIKISCH TO RESIGN.

HE IS LONGING FOR A EUROPEAN REPUTATION.

The Symphony Orchestra Will Have a New Leader Unless Mr. Nikisch Can be Induced to Change His Mind—He Has Been Offered a Fine Musical Position Abroad.

Arthur Nikisch intends to resign his place as leader of the Symphony Orchestra. He will leave Boston at the end of the present musical season. This is the news that was the sensation of the musical, fashionable and artistic world of Boston last evening.

But Mr. Nikisch's mind is said to be fully made up. He has communicated his intention only to a few of his closest friends. He dislikes to go, but he has had the offer of a splendid musical position abroad. He enjoys his work in Boston and is fond of the place and his friends. But since his arrival here he has been unable to get over his longing once more to dwell in his native land.

The position abroad offered Mr. Nikisch, and which he is so desirous to accept, is the directorship of the opera at Buda-Pesth, one of the finest in Europe, and one for which Mr. Nikisch's genius fits him and which will doubtless afford his natural ambition the opportunity to develop that he craves.

Mr. Higginson, the generous patron of the famous orchestra, will undoubtedly continue his efforts to retain the man whose musical work here has excited so much enthusiasm and talk. He invited him for the whole summer to his place on the North Shore last year. He would instantly repeat this if he thought that would be effective.

The die is probably cast. Arthur Nikisch, proud as he is of his successes in America, looks forward, as the one great possible success of his career, to a notable European reputation. That is what he hopes to accomplish before he puts down his baton. Who will say that he has not already passed many mile-stones on his road toward it?

Arthur Nikisch was born at Raab, near Presburg, Oct. 12, 1855. His father being in well-to-do circumstances, young Nikisch was given an excellent education and then sent to the Conservatory of Music at Vienna. He did not study to be a pianist, or a violinist, or cornetist, or performer on any instrument in particular, but to be a musical director. All his training had this end in view. After finishing a course at the conservatory Herr Nikisch received an engagement as violinist in the orchestra of the Hof-Theater at Vienna, and from there was called to Leipzig, about 12 years ago. His rare talents secured him recognition here, and he was soon made Anton Seidl's assistant in the leadership of the orchestra of the Leipziger Stadt-Theater, which by many musical critics is considered the greatest musical organization in the world.

In 1889 his services were secured for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has fully maintained the high artistic standard which had been set by Gericke. For several years, while in Leipzig, Mr. Nikisch was the director of the Lisztverein of Leipzig, a society formed as a protest against the invincible conservatism of the Gewandhaus. In this capacity, in planning as well as in conducting its concerts, he has done much to infuse a healthy and vigorous spirit into the musical activity of the city.

In everything that pertains to his art, Nikisch is a hard student. He conducts in concert invariably without the score; his readings not only show the mastery of a thorough scholar, a clear insight and a genuinely musical conception, but they are touched as well with the fire of genius that gives to interpretation something of the dignity of creation. It is much to say, but in this respect some of his performances can be compared only with those of Richter and Bulow.

Amelie Nikisch, wife of the noted conductor, was born in Brussels, where her father was a printer and publisher for many years. She was educated there for some years, having studied music at an early age and always having been associated with the best musical people. Her father met with reverses in his business and removed to London, where he died soon after, leaving Amelie at the age of 17 to find some means of supporting her mother. This she did for some years by teaching music, going back to Germany and keeping up her studies at the same time as well as she could. She was a pupil at the Leipzig Conservatory for a time, always working hard with both the present and the future in view.

After a few years of music teaching, singing and studying, a lady who was deeply interested in the dramatic profession obtained a position for her in light opera, and she went on the stage. From that time her life was easier. It was not long before she met Herr Nikisch, and after a short courtship they were married, when she retired from the stage to assume the domestic duties for which she is so well fitted.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was nothing novel but much that was pleasing in last evening's symphony concert, the 18th of the present season's series.

The programme included Berlioz' overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9; Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto, No. 4, in D minor, op. 70; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Schumann's symphony No. 3, in E flat major ("Rhenish"), op. 9.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist whose earlier appearances here have won her a well recognized prominence, and her playing of the familiar concerto again displayed her splendid gifts as a thoroughly well equipped pianist. The grand, broad fashion in which she read the opening movement showed her abilities to fine advantage, and in the later movements her success was equally gratifying. She was listened to with great attention, and won a hearty recognition of her artistic worth, repeated recalls following the completion of her task.

The orchestra was in excellent form, and gave a particularly brilliant performance of the Berlioz overture, as well as a very pleasing interpretation of the evening's symphony.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Concerto for piano, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), in E flat, Schumann. The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. There were no novelties in the programme, which, perhaps, was not to be lamented, in view of the peculiar quality of the new works presented so far this season. When we recall "Frühlingswogen," by P. Scharwenka; the "Humoresque," by E. Humperdink; the Symphony, by E. d'Albert, and the "Todentanz," by G. Riemenschneider, and several other compositions, that have been heard here for the first time this season, we do not feel that there is much cause for grieving because we are spared more of the same kind. Still, less hackneyed selections than those of last night might not have proved wholly unwelcome. The Wagner Idyl would have been spared without giving rise to an impulse to go into deep mourning by reason of its non-appearance on the programme. Wagner has already had more than his share of these concerts this year. Seven compositions of his have been given this season. It is true that seven works of Beethoven have also been performed, so that there is no reason to complain that both masters have not been placed on an equal footing, at least, as far as the number of times their names have been seen on the programmes. Next in order comes Saint-Saëns, four of whose compositions have been played. Then come Schumann, Brahms, Berlioz and Borak, with three each. Mendelssohn has been represented by two works; Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Gade and Rubinstein have been confined to one hearing each; but in this regard they have been treated no worse than Humperdink and Riemenschneider. Nevertheless, with all due admiration for the phenomenal quantity to which these two moderns have shown their capacity to sink, we do not believe that we are extravagantly unreasonable in thinking that they might have been passed by in favor of one of the other composers who were honored by the performance of only one work; say Mozart, for instance, who has only been heard this year in the "Letter Arla," from "Don Giovanni." Seven selections from Wagner, and only one, an aria from Mozart, does seem a balance immoderately in favor of the former, particularly when we recall that these are primarily and essentially symphony concerts. But programme making, as we have had frequent occasion to observe in the past, is not among the happiest manifestations of the conductor's talents.

The Berlioz overture was brilliantly given as far as it is concerned, and was well colored; but the woodwinds gave a frequent taste of their new chronic tendency to play out of time, while the strings were not always uniform in attack, and at times were exceedingly rugged in execution. It is hardly worth while to refer again to the deterioration in the playing of the orchestra, and its steady, but certain recession from the splendid state of efficiency in which it was four years ago, and of which it now suggests scarcely a shadow. There must be a laxity of discipline somewhere, or else a want of knowledge regarding the essentials of perfect orchestral playing. Under Mr. Gericke's regime the performers sat up firmly to their work, and seemed to be absorbed in it. Under the existing regime they, for the most part, lean back in their chairs and take their ease leisurely, as if they were acquitting themselves of their tasks automatically, and had no especial interest in them. The Idyl was carefully and judiciously read, and was played with smoothness and finish. It was, on the whole, the most satisfying performance of the evening. The symphony was overelaborated in point of expression, and was now and then given with a boisterous noisiness which, it would seem, the conductor considers to be an indispensable quality in the interpretation of Schumann. The tempi were dealt with as if the work were of an operative nature, and no opportunity to emphasize and effect by retarding or hastening the time were to be lost. This excess of sentiment, obstinately persevered in through a long work, becomes at last cloying, wearisome and irritating, not to speak of the commonplace conventionality it impresses on a lofty composition. It will not do to fasten a sensuous Wagner color on every composer. Mrs. Zeisler's performance of the concerto was remarkable in its virility and its passionateness. It was an admirable display of technique, and the reading was large in style, wholly in keeping with the character of the work, and tempered by keen artistic intelligence. Now and then there was an excess of force in striking the keys, but on the whole, the performance may be cordially and justly praised. The artist was vigorously applauded and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: "La Mer," Symphonic Sketches, by Paul Gilson, (first time); "La Fée d'Amour," for violin, by Raff, and Goldmark's "A Rustic Wedding," symphony. The soloist is to be Mr. Otto Roth.

The Eighteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte, D minor No. 4, Rubinstein
Siegfried Idyl, Wagner
Symphony No. 3, E flat major, Schumann

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler was the pianist.

According to the programme-book, Rubinstein was born Nov. 30, 1830. The same date is given in certain music lexicons. But Rubinstein in his Autobiography declares that he was born in 1829, and the birthday was the 28th of November. Eugen Zabel, the latest biographer of the composer-pianist, confirms Rubinstein's impression. The translator of the Autobiography into English did not make allowance for the Russian reckoning, and so it is stated in the translation that the birthday was the 16th. The right date is undoubtedly Nov. 28, 1829.

The feature of the concert was the performance of the familiar concerto of Rubinstein by Mrs. Zeisler. Mrs. Zeisler played like a man; not like a little man, but like a robust and bearded creature rejoicing in his strength. Her technique was above reproach, and there is no need of looking at her from the strictly pedagogical point of view. From the æsthetic standpoint her performance was one of remarkable passion. The pianoforte and the fingers of the player were simply servants of a hot and consuming temperament.

Now, this temperament possessed so thoroughly the woman that there was no need of superficial and annoying manifestations of it. Yet there were tossings of arms aloft; there was facial italicizing of deep-seated emotions. All this was unnecessary. The volcano that sweeps away a village does not cry out to the dismayed inhabitants, "come here and feel my pulse. Is this not enough for you?"

In spite of strength that occasionally de-

NIKISCH TO RESIGN.

HE IS LONGING FOR A EUROPEAN REPUTATION.

The Symphony Orchestra Will Have a New Leader Unless Mr. Nikisch Can be Induced to Change His Mind—He Has Been Offered a Fine Musical Position Abroad.

Arthur Nikisch intends to resign his place as leader of the Symphony Orchestra. He will leave Boston at the end of the present musical season. This is the news that was the sensation of the musical, fashionable and artistic world of Boston last evening.

But Mr. Nikisch's mind is said to be fully made up. He has communicated his intention only to a few of his closest friends. He dislikes to go, but he has had the offer of a splendid musical position abroad. He enjoys his work in Boston and is fond of the place and his friends. But since his arrival here he has been unable to get over his longing once more to dwell in his native land.

The position abroad offered Mr. Nikisch, and which he is so desirous to accept, is the directorship of the opera at Buda-Pesth, one of the finest in Europe, and one for which Mr. Nikisch's genius fits him and which will doubtless afford his natural ambition the opportunity to develop that he craves.

Mr. Higginson, the generous patron of the famous orchestra, will undoubtedly continue his efforts to retain the man whose musical work here has excited so much enthusiasm and talk. He invited him for the whole summer to his place on the North Shore last year. He would instantly repeat this if he thought that would be effective.

The die is probably cast. Arthur Nikisch, proud as he is of his successes in America, looks forward, as the one great possible success of his career, to a notable European reputation. That is what he hopes to accomplish before he puts down his baton. Who will say that he has not already passed many mile-stones on his road toward it?

Arthur Nikisch was born at Raab, near Presburg, Oct. 12, 1855. His father being in well-to-do circumstances, young Nikisch was given an excellent education and then sent to the Conservatory of Music at Vienna. He did not study to be a pianist, or a violinist, or cornetist, or performer on any instrument in particular, but to be a musical director. All his training had this end in view. After finishing a course at the conservatory Herr Nikisch received an engagement as violinist in the orchestra of the Hof-Theater at Vienna, and from there was called to Leipzig, about 12 years ago. His rare talents secured him recognition here, and he was soon made Anton Seidl's assistant in the leadership of the orchestra of the Leipziger Stadt-Theater, which by many musical critics is considered the greatest musical organization in the world.

In 1889 his services were secured for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has fully maintained the high artistic standard which had been set by Gericke. For several years, while in Leipzig, Mr. Nikisch was the director of the Lisztverein of Leipzig, a society formed as a protest against the invincible conservatism of the Gewandhaus. In this capacity, in planning as well as in conducting its concerts, he has done much to infuse a healthy and vigorous spirit into the musical activity of the city.

In everything that pertains to his art, Nikisch is a hard student. He conducts in concert invariably without the score; his readings not only show the mastery of a thorough scholar, a clear insight and a genuinely musical conception, but they are touched as well with the fire of genius that gives to interpretation something of the dignity of creation. It is much to say, but in this respect some of his performances can be compared only with those of Richter and Bulow.

Amelie Nikisch, wife of the noted conductor, was born in Brussels, where her father was a printer and publisher for many years. She was educated there for some years, having studied music at an early age and always having been associated with the best musical people. Her father met with reverses in his business and removed to London, where he died soon after, leaving Amelie at the age of 17 to find some means of supporting her mother. This she did for some years by teaching music, going back to Germany and keeping up her studies at the same time as well as she could. She was a pupil at the Leipzig Conservatory for a time, always working hard with both the present and the future in view.

After a few years of music teaching, singing and studying, a lady who was deeply interested in the dramatic profession obtained a position for her in light opera, and she went on the stage. From that time her life was easier. It was not long before she met Herr Nikisch, and after a short courtship they were married, when she retired from the stage to assume the domestic duties for which she is so well fitted.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was nothing novel but much that was pleasing in last evening's symphony concert, the 18th of the present season's series.

The programme included Berlioz' overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9; Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto, No. 4, in D minor, op. 70; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," and Schumann's symphony No. 3, in E flat major ("Rhenish"), op. 9.

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, a pianist whose earlier appearances here have won her a well recognized prominence, and her playing of the familiar concerto again displayed her splendid gifts as a thoroughly well equipped pianist. The grand, broad fashion in which she read the opening movement showed her abilities to fine advantage, and in the later movements her success was equally gratifying. She was listened to with great attention, and won a hearty recognition of her artistic worth, repeated recalls following the completion of her task.

The orchestra was in excellent form, and gave a particularly brilliant performance of the Berlioz overture, as well as a very pleasing interpretation of the evening's symphony.

TIGHT BINDING

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; Concerto for piano, D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; Symphony No. 3 ("Rhenish"), in E-flat, Schumann. The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. There were no novelties in the programme, which, perhaps, was not to be lamented, in view of the peculiar quality of the new works presented so far this season. When we recall "Frühlingswogen," by P. Scharwenka; the "Humoresque," by E. Humperdink; the Symphony, by E. d'Albert, and the "Todtentanz," by G. Riemenschneider, and several other compositions, that have been heard here for the first time this season, we do not feel that there is much cause for grieving because we are spared more of the same kind. Still, less hackneyed selections than those of last night might not have proved wholly unwelcome. The Wagner Idyl would have been spared without giving rise to an impulse to go into deep mourning by reason of its non-appearance on the programme. Wagner has already had more than his share of these concerts this year. Seven compositions of his have been given this season. It is true that seven works of Beethoven have also been performed, so that there is no reason to complain that both masters have not been placed on an equal footing, at least, as far as the number of times their names have been seen on the programmes. Next in order comes Saint-Saëns, four of whose compositions have been played. Then come Schumann, Brahms, Berlioz and Bruckner, with three each. Mendelssohn has been represented by two works; Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Gade and Rubinstein have been confined to one hearing each; but in this regard they have been treated no worse than Humperdink and Riemenschneider. Nevertheless, with all due admiration for the phenomenal ability to which these two moderns have shown their capacity to sink, we do not believe that we are extravagantly unreasonable in thinking that they might have been passed by in favor of one of the other composers who were honored by the performance of only one work; say Mozart, for instance, who has only been heard this year in the "Letter Arie," from "Don Giovanni." Seven selections from Wagner, and only one, an opera aria from Mozart, does seem a balance immoderately in favor of the former, particularly when we recall that these are primarily and essentially symphony concerts. But programme making, as we have had frequent occasion to observe in the past, is not among the happiest manifestations of the conductor's talents.

The Berlioz overture was brilliantly given as far as it is concerned, and was well colored; but the woodwind gave a frequent taste of their now chronic tendency to play out of time, while the strings were not always uniform in attack, and at times were exceedingly ragged in execution. It is hardly worth while to refer again to the deterioration in the playing of the orchestra, and its steady, but certain recession from the splendid state of efficiency in which it was four years ago, and of which it now suggests scarcely a shadow. There must be a laxity of discipline somewhere, or else a want of knowledge regarding the essentials of perfect orchestral playing. Under Mr. Gericke's regime the performers sat up firmly to their work, and seemed to be absorbed in it. Under the existing regime they, for the most part, lean back in their chairs and take their ease leisurely, as if they were acquitting themselves of their tasks automatically, and had no especial interest in them. The Idyl was carefully and judiciously read, and was played with smoothness and finish. It was, on the whole, the most satisfying performance of the evening. The symphony was overelaborated in point of expression, and was now and then given with a boisterous noisiness which, it would seem, the conductor considers to be an indispensable quality in the interpretation of Schumann. The tempi were dealt with as if the work were of an operative nature, and no opportunity to emphasize and effect by retarding or hastening the time were to be lost. This excess of sentiment, obstinately persevered in through a long work, becomes at last cloying, wearisome and irritating, not to speak of the commonplace conventionality it impresses on a lofty composition. It will not do to fasten a sensuous Wagner color on every composer. Mrs. Zeisler's performance of the concerto was remarkable in its virility and its passionateness. It was an admirable display of technique, and the reading was large in style, wholly in keeping with the character of the work, and tempered by keen artistic intelligence. Now and then there was an excess of force in striking the keys, but on the whole, the performance may be cordially and justly praised. The artist was vigorously applauded and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: "La Mer," Symphonic Sketches, by Paul Gilson, (first time); "La Fée d'Amour," for violin, by Raff, and Goldmark's "A Rustic Wedding," symphony. The soloist is to be Mr. Otto Roth.

The Eighteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte, D minor No. 4, Rubinstein
Siegfried Idyl, Wagner
Symphony No. 3, E flat major, Schumann

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler was the pianist.

According to the programme-book, Rubinstein was born Nov. 30, 1830. The same date is given in certain music lexicons. But Rubinstein in his Autobiography declares that he was born in 1829, and the birthday was the 28th of November. Eugen Zabel, the latest biographer of the composer-pianist, confirms Rubinstein's impression. The translator of the Autobiography into English did not make allowance for the Russian reckoning, and so it is stated in the translation that the birthday was the 16th. The right date is undoubtedly Nov. 28, 1829.

The feature of the concert was the performance of the familiar concerto of Rubinstein by Mrs. Zeisler. Mrs. Zeisler played like a man; not like a little man, but like a robust and bearded creature rejoicing in his strength. Her technique was above reproach, and there is no need of looking at her from the strictly pedagogical point of view. From the æsthetic standpoint her performance was one of remarkable passion. The pianoforte and the fingers of the player were simply servants of a hot and consuming temperament.

Now, this temperament possessed so thoroughly the woman that there was no need of superficial and annoying manifestations of it. Yet there were tossings of arms aloft; there was facial italicizing of deep-seated emotions. All this was unnecessary. The volcano that sweeps away a village does not cry out to the dismayed inhabitants, "come here and feel my pulse. Is this not enough for you?"

In spite of strength that occasionally degenerated into mere force, in spite of passion that at times was hysteria, the performance was one of power and beauty. It combined virility and feminine delicacy. And there were supreme moments, native moments, when a mighty individuality found full expression in the fiery delivery of fiery thoughts and fiery aspirations.

The performance of the orchestral numbers was of uneven merit. The "Siegfried Idyl" was read with intelligence and played with discretion. The overture was given with spirit, which, however, did not atone for untunefulness and lack of precision.

The performance of the Symphony may be best characterized by the word boisterous. Some time ago—I regret that I cannot recall the exact date—the discovery was made in New York that Mr. Nikisch is the greatest living interpreter of the orchestral compositions of Schumann. This utterance of a foreign oracle was, it is true, unaccompanied by any violent perturbation of Nature, such as thunder in a clear sky, or a disappearance of the sun at high noon. The compliment paid to the leader of our orchestra brought in its train a grave responsibility—the necessity of living up to the reputation.

Now Mr. Nikisch is a man of undoubted musical talent. His nature is emotional, dramatic. His training was in the theatre, not in the concert hall. His talent, his nature, his training all lead him one way in the treatment of a symphony by Schumann. The romanticism and the intensity of Schumann appeal to him strongly; he finds that they lend themselves easily to theatrical effect and theatrical exaggeration. If he can gain these effects he is willing to sacrifice the beauty of detail.

It is not to be denied that in this manner he occasionally gains a great effect; but this constant straining after effect, and an utter contempt for dynamic values, soon bring fatigue. If a conductor constantly calls piano, forte and forte, fortissimo, there is nothing left when he arrives at a fortissimo of the composer but screaming and impotent musical frenzy.

If he frets, after the first measure, the calm and serene melody of the composer, the ear of the hearer will be dull to the cry of passion. Regularly recurring hastening and slackening of the pace, at stated intervals and without excuse or meaning, is like unto a see-saw that soon tires even those who ride at first with delight.

Saturday evening the theatrical nature of Mr. Nikisch was clearly revealed in the performance of the Symphony.

The work of Schumann was apparently played in the royal concert hall of Lorbrulgrud, the metropolis of Brobdingnag. The musical fury that would have stunned Gulliver, would undoubtedly have soothed and comforted the King and his attendants. But the music of Schumann was written for men and women of the size of Lemuel Gulliver.

It is true that Schumann was the rough and vehement Florestan; he was also the gentle, the dreamy, the poetic Eusebius, and Eusebius should be heard, even if his voice is soft and low.

There will be no concert next week. The programme of the 19th concert the 25th inst. will be as follows: "The Sea," symphonic sketches for orchestra, Paul Gilson (first time in Boston); "The Fairy of Love," for violin and orchestra, Raff; symphony, "Rustic Wedding," Goldmark.

PHILIP HALE

MARCH 13, 1893.

MUSICAL MENTION.

The Symphony Concert.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening, with the following programme: Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Berlioz; pianoforte concerto No. 4, in D minor, Rubinstein; "Siegfried Idyl," Wagner; and symphony No. 3, in E flat ("Rhenish"), Schumann. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist.

If there had been less roughness and more precision in the orchestra as a whole, and more tunefulness in the wood-wind, the playing of the Berlioz overture would not have been a bad performance on the part of the band. Compared with the usual style of the orchestra there was much to be praised in the rendering. Also had the "Siegfried Idyl" been given a lighter touch, much more effect would have been gained. There is a sort of a stereotyped pattern that goes with all the expression attempted by the present incumbent of the conductor's position.

If a scale ascends it must increase in power. If a crescendo is indicated the maximum of force must mark the climax. If a mark be f, ff, fff, or more, the degree of power is the same. The points of climax in composition after composition are inevitably lost because of a constantly recurring anticlimax, and thus the effect is left barren as regards the intention of the author.

Such effects as sempre pianissimo are almost unknown. The consequence is there is a lack of repose in about everything that is played. Such half tints of shading as the swelling from pp to p and back to pp, are never experienced. To begin with there is no pianissimo, what the orchestra produce for pianissimo is nearer the mezzo-forte of Gericke and Thomas, than the latter's piano even. This gives a coarseness to the playing that soon clogs on the listener. Take for instance the passage in E flat about half way through the "Siegfried Idyl," the violins and violas are in arpeggio, with pizzicato in the 'celli, all marked piano, the contra basses are silent, while the chords held in the wood and brass wind are marked pianissimo (except flute and oboe which are piano) with a swell indicated. Instead of a slight undulation of tone the listener experiences an exaggeration of tone that entirely submerges the string figure.

This is but one of innumerable effects that are perverted or wholly destroyed, the matter of any refinement in expression being the exception, while exaggeration and a consequent coarseness of rendering is the rule. This state of affairs has been so persistently in evidence for the past four seasons that it must be accepted as the intention of the conductor. If grace, delicacy, contrast, precision, healthy sentiment and discretion in power are elements that are of value in music, then the art has been pretty roughly handled, if not violently abused by the Symphony Orchestra under its present administration. It is unfortunate for the present incumbent that he followed the occupation of the conductor's position by Mr. Gericke, under whose training and masterly grasp the playing of the orchestra was unrivalled at home or abroad. Such a model of perfection as Mr. Gericke erected and maintained has made all the more unbearable the present degenerate standard of performance that began immediately upon Mr. Gericke's departure.

There is nothing new to say of the performance of the Schumann symphony on Saturday evening. It was uneven in tempi, over-emphasized and noisy in the performance. Schumann has to catch it nowadays; a sort of a Rugby game with his music, so to speak. If he was about here he might be induced to try suicide in the Charles as a penance for creating such a disturbance musically. Perhaps some of the listeners Saturday night may not believe it, but Schumann was a musician of the most sensitive and delicate nature. Hungarian rhapsodies were not in his line of composition. The normal limit of expression and power was sufficient for his desires.

The Rubinstein concerts in D minor has been played by about every pianist that has visited Boston but never, everything considered, better than by Alfred Gruenfeld with our orchestra a season ago. Mrs. Zeisler showed an ample technique and an earnest and spirited style. That there was much feeling exhibited in the second movement can hardly be claimed. There was also an unsteadiness in the time and lack of definition in the first and last movement in places, but on the whole it was a performance that should be praised. She was recalled twice.

The concert did not begin Saturday evening until 8.10 and it lasted until nearly 10 o'clock. This fact, taken in conjunction with the uninteresting programme and the boisterousness of the last number, made a wearisome evening. There were many empty seats and no enthusiasm, except in recognition of the soloist. There is an apparent lack of enthusiasm nowadays at these concerts, but of that we will speak another time. There will be no concert next Saturday evening, March 25 being the date of the 19th concert, when the programme will be: "The Sea," symphonic sketches by Paul Gilson; "The Fairy of Love," for violin, Raff, and Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," symphony. Mr. Otto Roth will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE MUSICAL CIRCLES of Boston have been startled by the announcement of the early withdrawal of Mr. Arthur Nikisch from the post of director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As stated in a despatch, printed in this paper, the matter is not definitely settled, but the chances seem to be that with the close of this season Mr. Nikisch will go to Europe to take charge of the Royal Opera at Buda-Pesth in Hungary. Here he will be not only on his native heath, but in an atmosphere that is peculiarly to his liking. It was as an opera conductor at Leipzig that Mr. Nikisch won the reputation that brought him the offer for Boston. Furthermore, if some of the newspaper critics speak truth, his conducting here—or his readings, if you please—of the classic symphonies have often been charged with a theatric element. It is probably an open secret that after two or three seasons longer, at the outside, there would have been no renewal of his contract with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it being the avowed purpose of the backer of the concerts to make a change in the directorship of the board every five years or so, for the sake of freshness and to prevent the growth of hampering tradition. The offer from the Hungarian capital to Mr. Nikisch was made weeks, if not months, ago, and has been known to those who had the right to know it. One reason given by Mr. Nikisch for thinking favorably of the offer from abroad is that the fatigue which the duties of the position bring is too severe and wearing. In seven months he has conducted 124 concerts and rehearsals and has travelled many miles over the country. It may be remembered that Mr. Gericke made similar complaint. Naturally Mr. Nikisch's work here has not suited everybody, and there never will come a conductor who shall not excite adverse criticism from some quarters. Nevertheless, there will be many to regret his departure, and there will be none who will not wish him every success and good fortune possible in the world.

will be held on Thursday Afternoon, to Handel and Haydn Society's Concert, on NIKISCH TO RESIGN HIS PLACE.

He Will Cease to Be Leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

Arthur Nikisch intends to resign his place as leader of the Symphony Orchestra. He will leave Boston at the end of the present musical season.

This is the news that will be the sensation of the musical, fashionable and artistic world of Boston this evening.

It is published exclusively in this afternoon's Record. It is known to less than half a dozen persons in the city.

But Mr. Nikisch's mind is said to be fully made up. He has communicated his intention only to a few of his closest friends.

He dislikes to go, but he has had the offer of a splendid musical position abroad. He enjoys his work in Boston and is fond of the place and his friends. But since his arrival here he has been unable to get over his longing once more to dwell in his native land.

Mr. Higginson, the generous patron of the famous orchestra, will undoubtedly continue his efforts to retain the man whose musical work here has excited so much enthusiasm and talk. He invited him for the whole summer to his place on the North Shore last year. He would instantly repeat this if he thought that would be effective.

Longs for a European Reputation.

The die is probably cast. Arthur Nikisch, proud as he is of his successes in America, looks forward, as the one great possible success of his career, to a notable European reputation. That is what he hopes to accomplish before he puts down his baton. Who will say that he has not already passed many mile-stones on his road toward it?

Life of Mr. Nikisch

Arthur Nikisch was born at Raab, near Presburg, Oct. 12, 1855. His father being in well-to-do circumstances, young Nikisch was given an excellent education and then sent to the Conservatory of Music at Vienna. He did not study to be a pianist, or a violinist, or cornetist, or performer on any instrument in particular, but to be a musical director. All his training had this end in view. After finishing a course at the conservatory Herr Nikisch received an engagement as violinist in the orchestra of the Hof-Theater at Vienna, and from there was called to Leipzig, about 12 years ago. His rare talents secured him recognition here, and he was soon made Anton Seidl's assistant in the leadership of the orchestra of the Leipziger Stadt-Theater, which by many musical critics is considered the greatest musical organization in the world.

In 1889 his services were secured for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has fully maintained the high artistic standard which had been set by Gericke. For several years, while in Leipzig, Mr. Nikisch was the director of the Lisztverein of Leipzig, a society formed as a protest against the invincible conservatism of the Gewandhaus. In this capacity, in planning as well as in conducting its concerts, he has done much to infuse a healthy and vigorous spirit into the musical activity of the city.

Nikisch is a Hard Student.

In everything that pertains to his art, Nikisch is a hard student. He conducts in concert invariably without the score; his readings not only show the mastery of a thorough scholar, a clear insight and a genuinely musical conception, but they are touched as well with the fire of genius that gives to interpretation something of the dignity of creation. It is much to say, but in this respect some of his performances can be compared only with those of Richter and Bulow.

Mrs. Nikisch.

Amelie Nikisch, wife of the noted conductor, was born in Brussels, where her father was a printer and publisher for many years. She was educated there for some years, having studied music at an early age and always having been associated with the best musical people. Her father met with reverses in his business and removed to London, where he died soon after, leaving Amelie at the age of 17 to find some means of supporting her mother. This she did for some years by teaching music, going back to Germany and keeping up her studies at the same time as well as she could. She was a pupil at the Leipzig Conservatory for a time, always working hard with both the present and the future in view.

After a few years of music teaching, singing and studying, a lady who was deeply interested in the dramatic profession obtained a position for her in light opera, and she went on the stage. From that time her life was easier. It was not long before she met Herr Nikisch, and after a short courtship they were married, when she retired from the stage to assume the domestic duties for which she is so well fitted.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra Resigns His Position.

It is rumored, and the rumor seems to be a fact, that Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has resigned his position.

The resignation will take effect at the end of the twelfth season of the organization.

Mr. Nikisch will, in all probability, go to Budapest, where he will have full charge of the orchestra of the opera and concert hall of that city.

Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian by birth, for he was born at Szent Miklos Oct. 12, 1855. His father was head accountant in the service of Prince Liechtenstein. Mr. Nikisch was educated in the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied composition under Dessoff and the violin under Hellmesberger. He left the Conservatory in 1874, with prizes in composition (sextet for strings) and violin playing. In 1878 he was engaged by Neumann as second conductor of the Stadt Theatre in Leipzig, and he then left Vienna, where he was busy as violinist in the Imperial Orchestra. In 1882 he was appointed first chapelmaster at Leipzig. Mr. Nikisch was called in 1889 to take the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position that was vacated by Mr. William Gericke. Mr. Nikisch's first appearance here at a Saturday evening concert was Oct. 12, 1889. During his stay in this city he has made many friends who will learn with regret of his resignation.

There are rumors already of other directors. First of all comes the name of Mr. Gericke, who gave to the orchestra the reputation that it so richly deserved. He is now in Vienna, and it is doubtful whether he could be persuaded to leave his home. If he should appear again as conductor of our orchestra his first appearance would be a memorable scene, for few are held in such respect by musicians and laymen as the modest and thoroughly capable Gericke.

There is talk of Hans Richter. Richter was born in Raab, Hungary, April 4, 1843. He studied in Vienna the horn, pianoforte and composition. In 1866-67 he was with Wagner in Luzerne. Richter was chorus director in Munich in 1868-69. In 1870 he directed the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Brussels. From 1871 to 1875 he was conductor at the National Theatre at Budapest. In 1875 he was appointed conductor of the opera and the Philharmonic concerts at Vienna. In 1876 he directed at Baireuth. For some time he has been busied with concerts in London.

Edouard Colonne of Paris is also mentioned. He was born at Bordeaux, July 23, 1838, and was a pupil of the Paris Conservatory, where he took, in 1863, the first prize for violin playing. He was then first violin of the Paris Opera, until in 1871 he founded a concert organization, the performances of which were given during the winter, first at the Odeon, afterward at the Chatelet. He is now also first conductor at the Opera. He is known throughout Europe as a conductor of the very first rank.

Felix Mottl is also mentioned. He was born Aug. 29, 1856, at Unter-St. Veit, near Vienna. He was a pupil of the Vienna Conservatory; in 1881 he was called to Carlsruhe to take charge of the opera orchestra. In 1886 he refused a call to Berlin. In the same year he directed at Baireuth with great success. Of late his health has been poor, and he has directed at rare intervals in different German cities. Mottl has written an opera "Agnes Bernauer," performed at Weimar 1880.

It is a singular and humiliating fact that no American has been mentioned or apparently thought of as successor to Mr. Nikisch.

INTERVIEW WITH MR. NIKISCH.

Special Dispatch to the Boston Journal, PHILADELPHIA, March 18. Arthur Nikisch, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was seen this evening at the Academy of Music in this city, where the orchestra was playing. Concerning his intended resignation, he said:

"It is true that I intend to resign. This work is too hard for me, and I am not in the best of health. I could not stand it much longer, for I have to give so many concerts and do so much traveling. During the past seven months I have conducted 124 great symphony concerts, besides doing an immense amount of traveling."

"My chief inducement for quitting the orchestra, however, is that I have been offered the position of director general of the Royal Opera at Buda-Pesth. I cannot state now the

228
 He offered a musician, and the position is one of the greatest honor in the profession. Hans Richter had the post before he left for Vienna, and the latest musician who held it was Count Zichy.

I have not completed all my arrangements yet, as the negotiations require some time to be approved by the Reichstag and the Ministry, it being a royal affair; but I expect to sail by June 1. I shall probably keep my position with the orchestra until Mr. Hinginson can make arrangements for my successor. I am very likely to remain with it until the end of the season. We are booked to play at the World's Fair in May, and have other engagements in the West, after which I suppose my work in America will come to an end.

As I am a Hungarian, I will be glad to return to my fatherland; but I shall also be sorry to leave the orchestra, for my relations here have been of the pleasantest. Before taking this position four years ago I was chief conductor at the Stadt Theatre in Leipzig.

MR. NIKISCH'S RESIGNATION.

He Will Go to Buda-Pesth—Gericke May Return.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has resigned the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will go to Buda-Pesth, to be director-general of the Royal Opera in that Hungarian city. Mr. Nikisch has been connected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Oct. 12, 1889. It is rumored that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the eminent conductor who made the orchestra famous and unrivalled, will return to his former position as director.

Rumor also says that Edouard Colonne of Paris may be the successor of Mr. Nikisch. Felix Mott of Bayreuth fame is also mentioned, as well as Hans Richter, the eminent Viennese conductor. There is little possibility of the latter coming, for his position in Vienna is such that he probably would not exchange it for any other in the world. It is to be hoped that Mr. Gericke is the man. Mr. Nikisch's relations with the orchestra cease with this season's concerts.

NIKISCH'S STATEMENT.

Considering an Offer from Europe.

May Leave Boston at the End of This Season.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE TRANSCRIPT.]

NEW YORK, March 14. In an interview last night in Philadelphia, after the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikisch made this statement as to the report of his return to Europe at the end of the current season:

"My leaving the Boston Orchestra is probable, but not certain. I have a splendid offer from Europe which I am considering. The whole matter is pending. My contract expires at the end of this season. If I leave it will not be because I want a European reputation. That is nonsense. I had that before I came here."

H. T. P.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 25, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|-----------------|---|
| RICHARD WAGNER. | OVERTURE. "Tannhaeuser." |
| JOACHIM RAFF. | "LA FEE D'AMOUR." Characteristic Concert Piece for Violin and Orchestra. op. 67.
(First time at these Concerts.) |
| PAUL GILSON. | "LA MER" Symphonic Sketches.
I. Lever de Soleil: Allegretto. F major.
II. Chants et Danses de Matelots: Allegro. A major.
III. Crepuscule: Allegro moderato, poco a poco piu moderato. D flat major.
(First time in Boston.) |
| KARL GOLDMARK. | SYMPHONY. "Laendliche Hochzeit." op. 23.
I. Hochzeitsmarsch: Moderato molto. E flat major.
II. Brautlied: Allegretto. B flat major.
III. Im Garten: Andante. G minor and G flat major.
IV. Tanz: Allegro molto. E flat major. |

SOLOIST:

MR. OTTO ROTH.

NOTE. Next week's Public Rehearsal will be held on Thursday Afternoon, to allow time to arrange the stage for the Handel and Haydn Society's Concert, on Good Friday Evening.

sum offered me, but it is the highest salary ever offered a musician, and the position is one of the greatest honor in the profession. Hans Richter had the post before he left for Vienna, and the latest musician who held it was Count Zichy.

"I have not completed all my arrangements yet, as the negotiations require some time to be approved by the Reichstag and the Ministry, it being a royal affair; but I expect to sail by June 1. I shall probably keep my position with the orchestra until Mr. Higinson can make arrangements for my successor, and very likely I will remain with it until the end of the season. We are booked to play at the World's Fair in May, and have other engagements in the West, after which I suppose my work in America will come to an end.

"As I am a Hungarian, I will be glad to return to my fatherland; but I shall also be sorry to leave the orchestra, for my relations here have been of the pleasantest. Before taking this position four years ago I was chief conductor at the Staats Theatre in Leipzig."

MR. NIKISCH'S RESIGNATION.

He Will Go to Buda-Pesth—Gericke May Return.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has resigned the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and will go to Buda-Pesth, to be director-general of the Royal Opera in that Hungarian city. Mr. Nikisch has been connected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since Oct. 12, 1889. It is rumored that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the eminent conductor who made the orchestra famous and unrivalled, will return to his former position as director.

Rumor also says that Edouard Colonne of Paris may be the successor of Mr. Nikisch. Felix Mott of Bayreuth fame is also mentioned, as well as Hans Richter, the eminent Viennese conductor. There is little possibility of the latter coming, for his position in Vienna is such that he probably would not exchange it for any other in the world. It is to be hoped that Mr. Gericke is the man. Mr. Nikisch's relations with the orchestra cease with this season's concerts.

NIKISCH'S STATEMENT.

Considering an Offer from Europe.

May Leave Boston at the End of This Season.

[SPECIAL DESPATCH TO THE TRANSCRIPT.]

NEW YORK, March 14. In an interview last night in Philadelphia, after the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Nikisch made this statement as to the report of his return to Europe at the end of the current season:

"My leaving the Boston Orchestra is probable, but not certain. I have a splendid offer from Europe which I am considering. The whole matter is pending. My contract expires at the end of this season. If I leave it will not be because I want a European reputation. That is nonsense. I had that before I came here."

H. T. P.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 25, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|-----------------|---|
| RICHARD WAGNER. | OVERTURE. "Tannhaeuser." |
| JOACHIM RAFF. | "LA FEE D'AMOUR." Characteristic Concert Piece for Violin and Orchestra. op. 67.
(First time at these Concerts.) |
| PAUL GILSON. | "LA MER" Symphonic Sketches.
I. Lever de Soleil: Allegretto. F major.
II. Chants et Danses de Matelots: Allegro. A major.
III. Crepuscule: Allegro moderato, poco a poco piu moderato. D flat major.
(First time in Boston.) |
| KARL GOLDMARK. | SYMPHONY. "Laendliche Hochzeit." op. 23.
I. Hochzeitsmarsch: Moderato molto. E flat major.
II. Brautlied: Allegretto. B flat major.
III. Im Garten: Andante. G minor and G flat major.
IV. Tanz: Allegro molto. E flat major. |

SOLOIST:

MR. OTTO ROTH.

NOTE. Next week's Public Rehearsal will be held on Thursday Afternoon, to allow time to arrange the stage for the Handel and Haydn Society's Concert, on Good Friday Evening.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."
Raff: "La Fée d'Amour." Characteristic concert piece for violin and orchestra, op. 67.
Gilson: "La Mer." Symphonic sketches.
Goldmark: "Ländliche Hochzeit." Symphony, op. 23.

Mr. Otto Roth was the violinist.

The "Tannhäuser" overture came in for one of the most superb performances we have ever heard; Mr. Nikisch was at his very best. The performance was a succession of splendid strokes; and yet each stroke was so felicitous, so well-timed and in harmony with the spirit of the passage in hand, that the unity of the general impression produced was only enhanced thereby. In the peroration, at the last return of the pilgrims' chant in the six brass instruments in unison, Mr. Nikisch once more brought out that tremendous effect, the novelty and impressiveness of which were so striking in his first performance of the overture here. In the third phrase of the chant, as that flaming dominant - seventh chord (D-sharp, F - double-sharp, A - sharp, C - sharp) draws near, he whips up the horns to almost superhuman exertions, so that, when the chord comes, the D-sharp and F-double-sharp in the horns sound almost as strong as the C-sharp in the trumpets and trombones and, instead of the passage sounding like a brass solo against a hardly audible accompaniment, you actually hear it in full harmony. The effect is overwhelming! From this chord onward, the peroration reminded us of an anecdote told by Wagner of Schnorr von Carolsfeld at the preliminary rehearsals of "Tristan." Schnorr complained that the great "Love-Curse" in the third act was physically impossible, unless Wagner allowed him to take it at a more rapid tempo; that to sing this terrible passage as slow as he had just been trying to do was more than human lungs and breath could stand. Wagner replied that, so far from singing it too slow, he had not sung it half slow enough, and then sang it to him himself in the way he wished it to go. A light seemed to dawn upon Schnorr, and he immediately sang the passage much slower than before, with a far greater expenditure of vocal means, but without any sign of exhaustion. Of this Wagner said that, as soon as Schnorr had really understood the passage, he could sing it, and the enormous physical exertion required vanished from his consciousness in the passionate fervor of the moment. So in this peroration to the overture of "Tannhäuser" last Saturday evening; after that tremendous chord it seemed as if flesh and blood could do no more; and yet Mr. Nikisch, by some magic, pushed his forces on, crescendo e semper più crescendo, up to the end. Nothing more stupendous in its effect could be imagined! Yet this stroke was but one among many; the holding back the orchestra at each entrance of that passionate motive on the higher strings against ascending chromatic scale—passages in the 'celli, and then gradually quickening the beat, faster and faster, until the strings launch themselves upon Tannhäuser's Song to Venus in a perfect tiger-spring was another. The playing of the magical episode where the clarinet comes in with Venus's "Geliebter, komm! Sieh' dort die Grotte." pleased us less; the clarinet played the phrase too loud and passionately; it should be played more whisperingly, sweetly, seductively. But, with this exception, the overture was played magnificently, and the audience showed plainly that they appreciated it, too, for they recalled Mr. Nikisch twice when it was over.

The new suite, "La Mer," by Paul Gilson (of which only the first three movements were given, the fourth, "Tempest," being omitted) contains a good deal that is interesting and some things that are beautiful. As a piece of instrumentation, it may be regarded as the last word, so far, of orchestral epicureanism. After looking through the score, one stands aghast at the elaborate, hair-splitting pains the young composer has been at to mix the colors on his orchestral palette. Few things in Wagner's "Nibelungen" approach this score for minuteness of orchestral detail-work. Whether the same results could have been obtained by simpler means, or not, we will not try to determine; but certainly the results are exceedingly beautiful in their way. An enormous volume and brilliancy of tone is obtained without noisiness, and many of the softer effects are positively entrancing. It is modern French orchestration of the very finest sort. As for the intrinsically musical contents of the work, that is another matter. Of the three movements given (I. "Sunrise;" II. "Sailors' Songs and Dances;" III. "Twilight") we like the third unspeakably the best. The first is a glowing bit of color, but does not show much invention. In the second Mr. Gilson has the not uncommon French failing of mistaking a magnifying glass for idealization; his sailors seem to stand twenty feet in their stockings, and do not seem to be much better fellows for it. There is something monstrous and antediluvian about the whole conception. But the "Twilight" movement does seem genuinely and beautifully poetic. That mournful little dialogue between the flute and English-horn, in 5-4 time, shows something that one is almost tempted to call genius. Upon the whole, the suite is one of the most interesting, and least repelling, French (or Belgian) things we have heard for some time. The composer is a young man who recently graduated with high honors from the Brussels Conservatoire—so we have been given to understand—and this suite of his has already won him distinguished fame in Belgium and elsewhere. Our orchestra had evidently spent great pains upon rehearsing the work, for it was most admirably played.

We are heartily tired of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding!" What did the man mean by calling it a symphony? He, an Austrian, of all things in the world! If anything in the form of variations can be found that is more tedious than the first movement, we, for one, should not like to hear it. The "Scene in the Garden" contains much that is lovely; the opening clarinet theme may even pass muster as very beautiful; but the rest is trivial at best.

Raff's "Love Fairy" left no impression upon us whatever when Sarasate played it here with

The next programme is: Tschaikowski, overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet;" Liszt, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in A major; Dvorák, scherzo capriccioso, opus 66; Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B flat major, opus 60. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni will be the pianist.

NIKISCH'S SUCCESSOR.

It was reported this morning that in all probability Herr Richter, a noted orchestral leader in London, would succeed to the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held by Arthur Nikisch, who has resigned.

Col. Henry L. Higginson, who manages the concerts, said this morning that there was no truth in the report that Herr Richter was to be angared or has been tendered the position. Furthermore, he said, he had not decided upon any one yet as Mr. Nikisch's successor.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist
Mr. Otto Roth.

The programme began with the "Tannhäuser" overture, and no one who heard this performance of the famous old composition will be inclined to dispute the statement that it has never had a better interpretation. There was a splendid virility in the work of the men throughout, and the grand climax was worked up in a magnificent fashion, the brasses giving out a solidity of tone which created the audience in almost a frenzy of excitement, and called out a spontaneous outburst of the most enthusiastic applause after the finale.

This novelty was followed by a second composition which was given its first performance in this city. "La Mer," a series of three symphonic sketches by Paul Gilson, is based upon a poem of the same title by Eddy Levis. It had its first hearing at the Concerts Populaire in Brussels recently, where its composer had just graduated from the Conservatoire. Each of the designations being "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances," and "Twilight." The first and last movements are decidedly romantic in their characteristics, and show evidences of mechanical training rather than inspiration on the part of the composer. In the second movement the composer has written some very jolly dance music, and the songs are melodious and interesting. As a whole these sketches appeal with little force to an audience having no personal interest in the composer.

The programme was ended with a splendid performance of Karl Goldmark's Rustic Wedding symphony, which was given a thoroughly interesting interpretation, and left a very pleasing impression of the evening's concert.

The 20th concert will have for its programme Tschaiowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2; Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso, Op. 66, and Beethoven's symphony in B flat, No. 4, the soloist being Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

MUSIC.

The Nineteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
 "The Love Fay," for violin and orchestra, op. 67.....Kaff
 "The Sea".....Gilson
 "Eustic Wedding" Symphony.....Goldmark
 "The Sea," by Paul Gilson, was played for the first time in this town.

The original is a set of four "symphonic sketches": "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances," "Twilight," "Storm." These scenes are poetically and musically connected in the verse of Eddy Lewis and in the music of Gilson, the illustrator of the poem. There was no explanation in the programme book of the intention of the composer; there were no extracts from the poem. Gilson's music is professedly programme-music; but the hearer was left in the dark. Viewed as absolute music, "The Sea," as announced in three scenes, appeared ill-balanced and without a climax.

And, first, who is Gilson? The name is not foreign to us. But we must cross the Atlantic in search of the composer of "La Mer."

"The Sea" was performed in Paris at a Colonne concert Jan. 15 of this year. The poem was then declaimed by the author. Barbadelette wrote this acid note concerning the composition: "The poet is a Belgian, the music is also Belgian, and so a French audience did not grasp its full purport and its characteristics."

Gilson's work was performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in December. The fourth scene was then given in full, and it made a most profound impression.

The composer and the poet of "The Sea" are realists. Let us inquire into the nature of their work. The first scene represents sunrise at sea; it contains one chief melodic subject, which, by the way, is the foundation motive of the whole work. The second scene introduces lusty dances, one of which is "La Ronde du Gabrier." Now, "gabrier" is a sort of quartermaster, or it

To attempt to pass judgment on the work as it was given Saturday—or, rather, as it was not given—would be unfair, even if it were possible. Yet it may be said that "The Sea" is the most important of the novelties presented thus far during the present season of these concerts. It is important on account of its realistic strength, its wild imagination, its workmanship; it shows the tendency of the modern school toward realism. Whether there is such a thing as realism in music; whether such a thing is desirable if it exists—these are questions that do not now require examination. One thing is certain. The

Mr. Roth gave a smooth and pleasing performance of Raff's "characteristic piece." The piece itself is of little worth. There is pretty instrumentation that does not atone for poverty of thought.

The programme of the concert of next Saturday will be as follows: Overture fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikowsky; concerto for pianoforte, A major, No. 2, Liszt; Scherzo capriccioso, op. 68, Dvorak; symphony B flat, No. 4, Beethoven.

PHILIP HALE

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner; "La Mer" Symphonic Sketches for orchestra, Paul Gilson (first time), "La Fée d'Amour," for violin and orchestra, Raff; Symphony, "A Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. The heartiest applause of the evening was accorded the Wagner overture, which was most brilliantly and finely played. The Raff work for the violin is not particularly interesting, or if it be, Mr. Roth, who was the soloist of the occasion, did not make it appear so. He played it tastefully and with excellent technique, but it seems to be a work that requires a Marteau to do it full justice. The selections from the symphonic sketches by Paul Gilson are cleverly and effectively scored, but they are programme music pure and simple, and are more ambitious than edifying. The concert was somewhat dull, not to say dreary. We have omitted to state that Mr. Roth was vigorously applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: "Romeo and Juliet," Tschalkowsky; Concerto in A-major, Liszt; Scherzo Capriccioso, Dvorak, and Symphony No. 4, Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. F. B. Busoni.

planoforte accompaniment some time ago. We had hoped that Raff's clever orchestration might put a different face upon the work. But no! The thing still seems aimless, devoid of inspiration, and terribly spun-out. The cantabile love passage in the middle, from which we had hoped something on reading the score, turns out to be very like Wagner at his feeblest, without his effectiveness. It may express love, for all we know, but it surely does not express it musically. Neither does the instrumentation show us Raff at his best; it is not particularly effective. Then, too, the work even goes beyond other modern things for violin and orchestra we have heard of late, in the persistency with which it keeps the solo instrument hard at work saying nothing at all; with few exceptions, what is not mere preluding reduces itself to accompanying the orchestra with apparently hap-hazard figures of no interest in themselves, and without any striking effectiveness in the way of coloring. Nothing but the dire poverty of the literature of the violin in compositions in this form could save such a work from prompt oblivion. Violinists cannot keep playing the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Bruch and Brahms concertos over and over again forever! The public worn has already begun to turn at revivals of "virtuoso" concertos, by Paganini, Vieuxtemps, et al. tal. What are violinists to do? Mr. Roth performed his task (we can call it nothing else!) with artistic security, accuracy and grace. In a word, he played admirably. We have heard his tone sound larger before, but the orchestral part here is almost constantly pretty hard on the solo instrument, and a violin finds difficulty in sounding very big against several wooden wind instruments capering about in running passages. But his tone was sweet and pure, and he played throughout with rare elegance of style. As for compositions of this calibre being so often taken from the shelves where they are trying to repose in peace, may it not partly be accounted for on the same ground as the persistency with which pianists play Liszt Hungarian Rhapsodies, "Venezia e Napoli" and the like?—on the ground of their being, for some technical reasons, uncommonly good fun to play?

The next programme is: Tchaikowski, overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"; Liszt, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in A major; Dvorak, scherzo capriccioso, opus 66; Beethoven, symphony No. 4, in B flat major, opus 60. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni will be the pianist.

NIKISCH'S SUCCESSOR.

Mr. Higginson Denies that Herr Richter Has Been Engaged.

It was reported this morning that in all probability Herr Richter, a noted orchestral leader in London, would succeed to the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, held by Arthur Nikisch, who has resigned.

Col. Henry L. Higginson, who manages the concerts, said this morning that there was no truth in the report that Herr Richter was to be engaged or has been tendered the position. Furthermore, he said, he had not decided upon any one yet as Mr. Nikisch's successor.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Otto Roth.

It may be said of last evening's Symphony concert, the 19th of the present season's series, under Mr. Nikisch's direction, that what was new was not interesting and what was interesting was not new.

The programme began with the "Tannhauser" overture, and no one who heard this performance of the famous old composition will be inclined to dispute the statement that it has never had a better interpretation. There was a splendid virility in the work of the men throughout, and the grand climax was worked up in a magnificent fashion, the brasses giving out a solidity of tone which created the audience in almost a frenzy of excitement, and called out a spontaneous outburst of the most enthusiastic applause after the finale.

Raff's concert piece, "La Fée d'Amour," which was played here by Sarasate during his last visit with pianoforte accompaniment, made the second number on the programme, the violin part being played by Mr. Otto Roth. It is a composition better suited to display the technical attainments of the soloist than to interest a general audience. Mr. Roth is to be commended for a very careful, refined and intelligent treatment of the solo part, and he was listened to with marked attention by the audience and heartily applauded as he concluded his task. The orchestration adds little to the interest of the work, and its choice by Mr. Roth for his annual appearance is a little difficult to explain.

This novelty was followed by a second composition which was given its first performance in this city. "La Mer," a series of three symphonic sketches by Paul Gilson, is based upon a poem of the same title by Eddy Levis. It had its first hearing at the Concerts Populaires in Brussels recently, where its composer had just graduated from the Conservatoire. Each of the movements is complete in itself, the designations being "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances" and "Twilight." The first and last movements are decidedly romantic in their characteristics, and show evidence of mechanical training rather than of inspirations of the part of the composer. In the second movement the composer has written some very jolly dance music, and the songs are melodious and interesting. As a whole these sketches appeal with little force to an audience having no personal interest in the composer.

The programme was ended with a splendid performance of Karl Goldmark's Rustic Wedding symphony, which was given a thoroughly interesting interpretation, and left a very pleasing impression of the evening's concert.

The 20th concert will have for its programme Tchaikowski's overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"; Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in A major, No. 2; Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso, Op. 66, and Beethoven's symphony in B flat, No. 4, the soloist being Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

MUSIC.

The Nineteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
"The Love Fay," for violin and orchestra, op. 67.....Raff
"The Sea".....Gilson
"Rustic Wedding" Symphony.....Goldmark
"The Sea," by Paul Gilson, was played for the first time in this town.

The work was presented in a mutilated condition.

The original is a set of four "symphonic sketches": "Sunrise," "Sailors' Songs and Dances," "Twilight," "Storm." These scenes are poetically and musically connected in the verse of Eddy Levis and in the music of Gilson, the illustrator of the poem. There was no explanation in the programme book of the intention of the composer; there were no extracts from the poem. Gilson's music is professedly programme-music; but the hearer was left in the dark. Viewed as absolute music, "The Sea," as announced in three scenes, appeared ill-balanced and without a climax.

A double injustice was perpetrated by the cutting—against the composer, for surely his work should have been played according to his intention; against the hearer, who was deprived of the means of intelligent enjoyment.

And, first, who is Gilson? The name is not foreign to us. But we must cross the Atlantic in search of the composer of "La Mer."

Paul Gilson was born in Brussels, June 15, 1865. It is said that he studied harmony under Duyck in the Conservatory at Brussels, and then took lessons of the learned Gevaert. The season of 1888-89 was distinguished by the marked success of three Belgian composers, Blockx, Mathieu and Tinel; it was also in 1889 that Gilson gained the "Prix de Rome" by a cantata, "Sinai." Gilson has written "The Demon," a lyric drama; "The Suppliants"; "Daphne," for solos, chorus and orchestra; "David," an oratorio; incidental music for Maeterlinck's "Princess Matrine," etc. "The Sea" was first played, and with great success, at a concert in Brussels, March 20, 1892, under the direction of Joseph Dupont, to whom the work is dedicated. The poem was declaimed by Le Bargy; each musical tableau was preceded by the explanatory verse. There was a second performance, equally successful, May 7.

"The Sea" was performed in Paris at a Colonne concert Jan. 15 of this year. The poem was then declaimed by the author. Barbade wrote this acid note concerning the composition: "The poet is a Belgian, the music is also Belgian, and so a French audience did not grasp its full purport and its characteristics."

Gilson's work was performed in New York at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in December. The fourth scene was then given in full, and it made a most profound impression.

The composer and the poet of "The Sea" are realists. Let us inquire into the nature of their work. The first scene represents sunrise at sea; it contains one chief melodic subject, which, by the way, is the foundation motive of the whole work. The second scene introduces lusty dances, one of which is "La Ronde du Gabier," now, "gabier" is a sort of quartermaster, or it may be a topman. One of these dances is a variation of the first theme. In the third scene the motives are supposed to give a twilight effect, while a duet between English horn and flute sets to music the love making of a sailor and his betrothed and the subsequent separation described by the poet. The fourth scene is a storm in which the ship is lost; the storm dies, and there is a return to the gentle music of the first scene. At the height of the storm Gilson introduces reminiscences of the sailors' songs and dances, as though in mockery. This effect is said to be terrible, yes, ghastly beyond description.

To attempt to pass judgment on the work as it was given Saturday—or, rather, as it was not given—would be unfair, even if it were possible. Yet it may be said that "The Sea" is the most important of the novelties presented thus far during the present season of these concerts. It is important on account of its realistic strength, its wild imagination, its workmanship; it shows the tendency of the modern school toward realism. Whether there is such a thing as realism in music; whether such a thing is desirable if it exists—these are questions that do not now require examination.

One thing is certain. The work should be given as a whole. Enough was heard, however, to convince the hearer that the composer is a colorist rather than a melodist; that he is a master of instrumentation; that, above all, he has something to say, and that in the expression of thought he uses his own voice.

Mr. Roth gave a smooth and pleasing performance of Raff's "characteristic piece." The piece itself is of little worth. There is pretty instrumentation that does not atone for poverty of thought.

The overture was played superbly, with a spirit that was contagious, and with a wealth of tonal color. It was a performance long to be remembered, and it is not surprising that the audience was enthusiastic. The symphony also gave pleasure.

The programme of the concert of next Saturday will be as follows: Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikowsky; concerto for pianoforte, A major, No. 2, Liszt; Scherzo capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak; symphony B flat, No. 4, Beethoven.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner; "La Mer" Symphonic Sketches for orchestra, Paul Gilson (first time), "La Fée d'Amour," for violin and orchestra, Raff; Symphony, "A Rustic Wedding," Goldmark. The heartiest applause of the evening was accorded the Wagner overture, which was most brilliantly and finely played. The Raff work for the violin is not particularly interesting, or if it be, Mr. Roth, who was the soloist of the occasion, did not make it appear so. He played it tastefully and with excellent technique, but it seems to be a work that requires a Marteau to do it full justice. The selections from the symphonic sketches by Paul Gilson are cleverly and effectively scored, but they are programme music pure and simple, and are more ambitious than edifying. The concert was somewhat dull, not to say dreary. We have omitted to state that Mr. Roth was vigorously applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is: "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikowsky; Concerto in A major, Liszt; Scherzo Capriccioso, Dvorak, and Symphony No. 4, Beethoven. The soloist is Mr. F. B. Busoni.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The first number of the programme was by far the best of the programme of last Saturday, both in its contents and in its performance. Not that the "Tannhaeuser" overture has not received a clearer interpretation in Boston ere this, but it had a virility and power that most thoroughly reflected the spirit of the composer, and an occasional unclarity in chromatics and in the great violin figure which accompanies the Pilgrim's Chorus at its last appearance could readily be condoned because of the brilliancy of the general effect. The treatment of the Pilgrim's Chorus alluded to is the real climax of the overture, and nothing can show Wagner's loyalty to his opinions better than the fact that he deliberately cut out this powerful part, in rewriting the work for the Paris representations, because a "prelude" rather than an "overture" was demanded by his theories. A greater contrast than that between this work and the one which followed it can scarcely be imagined. Raff's "Fee d'Amour" is musical Eau Sucrée with a vengeance. It is a long fantasia, spasmodic to a degree, but seldom rising above sweetness in its effects. It is modern in its scoring, and occasionally reminds one of a greatly diluted and sweetened Wagner. Mr. Roth was the soloist in this, and although his tone seemed shallow and feeble, his technique was admirable. His intonation was always sure, and the cadenza introduced some excellent double-stopping and artificial harmonics. The soloist was recalled with much warmth, and evidently made a good impression on the general public.

It was decidedly bad programme making to follow such a free fantasia with a series of other orchestral fantasies, for that is what the symphonic sketches of Paul Gilson amounted to. These sketches are entitled "The Sea," as if to accentuate their being much weaker than Rubinstein's setting of the same subject in symphonic form. There is, I am told, a storm movement in the work, but this was not given, and there were cuts made in at least one of the three movements that were presented. The first movement represented "sunrise at sea," and was most modern in the ecstatic chords in high position, which seemed but a reflection of a Wagnerian idea. There was a fair amount of thematic treatment, although many a long-winded passage seemed little more than an apotheosis of the scales.

The second movement gave a presentation of the sailors at play, and introduced some not very characteristic songs and dances. The spirit of the true "Chanty" was not in them, although a well-marked horn-pipe rhythm appeared at one time. "Twilight at Sea" ended the proceedings. This had some strange, but not always successful effects.

A figure, introduced at the beginning, was gradually shortened at each successive reappearance, in a manner that recalled the way in which children sometimes sing "John Brown's Body," lopping off a syllable at each repetition. Muted horns gave their repulsive tones (it may be remembered that Rubinstein uses the same tone-color in a few passages of the "Ocean Symphony") possibly to hint at the sorrows of Mal de Mer. But in this movement at least the auditor was able to find actual melody; the theme on the English horn (beautifully played by Mr. Mueller) presented something of true romance, and flute and clarinette were also given charming themes which were excellently played. But as a whole one could not find anything entirely satisfying in the work; it was too cloying, and at the best only portrayed "A painted ship upon a painted ocean."

It was scarcely credible that after so much of sweetness, yet more musical sugar should have been added, yet such was the case. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony is not a symphony but a suite, and it deals in romantic ecstasy in a great degree. Again the woodwind instruments come into the foreground, and once more the violins climb into Alpine positions. The variations which begin the work at least served to display the various departments of the orchestra to good advantage, and they were read with some degree of power. Especially commendable was the oboe work here and the rapid elaboration of the theme on the violins. The clarinette work in the third movement was perfectly executed; indeed to each and all of the woodwind instruments must praise be given, for the concert gave more than usual opportunities to these instruments, and these were taken advantage of to the utmost. But the programme, as already intimated, was most ill assorted. The "Tannhaeuser" overture was the gem of it all, but its breadth emphasized the weaker character of all that followed. Nevertheless, as regards performance, there was little that could be adversely criticised, and, judging by the applause, the audience was entirely contented.

WHO WILL LEAD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Now That Nikisch is to Go Back to Europe?

Other Musical Matters of Interest.

Now that Mr. Nikisch's departure is assured, there is an impatient desire on the part of the musical public to know who will succeed to the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is no means, however, of satisfying this desire, for, if there is a man in the world able to keep his own counsel, that man is Mr. Henry L. Higginson.

I often wonder if the musical public really appreciates the privileges it enjoys nowadays, and correspondingly realizes that this enjoyment arises largely through the generosity and nobility of purpose on Mr. Higginson's part, and that, in the organizing and supporting of the now famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, it owes a debt of gratitude for the opportunities his munificence has offered.

Apropos of this liberality upon Mr. Higginson's part let me remark that the opinion, generally, of the public interested, is that the orchestra, which at first was a matter of outgo and the cause of a handsome loss each season, is now a paying institution. This opinion rests upon the impression that the large premiums paid at the auction sales of the Boston series render a handsome profit over the expense incurred in carrying through the 24 rehearsals and concerts. But these Boston concerts are only a part of the work of the orchestra, which performs in many other cities at intervals throughout the season, and goes on an extended tour through the West each spring, at the close of the Boston series of concerts.

The question naturally arises "Why does Mr. Higginson send his orchestra abroad if it is done at a loss?" There are two reasons: first, Mr. Higginson desires that other communities shall have the benefit of his beneficence; and secondly, if this great body of players is to be kept together, it must be employed.

In order that the musicians shall realize a suitable income the season is still further prolonged in their behalf in the giving of the Promenade concerts or "Pops" at the Music Hall during June and a part of July, when, regardless of the refreshments sold, there is still a loss of no small amount. When the generous spirit of Mr. Higginson's enterprise is considered one heartily wishes that this opinion entertained by the public were true, and it would be gratifying to know that the orchestra is now self-supporting. But when one looks the facts in the face and carefully counts the cost, it is easy to find that each season a sum of not less than $ 0,000 is required over and above all receipts to pay the loss incurred. I should say that it would be more, rather than less, that amount. In the earlier seasons the loss must have been double the above amount each year. Now these concerts have been in existence nine seasons at the completion of the present one, and it is the writer's opinion that during this time the loss complete will figure up to nearly $250,000, a large expense for one individual to assume. If it is taken into consideration that with each succeeding season there must always exist a loss of $10,000 or more, the reader will then realize the liberality of Mr. Higginson's generous and courageous impulses, and must regard him as a noble benefactor to the musical public and the cause of art, for his undertaking has no parallel in the world, it being always remembered that it is not a government, a rich institution, a syndicate of wealthy gentlemen, but on the contrary the generosity of one individual that assumes this great and expensive responsibility. When the above facts are realized the inquiry naturally arises, "Will Mr. Higginson continue to carry this burden?"

Without possessing any knowledge of Mr. Higginson's future intentions, but by drawing conclusions from what he has already shown in this direction, we unhesitatingly answer, "Yes, he will continue to bear the loss, and with a noble and generous spirit, also, for he did not put his hand to the plough to look back." A man of Mr. Higginson's large business capacity can approximate the cost of such an undertaking as these concerts, and quite closely, also; he decides that he can afford to indulge his generosity to this extent, and he resolutely carries out his intentions. There will be no wavering, either, upon his part, and should the hand of fate remove him from an earthly existence (long may he live to enjoy his means), it would probably be found that sufficient provision has been made in his will for a perpetual existence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I base my opinion wholly on my faith in the nobleness of Mr. Higginson's purpose, the integrity of his intention and his financial ability to sustain his magnanimous impulses.

Concerning the successor of Mr. Nikisch we repeat that as yet no one has been able to ascertain who has been selected. Undoubtedly some one has been approached to accept the position. It is generally understood that Mr. Nikisch's intention to resign was of comparatively recent date, and coming upon Mr. Higginson suddenly he has been left somewhat in the lurch, so to speak, especially if, as the impression prevails, that Mr. Nikisch's term of contract would not expire until the end of next season. It has also been rumored that Mr. Nikisch wished to be re-engaged for a term of five years, but that Mr. Higginson would not entertain the proposition, so Seidl having refused the offer from Buda-Pesth and the position being then tendered Nikisch, the latter accepted it at once and resigned his position in Boston. It is also rumored that Nikisch will go immediately the Boston concerts are finished, and not remain to complete the season by going on the Western tour with the orchestra.

Of course we know nothing of the truth of these rumors, but if the latter one is true, it would seem at first thought to be hardly fair towards his employer. Upon second thought, however, it would matter little, for it is the orchestra, and not the conductor, that has gained precedence in the West. Mr. Gericke established the reputation of the orchestra years ago. Now, if necessary, Mr. Kneisel can assume the baton at a moment's notice and, in my opinion, show better results at once than have been gained during Nikisch's connection with the orchestra. So, should Nikisch deem it advisable to go abroad before the season is over, the reputation of the orchestra will not suffer in the least thereby, but on the contrary something in artistic excellence would be gained under Kneisel's conducting.

But the question is, who is coming next season? Well, when Mr. Higginson has settled the matter he will frankly give the public the desired information, and not until then. Let us hope that it will be Wilhelm Gericke. In such a case it will not be an experimental conductor that will preside over the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. WARREN DAVENPORT.

Nikisch's Successor.

BOSTON, Mass., April 4.—Special Telegram—The stories that were given to the public in Boston and New York yesterday, that Hans Richter, director of the opera at Vienna, had been engaged to succeed Arthur Nikisch as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are stamped by Colonel Higginson as false. He says that no contract has yet been entered into with any one. There is only one man who has anything to do with procuring a leader for this orchestra, and that is Colonel Higginson, and when he has found the right man for the place, and the agreements are signed then the name of the new leader will be announced.

In the meantime the Boston public may rest assured that Mr. Nikisch's successor will be an able man whoever he may be. It is argued that inasmuch as Mr. Richter has recently refused an offer for a tour in this city with a guarantee of $1,000 a night, he is not likely to accept any position commanding a salary of from $5,000 to $8,000 per annum. Then, again, the hard-and-fast rules of the Vienna opera would only allow Mr. Richter four weeks to fill his engagement at the Chicago Exposition and return to his duties in Austria. Should he retire from the opera now he would lose his pension to which two more years of service would entitle him, so it is hardly probable that Mr. Richter will be the man to lead the symphonies next season.

THE MUSICAL WORLD.

The Symphony Concert—Notes and Comments.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme: Overture "Tannhäuser," Wagner; "The Fairy of Love," characteristic concert piece for violin and orchestra, op. 67, Raff; "The Sea," symphonic sketches, Paul Gilson; and "Rustic Wedding" Symphony, Goldmark. Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist.

A good performance of the Wagner overture called forth more applause than has been gained by the playing of any orchestral piece at these concerts for a long time. It is many moons, 20 or more, perhaps, since much enthusiasm has been excited by any selection that I can recall other than some solo number.

During Mr. Gericke's reign it was a common occurrence for him to be called out a number of times, after the performance of a symphony even, to say nothing of the enthusiastic applause that always followed wonderful renderings of the overtures of Beethoven, Weber, Wagner and others, the "Invitation to the Dance" of Weber, the poems of Saint Saens, the "Preludes" of Liszt, etc. Ah, those were the days of the glory of the orchestra when it had a master, a conductor who held the players with an iron grip and secured a unit of movement from their efforts. We wonder if the superb results of those days will ever again be realized in the efforts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra? We shall see.

Mr. Gilson's symphonic sketches, incompletely presented however, showed the ardent student of Wagner's orchestral resources and a clever hand at an imitation thereof. And yet there was a certain degree of originality existing in this work that is in the form of invention, however, there being little of spontaneity and healthy musical form. The hand of a good workman was evident. We should like to hear the work again in its entirety; it should have been given so, or else let alone altogether.

Raff's composition, which is new to our audience, did not serve well in its profuse sweetness in displaying the powers of Mr. Roth, whom we all know to be a most excellent artist. He was recalled several times after his performance.

The performance of the delightful Goldmark symphony was a most agreeable surprise, the orchestra seldom playing nowadays with so much discretion, delicacy and precision.

The public rehearsal this week will take place on Thursday afternoon instead of Friday afternoon. Mr. Busoni will be the soloist, and will play the A major concerto of Liszt. The rest of the programme will embrace Tchaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; "Scherzo Capriccioso," op. 68, Dvorak, and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 4, in B flat.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Conductor Nikisch introduced two novelties at the Symphony concert, the principal one being Paul Gilson's symphonic sketches, entitled, "The Sea," a descriptive number based upon a poem of the same title, by Eddy Levis, and first produced in Brussels a few months ago. The other piece was Raff's "Love Fairy," for violin and orchestra, given for the first time at these concerts, Mr. Roth playing the solo violin part.

Mr. Gilson is a young German composer, a recent graduate of the Brussels Conservatory, and, to judge from his work, an admirer of the Wagner class of music, for the orchestration in frequent instances plainly shows the influence of the great composer. The numbers of "The Sea" represent sunrise, sailors' songs and dances, twilight and tempest, and the various parts are very effectively scored, although the storm movement but faintly suggests the turbulence of a storm at sea, the composer not calling into use the full resources of a grand orchestra in illustrating this episode.

There is a great deal of dainty descriptive work in the "Sunrise and Twilight" movements, and here perhaps Mr. Gilson is heard at his best. The sailors' songs and dances have a breezy and buoyant rhythm and swing, and appeal successfully to the emotions of the average concert-goers. These numbers may be ranked as possessing the element of popularity which is lacking in the more quiet and poetic parts of the work, wherein is shown his skillful knowledge and use of instruments typifying the emotional and gentle tone pictures.

Mr. Gilson's abilities are of a high grade, and he possesses an originality combined with simplicity of expression which argues well for his early attainment of a commanding position in the ranks of composers.

It is difficult to judge of the orchestral work at a single hearing, but praise is due the band for the sympathetic manner in which the melodic themes of the descriptive parts were interpreted. The storm scene doubtless would have been more thrilling had the composer deemed advisable to score it differently.

Raff's "Love Fairy" is merely a light and tripping concert piece without any depth or broad effects, and serves to show a violinist's facility of execution and little else. The admirable artist, Mr. Otto Roth, played the fanciful number gracefully and dexterously. His legato runs were clear and true, and throughout the piece he played with a confidence of his powers which made his many friends regret that he was not afforded a better medium for showing his abilities as a violinist.

Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture, as originally written, was the opening number, and the familiar piece was given with telling effect, the various effects of light and shade being nicely observed. The pilgrims' song and jubilation at the close was grand, and roused the audience to the usual pitch of enthusiasm.

The programme closed with Carl Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding." The peculiar first part, with its 13 variations on one theme, and the odd beginning and finale by the cellos and double basses was more heartily appreciated than the remaining three movements. As a whole, Goldmark's number was the best interpreted of all.

The public rehearsal this week will be held on Thursday afternoon, March 30, to allow time to arrange the stage for the Handel and Haydn concert on Good Friday evening. The programme for the rehearsal and concert will be as follows: Overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikowsky; Liszt's concerto for pianoforte, A major, No. 2; Busoni's scherzo capriccioso, op. 68, Dvorak; symphony, B flat, No. 4, Beethoven. Mr. Busoni will be the pianist.

HANS RICHTER FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA?

A gratifying piece of news is printed in the morning papers—or, rather, it would be gratifying if all that it implies were truth, which, unfortunately, is not the case as yet. As stated in effect in the despatch from Vienna, Hans Richter has sent in his resignation of the post of conductor at the Opéra and also the position of conductor at the Imperial Chapel, his reason for this course being his acceptance of the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But the Austrian Government is not of the hustling order, and we must wait, with Richter, a good two weeks or more to learn the result of the deliberations of Franz Josef's representatives. If they shall accept the great conductor's resignation it will be an act of real generosity, for besides, as is likely, giving to him a post with less work and more pay, they will deprive themselves of the services of the most distinguished conductor now living and one to whom the great theatre where he has been in charge largely owes its leading importance in the art world of Europe. Indeed, reflecting on his value and considering the practical impossibility of finding a fully equipped successor, there arises a feeling of apprehension that the kaiser's advisers in these matters will say "no." Even then, however, the incident will stand as another illustration of Colonel Higginson's constant purpose to provide the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the best men at all points, with never a thought of the question of cost.

RICHTER SUCCEEDS NIKISCH.

The Celebrated Conductor to Lead the Symphony Orchestra.

VIENNA, April 14.—Hans Richter, the celebrated conductor of orchestral concerts, has resigned his position as director of the Court Opera Theatre in Vienna, and fair copy. Richter's room was exactly over that in which Wagner worked at the "Meistersinger," and it is interesting to learn, on the authority of the former, that during the entire 13 months of his stay under Wagner's roof he never once heard him strike a note on the piano in his room.

Before Richter came to Wagner he had fulfilled an engagement as a horn player in the orchestra of the Karthnerthor Opera House in Vienna, and had also obtained a practical mastery over most of the orchestral instruments, but it seems that has accepted an offer to take charge of the orchestral performances in Boston.

The coming of Richter will undoubtedly cause a commotion in the American musical world. His reputation rests on his connection with Wagner in the many musical festivals at Bayreuth, and in later years for his annual symphony and Wagnerian concerts in London. His connection with Wagner began in the early sixties.

Wagner took him to Lucerne, and he was the one who made the first fair copy of the score of "Die Meistersinger."

When Richter was a man of 23 he was recommended by Esser to Wagner, then living at Triebchen near Lucerne, and in need of an expert copyist, and spent more than a year under the same roof with the great composer, and the score of whose "Meistersinger" he made the first complete

Wagner only once availed himself of the copyist's expert knowledge.

OUR NEW CONDUCTOR.

It is to be Hans Richter, and Boston and America are to be congratulated. Richter is probably the greatest of living conductors, and there is every probability that under his leadership, our band will become the greatest of orchestras. Hans Richter is not only a great drillmaster, but a most poetic interpreter of the classical repertoire. His tastes are broad and catholic, so that Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner are all familiar to him, and he does not allow one school to obliterate another. His successes in Bayreuth have been phenomenal, and his London concerts have been a great feature in the past musical seasons of that metropolis.

HANS RICHTER

May Become Director of Boston Symphony.

Resigns From the Vienna Imperial Orchestra.

Prospective Good Fortune for Musical Boston.

Sketch, and Other Facts of Personal Nature.

Dr. Hans Richter, at present the head Director of the Vienna Imperial Orchestra at the Court Opera House in Vienna, has been asked to succeed Mr. Nikisch as Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has resigned his position in Vienna at the present time, it is said, in order to go to Chicago, but after that it is supposed he will come to Boston.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson, to whose munificence the original existence of the Symphony Orchestra is due, was not inclined to talk about the matter of the leadership of the orchestra when the Journal reporter called at his office, asking him to either confirm or deny the report that Dr. Richter was to succeed Mr. Nikisch. Mr.

Hans Richter

Der gelehrte

Dr. Richter

Richter.

Higginson sent out word that he was very busy and had nothing to say about the case.

But from other sources it is learned by the Journal that the proffer has actually been made to Dr. Richter, and that it is confidently expected he will accept. There is one point to be cleared away, but that, it is hoped, will be soon accomplished.

There has recently been a conference in Washington to decide whether Dr. Richter has a right to come or not, for it was feared he would not be allowed to land in this country on account of the alien contract law, which forbids the landing of foreigners under contract. The question to be decided was whether Dr. Richter, in his position as an artist, was to be considered a musician under contract. All difficulty in this direction has been removed.

"GREATEST IN THE WORLD."

Thus Speaks Conductor Nikisch—He Says That Boston Is to Be Congratulated.

The present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, speaks of his successor in words which, coming from another, would be thought extravagantly praiseful. A Journal reporter talked with Mr. Nikisch after yesterday's rehearsal, and was the first one to definitely inform him of the resignation of Herr Richter.

"If it is really so," said Mr. Nikisch, "Boston is to be congratulated. Richter is the greatest conductor in the world. Everyone will say so of him. He is a great man."

"You know he is a man of long training. He was formerly a horn player, and then became conductor of the opera at Buda Pesth."

"Personally, he is such a man that his characteristics are of no interest to newspaper readers. I have known him for years, and can say that he is superior to all conductors living."

ANECDOTES OF RICHTER.

His Personal Characteristics, His Appearance and His Methods.

"Richter coming? Oh, it's too good to be true!" exclaim his enthusiastic admirers.

"But are you sure it is so? Is it not merely a rumor?" said Miss Lena Little of this city to the Journal representative yesterday. "I can hardly believe it. I knew he was coming to the World's Fair, for I received letters only the other day from friends in London telling me about it. But I never dreamed that he was going to stay. Oh, I can hardly believe it!"

"I was well acquainted with him and with Mrs. Richter in London."

"But has he resigned his position at the Court Opera House in Vienna? I can hardly understand that. His work was so pleasant there, and so much easier than what he will have to do here. There are three or four directors at the Court Theatre beside himself, and he had very little traveling to do. But the Symphony Orchestra does a great deal of traveling, which is one reason why Mr. Nikisch has disliked the work, and of all things Richter detests traveling. He has led the Philharmonic Orchestra of London, but that was only once a week and was not difficult work for him."

"The members of the Symphony Orchestra here can hardly appreciate now greatly they will be blessed if they should be so fortunate as to have Richter for their next leader."

"His bearing and appearance are typically German, although he is Austrian by birth. He is a large man, and has the true Saxon complexion. He has a very mild blue eye, and is jolly and good-natured.

240

"He not only knows how to direct an orchestra, but how to train his musicians, and how to get from them the best possible effects. He is able to do with his orchestra just what he desires, and can readily obtain the required effects from the musicians, because they understand at once just what he wants. For this reason he is not obliged to rehearse his orchestra nearly as much as most leaders. For this reason some have said that he was lazy; not because he did not produce the best effects with his orchestra, but simply because they knew that he did not do much rehearsing.

"I think one can hardly call him 'very catholic and broad' in his tastes, because there is so much music that he does not like at all. He likes most of the German music, I believe, but he indorses very little French music. His wife is very pleasant."

Mrs. Richter is not at all musical except by taste and associations. Of course she moves in musical circles on account of her husband's profession and position, but she neither sings nor plays.

"Dr. Richter has five beautiful children, the oldest being a daughter about fifteen years of age," continued Miss Little in conversation with the Journal caller.

"Many people seem to think Dr. Richter is growing old. But although he has been well known in musical circles for so many years, he is only about 50 years of age. His degree of Doctor of Music was received from Oxford."

Dr. Richter met with some very amusing experiences when he first went to England, for he was much troubled to learn the English language.

At one time he was conducting a rehearsal with his orchestra when he was suddenly seen to frown severely at the violinists. His keen eye at once detected the guilty one who was holding his bow with the ends or fleshy parts of his fingers. Dr. Richter shook his head, rapped swiftly on the music rack with his baton to emphasize each word as he said vehemently:

"You must not bow with the meat of your fingers!" the word "meat" being the translation given in the dictionary for the German word "fleisch," which may also mean "flesh."

ABOUT HANS RICHTER.

Facts and Gossip Concerning the Celebrated Orchestra Conductor.

Boston may well plume herself if Hans Richter accepts the offer made to him and comes to us as the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His reputation was long ago established, and the years have only proved his natural gifts, his musical intuition, his catholic tastes, his mastery over players and his worth as a man as well as a musician.

Richter was born April 4, 1843, at Raab, Hungary. His father was a director of church music in the town, and when his father died (1853) Hans entered into the Hofkapelle of Vienna as a choir boy. From 1860 to 1865 he studied in the Viennese Conservatory of Friends of Music. He studied the horn under Kleinecke, and composition under Sechter and Hellmesberger. He also studied the pianoforte. He was engaged as horn player in the Imperial Opera Orchestra of Vienna.

Esser called the attention of Wagner to Richter, and in 1866 and 1867 Richter dwelt with Wagner in Lucerne and copied the score of "The Mastersingers" for publication. With the assistance of Wagner, Richter was chosen chorus director at the court opera in Munich, 1868. He afterward was director of the royal music. In 1869 Richter went to Paris to study there the state and conditions of music, but he was called to Brussels, where he directed the rehearsals of "Lohengrin," which was performed for the first time in that city March 22, 1870, at the Theatre de la Monnaie. The opera was given chiefly through the earnest efforts of Brassin, the late eminent pianist. Richter had amusing difficulties in his dealings with Vachot, the director of the theatre, while Singelee was the first of the orchestral conductors. Léon Dommartin gives the following account:

"A good fellow, this Richter, and an excellent musician. You should have seen him with Daddy Vachot, whom he called in his broken French, 'Mosié Fajoite,' with the air of a savage beast that whets his teeth. For Richter, sweet as a lamb on ordinary occasions, was ferocious when hands were laid on his idol. Vachot was crazy to arrange everything; he wished to cut right and left. Richter howled in agony, and called to witness gods and men, singers, orchestra, stage carpenters and firemen; he went about groaning and gesturing wildly: 'He wishes to cut everything.' The triumphal idea of Vachot was to introduce a ballet in the second act, under the pretext that the act needed enlivening. That day Richter, strangled by indignation, thought he would die. Vachot, too, was near death, for Richter spoke seriously of choking him."

However, the performance was a great success.

Richter went to Vienna and then returned to Wagner and assisted him in the preparation of the "Nibelungen Ring" for press. In the spring of 1871 he was chosen conductor at the National Theatre, Pesth, and he stayed there until 1875. In that year he directed an orchestral concert in Vienna with overwhelming success, and he was called to Vienna as the successor of Dessoff as conductor of the Imperial Opera and as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, which positions he has since held with a few intermissions. In 1878 Richter was named Second Chapel Master of the Hofkapelle. In 1876 he directed the Wagner performances at Baireuth, and in 1877 he laid in London the foundations of his great renown in England.

Hanslick in his "Musikalisches Skizzenbuch" tells the story of Richter's first appearance in London.

It was in 1877 that Wagner was to direct in Albert Hall a festival, the programmes of which were selected from his works. Before his arrival, two conductors of London tried to lead the rehearsals—but in vain; conductors and players were utterly at sea. Richter grasped the stick and showed them the meaning of the music. The musicians were exceeding glad. At the festival Wagner was tired out and nervous; he only conducted the lighter pieces from "Tannhauser" and "Lohengrin." Richter conducted the other selections, and such was his success that he was called on to lead a performance of symphonies of Beethoven. Richter's friend Franke bestirred himself and arranged for three Richter concerts in 1880.

His orchestra in London numbers 100, and in Wagner concerts the number is increased. He insists on strict rehearsals, to which hearers are not admitted.

It is estimated that each of these London concerts, one rehearsal included, costs about $2000. A full house brings in about $3000.

It is difficult to choose from the many and glowing eulogiums pronounced by experts on Richter's abilities.

Otto Lessmann of Berlin, a hyper-modern, praises the sincerity of the musician, and commends his leading for its freedom from conceit, personal originality, and all extravagance. But he that wishes to study in advance the methods of Richter should read carefully Maurice Kufferath's "L'Art de Diriger l'Orchestre," Paris, 1890; for in this pamphlet of 100 pages are many interesting details concerning Richter, the conductor.

HANS RICHTER,
Doctor of Music (Oxford), from the life-size picture by Georg Papperitz (Munich).

Richter is, for instance, scrupulous in the matter of the nuances. What Kufferath says concerning the famous orchestra of Brussels may be applied to our own organization: "These excellent violinists are, I think, too often merely virtuosos, and they play as such, with the bow on the string, giving constantly vibration to the tone." But Richter constantly insisted in rehearsals on piano, and was rigid in the observance of pianissimo. He was equally difficult to please in sustained forte.

He is a musician to the bone. His memory is remarkable, and he is fond of directing without the score. It is his habit after the final rehearsal to carefully go over the score to fix in his mind the intentions of the composer. His beat is imperious but simple. The rhythm is indicated with remarkable energy. At the same time he does not annihilate spontaneity; he does not reduce the orchestra to a machine. He is master because without imposing himself upon the players he does not abandon them. He vibrates with the players and they with him.

Above all, he does not direct, says Kufferath, for the audience; he is there simply for the orchestra; he regards nothing but the orchestra.

Let us hope that all these words are true. Let us also hope that he is not narrow, as has been suggested, but that he is a reasonable man who does not think that music is necessarily a thing of German invention, fostered by Germans alone.

"AN AUTOCRAT OF THE FIRST ORDER."

Mr. E. J. Lang Declares Herr Richter to Be—His Characteristics.

The director of two of Boston's choral societies, Mr. E. J. Lang, is not only acquainted with Hans Richter and with his personal habits, but knows him as a friend. Mr. Lang's talk with a Journal reporter Friday, consequently, is not only interesting but also illustrates Richter's characteristics.

"In the first place," said Mr. Lang, "Richter is a Hungarian, and, therefore, is not to be mistaken for a Bohemian, an Austrian or a German. He is a man of mature years. He was associated very much with Wagner and was always with him. Together they looked over the scores of a few of Wagner's operas, and Richter helped him in other things."

This friendship led to his being director of the first few seasons' festivals of the German master's music at Bayreuth.

As is known, he is a man of great experience. For years he has conducted at Vienna and every three years goes to Birmingham, England, and conducts the festivals there. Every summer he gives a series of concerts in London, not with his own orchestra but with one of picked players.

"Physically Richter is a man of great stature, with a commanding presence. He is not a picturesque character—not a man for the girls to rave over. They won't ask for locks of his hair," said the musician, smilingly.

"Professionally he is an autocrat of the first order, and I should think he was a mixture of—well, I can't say for the moment."

"It's hard to think of a personal anecdote at this moment." But after ruminating for half a minute or so, Mr. Lang continued, the smile of reminiscence deepening as he spoke: "You know, in Bayreuth the orchestra is under the stage and is quite concealed, the conductor being the only one who can see it and the stage. Well, one night I thought I'd like to experience what the effect was down there, and I took a seat among the players. Later on, unwittingly, I stood up. In a few moments I became aware that the men about me were all looking at one spot very closely. Then a violin bow tapped my leg, and I, looking with the others, saw Richter glaring at me as if he would kill me. I sat down immediately. Of course, I should not have stood up; besides, I was obstructing the view of a violinist. But if ever I thought a friend could kill me with a look it was then."

"HE'S A SPLENDID MAN."

Mr. W. J. Winch, Who Sang Many Times Under His Direction, Speaks With Praise.

Among those who consider themselves fortunate in the possession of Hans Richter's friendship is Mr. W. J. Winch, the tenor.

A Journal reporter, with whom Mr. Winch conversed during a passage down stairs yesterday, got the following interesting facts: "Richter is a man of charming personality, and," continued the speaker, "I am glad they've got him. I knew him well in London, and was in his company a great deal. We often lunched together, as he and I belonged to the same club. He is, indeed, a very fine man.

"His memory is wonderful. I remember once when we were rehearsing the Ninth Symphony we had occasion to go back some measures, and he, without reference, struck the exact chord. Of course, that is only a little incident."

Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the director of the Handel and Haydn Society, also expressed his pleasure at the news. To a Journal reporter he said: "I have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Richter, but I know that he's a very fine man."

DR. HANS RICHTER

COMING TO BOSTON TO SUCCEED NIKISCH.

HE CABLES HIS ACCEPTANCE OF THE SYMPHONY LEADERSHIP.

The Announcement Will Cause a Sensation in the American Musical World—His Reputation as a Musician and Conductor World-Wide—His Connection With the Great Wagnerian Festivals—Mr. Elson's Opinion.

VIENNA, April 13.—Hans Richter, the celebrated conductor of orchestral concerts, has resigned his position as director of the Court Opera Theatre in Vienna, and has accepted an offer to take charge of the orchestral performances in Boston.

The coming of Richter will undoubtedly cause a commotion in the American musical world. His reputation rests on his connection with Wagner in the many musical festivals at Bayreuth, and in later years for his annual symphony and Wagnerian concerts in London. His connection with Wagner began in the early sixties.

Wagner took him to Lucerne, and he was the one who made the first fair copy of the score of "Die Meister singer."

In 1871 he was principal conductor of the National Opera at Pesth. On the retirement of Herbech he became first conductor at the Vienna Opera House. In 1876 he conducted the rehearsals and all performances of the "Ring of the Niebelung." At Bayreuth achieving thereby a worldwide fame. At the close of the third series of performances there he received the order of Maximilian from King Ludwig of Bavaria, and that of the falcon from the grand duke of Weimar. In 1885 he was chosen director of the Birmingham festival.

When Richter was a man of 23 he was recommended by Esser to Wagner, then living at Triebchen near Lucerne, and in need of an expert copyist, and spent more than a year under the same roof with the great composer, and the score of whose "Meistersinger" he made the first complete fair copy. Richter's room was exactly over that in which Wagner worked at the "Meistersinger," and it is interesting to learn, on the authority of the former, that during the entire 13 months of his stay under Wagner's roof he never once heard him strike a note on the piano in his room.

Before Richter came to Wagner he had fulfilled an engagement as a horn player in the orchestra of the Karnthnerthor Opera House in Vienna, and had also obtained a practical mastery over most of the orchestral instruments, but it seems that Wagner only once availed himself of the copyist's expert knowledge.

One day he brought up a page of the score with the ink still wet, and pointing to a passage asked Richter, "Do you think this passage can be played on the horn at the tempo I have indicated? Isn't it too difficult?" the passage in question was the "Finale" of act ii. of the "Meistersinger," where the horn repeats the theme of Beckmesser's serenade. Richter looked at the passage and reassured him, "Yes, it can be played; but it will sound rather queer; the tone will be decidedly nasal."

"Capital," rejoined Wagner, "that is exactly the comic effect I wanted." Richter then played the passage over on the horn. "Again! again! quicker! quicker!" cried the master delighted to find that his instinct had been so accurate.

It was his practice in the summer to row out on the lake to a little islet opposite the villa and there, ensconced in the long grass, to blow to his hearts content. The curiosity of the neighborhood was soon aroused by this mysterious music, but Richter for some time eluded detection, until at last some time an English tourist surprised him in his hiding place.

"At last," he cried, "I have found you out. It was you, then, who has been making this enchanting music. Let me thank you, sir, for the pleasure you have given me on so many evenings."

Fifteen years later Dr. Richter was given an honorary degree at Oxford. After the ceremony one of the professors of the University came up to salute and congratulate him. It was none other than the enterprising tourist. He had not forgotten the circumstances of their meeting.

Our New Conductor.

It is to be Hans Richter, and Boston and America are to be congratulated. Richter is probably the greatest of living conductors, and there is every probability that under his leadership, our band will become the greatest of orchestras. Hans Richter is not only a great drillmaster, but a most poetic interpreter of the classical repertoire. His tastes are broad and catholic, so that Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner are all familiar to him, and he does not allow one school to obliterate another. His successes in Bayreuth have been phenomenal, and his London concerts have been a great feature in the past musical seasons of that metropolis.

No man can get better work from an orchestra, yet there is nothing of the martinet or severe taskmaster in him; a thorough musician himself, he demands thorough musicianship on the part of his co-workers. He is of middle age (only 50), decidedly German in appearance and manner, and is a veritable personification of Hans Sachs in sturdiness and bonhomie. He will be a factor not only in Boston's music, but will wield an influence throughout America.

It is something to be glad that our orchestra again falls into German hands. Its traditions are German, its personnel is largely German, and its repertoire must, of course, be drawn largely from German sources; a Frenchman, no matter what his musical abilities, could not have been in full sympathy with the men, and would have found the position an especially arduous one. The coming of Richter will ease the minds of more than one member of the orchestra. Had Mr. Nikisch had a Gallic successor, it is likely that there would have been changes made in the list of the musicians, as it is no capable artist need fear a sudden discharge.

This element of fixity means much to an orchestra; the men will play with far more heart and devotion to their task because they know that everything will be judged on its merits. The very announcement of the news of this engagement will make a difference in the playing of the more anxious ones; and it may be permitted, in this connection, to plead for something more of permanency in the positions of the men; when they know that they possess life positions like their European confreres they will give more enthusiasm to their task.

Dr. Richter (he has a Cambridge degree) is a practical musician being a horn-player as well as a director. Although I have spoken of him as a German, he is by birth a Hungarian, but his long service in Austria and Germany has so Teutonized him that he may readily be classed with the army of the great German musicians of the present. We may hope for noble music, nobly performed, in the near future.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Dr. Hans Richter Coming to Lead the Symphonies—Greatest Conductor of the Age—He was a Friend of Wagner. Boston music lovers are delighted to learn that Hans Richter, the celebrated conductor of orchestral concerts, is to be the successor of Mr. Arthur Nikisch as leader of the symphonies.

Mr. Richter has resigned as director of the Court Opera House at Vienna, and is soon to sail for this country. Congressman Hoar has secured a special permit from the Treasury Department for him to land, and thus he will have no trouble in connection with the alien contract law.

DR. HANS RICHTER OF VIENNA.

Richter is probably the greatest of the conductors of today, wonderful as a drillmaster, and a most poetic interpreter of the classical repertoire. Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner are all familiar to him, so broad are his tastes, and he does not allow one school to obliterate another.

He is a Hungarian by birth, but his long service in Austria and Germany has so Teutonized him that he may be classed with the army of German musicians.

His reputation rests on his connection with Wagner in the many musical festivals at Bayreuth, and in later years for his annual symphony and Wagnerian concerts in London.

In his youth he had an engagement as a horn player in the orchestra of the Karnthnerthor Opera House in Vienna, and also obtained a practical mastery over most of the orchestral instruments.

When Richter was 23 he was recommended by Esser to Wagner, then living at Triebchen, near Lucerne, and in need of an expert copyist, and spent more than a year under the same roof with the great composer, and of the score of whose "Meistersinger" he made the first complete fair copy. Richter's room was exactly over that in which Wagner worked at the "Meistersinger," and it is interesting to learn, on the authority of the former, that during the entire 13 months of his stay under Wagner's roof he never once heard him strike a note on the piano in his room.

In 1871 he was principal conductor of the National Opera at Pesth. On the retirement of Herbech he became first conductor at the Vienna Opera House.

In 1876 he conducted the rehearsals and all performances of the "Ring of the Niebelung," at Bayreuth, achieving thereby a world-wide fame. At the close of the third series of performances there he received the order of Maximilian from King Ludwig of Bavaria, and that of the falcon from the grand duke of Weimar.

In 1885 he was chosen director of the Birmingham festival.

He has an honorary degree from Oxford, and as Dr. Richter will be known to Bostonians.

RICHTER AT HOME.

A Herald Correspondent Interviews Him.

The Director's Intense Desire to Come to America—A Vienna Ovation to the Great Musician—Mounds of Flowers and Laurels Laid at His Feet—He Makes a Touching Speech—His Charming Home and Family.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

VIENNA, April 20, 1893. Hans Richter is not a man of easy access, and if I had not presented myself as a BOSTON HERALD correspondent I do not think that I should have found him "at home." He has certainly refused to see a single Vienna journalist, and is proudly indifferent to all the contradictory statements that are published about him and his plans. But the fact that Boston is eager to hear about him, which looks like a welcome ready to be given, impressed him very much, and he gave the information asked when the questioning came from that quarter.

I wish I could show exactly the indomitable energy that is in the man. I had gone to see him with the clear impression, gained from newspaper and private talk in Vienna, that the Emperor would not let him go, that he would have to fulfil the conditions of his contract, which bind him to the opera of Vienna for four more years. A few words from him dispelled the impression at once and forever. "There is nothing in the world can prevent me, when I want to do a thing, and I am going."

His children and his relatives had told me that he was determined to go to America, and they were wondering how long he had entertained the plan. The announcement of his intentions came as a surprise to the whole family, and at first they still hoped that they might dissuade him; that is, the wife and daughters and other female relatives did, for his boys were burning to go from the first, under a mistaken impression that there will be fewer lessons and more fun in America than in Austria.

All Richter's most intimate friends have tried to make him think twice before deciding to settle in a new country at the age of 50, and with a family that has grown up in Vienna and is unmistakably Viennese. He invariably answers: "We shall all be Americans before we are two years older, and we shall be happier in the new country." So resistance has been given up, and indeed, a very few words with Hans Richter show us at once how hopeless all opposition to his wishes must be.

Richter's Home and Family.

But mind, the rough, sturdy man with the musical soul, has the tenderest heart for his wife and children, and it is the wish to be able to devote himself more to them, and to serve them more effectively, that first made him listen to American propositions. The very house in which he lives is a proof of his excellent qualities as a family man. The remotest cottage in a suburb of remote cottages is the dwelling place he selected for himself and the family he dotes upon. It is too far from the centre of Vienna for social intercourse, and when he returns from his work, from the church choir, concerts, rehearsals and operas he is certain to spend his time undisturbed in the circle of his charming children, four girls and two boys. The two eldest girls appeal particularly to the heart of the father. They are both musical. The eldest, Richarda, is just 17, and is called after her godfather Richard Wagner. Ludovica is 15, and is the goddaughter of the great churchman of Hungary, Cardinal Haynald.

TWO VIEWS OF HERR RICHTER'S RESIDENCE IN VIENNA.

The Great Musician's Career.

Richter, though he is a fine type of a German, with blue eyes and almost golden hair, is a Hungarian himself. Born in Raab on the 4th of April, 1843, he came to Vienna 10 years old as a chorister in the imperial chapel. He was taught the piano and other instruments, as well as composition between 1860 and 1865. He then made Richard Wagner's acquaintance and spent a year with him in Switzerland, which settled his musical inclinations for life. In 1868 Wagner got him appointed director of the chorus in the opera at Munich. In 1870 he directed the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Brussels, and was then made director of the orchestra in the National Theatre of Buda-Pesth. Having directed a grand orchestra concert in Vienna with extraordinary success, he was appointed director of the imperial opera orchestra—in fact, successor to Dessoff—and at the same time undertook to direct the philharmonic concerts. In 1878 he also became director of the Emperor's church orchestra. In 1876 he directed all the performances of the Nibelungen in Bayreuth, and in 1877 the Wagner concerts in London, alternating with Wagner himself.

A Vienna Ovation.

Success does not spoil him, indeed it scarcely touches him. On the day I saw him he had just returned from the rehearsal of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with the Philharmonic Society, which had been public, and he merely mentioned the fact of having been there. Afterward I learned that he had been given such a reception by the performers and the public that the scene will never be forgotten by any who were present. He directed Beethoven's wonderful composition entirely by heart, with perfect composure and a happy inspiration that made all its beauties apparent to the dullest. After every part he was enthusiastically applauded, and loud regrets were heard that such a perfect director should be lost to the music-loving public of Vienna. Yesterday (Sunday), during the real concert, the ovations were intensified. Archduchess Marie Therese remained from beginning to end, and applauded heartily, and at last Hans Richter felt bound to speak some words of thanks.

A Speech, Flowers and Laurels.

His voice was husky, and he seemed much moved. The whole group of 200 performers rose as he spoke, making the scene very solemn. He said that he left Vienna with a heavy heart, and that he hoped he would be believed when he gave the assurance that it was not sordid gain that attracted him, but the care for a large family which made it imperative that he should obey a call which was as honorable as it was urgent. His work at the opera had worn him out, and he found it impossible to maintain the ideals of art when so much work was asked of him. The Vienna public, which is not usually demonstrative, was deafening in its cheers, and before Richter could withdraw a mound of flowers and laurels was laid at his feet.

HERR HANS RICHTER.

Mrs. Richter's Poor Health.

Of his family, only the daughters were present at this moving scene, the wife being still too ailing to trust herself in such a case. She has been ill all the winter—eight months in bed, and has only been nursed back to life this spring by the physicians' art and the untiring care of two religiouses. To her the idea of leaving her home, her friends, all that is dear, is full of vague terrors, but Richter is hopeful that by September she will be healthy and in the right frame of mind to follow him into the new world.

Will Sail for America in June.

Hans Richter particularly feels the honor done to him by the government of the United States, when he was invited to direct the concerts in the great Music Hall of the Chicago exhibition, and he is prepared to leave Vienna in June. He has not a rival in the world; for putting life and soul into an orchestra, and making it go like clockwork besides, he is famous, and among his peculiarities is a dislike for long and frequent rehearsals. "It will go all right at the performance," is one of his firm beliefs, always confirmed. Many times he took upon himself the work of a friend taken suddenly ill, and succeeded in directing whole operas that he had never seen the music of.

An Enthusiastic Wagnerian.

Herr Richter quite disapproves the craze for Mascagni and Massenet, and never directed their operas with pleasure or interest. All the enthusiasm, the fire of his musical soul, was reserved for Wagner's music.

Skilful as an Orchestra Director.

It is certain that Richter's true calling is not that of an opera director, but that his talents and acquirements all point to his being the independent director of a large orchestra, with no stage performance to interfere between him and his musicians. When he was under Wagner's guidance, he obeyed, above all things, his law that the director of an orchestra must be an independent musician, not music's slave. No doubts were ever entertained that of the two Hans Richter was the better director, for he possesses the qualities necessary for commanding an orchestra—self possession, energy and intellectual superiority—in a much higher degree than Richard Wagner ever possessed them. Richter's superiority consists in the fact that he gave the whole orchestra repertory from Bach and Handel to Beethoven and Schumann, to which our ears were deadened, new life, so that those who hear these compositions directed by him imagine they have heard something beautifully new altogether, which Richter had succeeded in drawing from the orchestra.

It is thus that he gained the respect and love of the musicians, who feel exactly that the man with the director's baton in his hand is able to command more than what lies in their instruments. By this means he refreshed "Don Juan" and "Fidelio" in the opera house so that they are listened to with the interest felt for perfectly new compositions. Beethoven's symphonies have never attained to such perfect beauty and expression as they do under Hans Richter's direction.

Richter's Individuality.

Richter and Bulow are the two grand and original directors Europe calls its own. But Bulow is worn out and ill and tired, whereas Richter is in the full force of life, and, if his powers are reserved for the concert room, has still a long career before him.

FELIX.

BOSTON, APRIL 16

HANS RICHTER.

A Vienna Correspondent Chats with Him.

He Talks Freely for Herald Readers—

His Motives for Accepting the Boston

Engagement—His Popularity with the Vienna Public—Some Local Impressions Given in Interviews.

[BY CABLE TO THE SUNDAY HERALD.]

VIENNA, April 15, 1893. When I received cable instructions from Boston today to call upon Hans Richter and have a chat with him about his plans for going to America, I mentally congratulated myself upon being associated with his favorite paper here, and felt that the request made could be easily complied with.

I called at his pleasant residence this afternoon at the hour he is usually to be found at home, and confidently sent in my card with my journalistic position here duly inscribed upon it. To my surprise it was returned with a message of regret that a previous engagement would prevent my reception. My Viennese pride was touched, but my early American training came to my rescue, and pencilling under my Vienna address, "Correspondent BOSTON HERALD," I requested its return to the great conductor.

It Proved an Inspiration.

for presently the servant returned with a smiling face, and assured me that if I would wait a moment I would be most heartily welcome to any service I desired.

HERR HANS RICHTER.

My entrance to Richter's room was accompanied by a most hearty greeting, and it was evident to me that the HERALD of Boston was well known to Richter. I quickly found that he had been besieged by my associates of the Vienna press, and had been compelled to be courteously reticent toward all callers. He, however, expressed himself as entirely willing to speak to me for publication in America.

He is well-known for his immense energy in all that he undertakes, and when once he has decided upon a given course he is quite as apt to accomplish it as the typical American. The knowledge of this peculiarity has set all Vienna talking about Richter's plan of going to America since it has been known that he signed his contract with Mr. Higginson on Thursday, and his duties to the opera and the government have been widely discussed in all art circles here. I called his attention to the publication in today's paper of a statement that his contract with the opera house has four more years to run, and that he cannot retire until its expiration.

248

This did not appear to affect him in any way, and he simply reiterated his statement that he should fulfil his contract with Mr. Higginson to the letter.

He told me that

His Boston Contract
calls for his direction of two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of next October, and his duties under his new contract will, he thinks, be a great relief after those he has been subjected to here.

The two reasons which have led him to accept Mr. Higginson's contract are, first, a feeling that it will give him a relief from the overwork now imposed upon him here, which he feels the need of; and, second, what I am satisfied is a thorough and sincere admiration for and sympathy with the American people and American ideas.

Financially he is so situated that whatever money inducement has been held out by Mr. Higginson would have little or no influence upon his action in the matter.

When I ventured to suggest that he might find obstacles to carrying out his plans from his official associations he scowled in the way all who have ever played under him will readily remember, and said that he should carry out his contract with Mr. Higginson at any cost. He added, with a smile, that when once in America he expected he should quickly become thoroughly identified with its people, manners and ideas. For a resident of Vienna this is an approach to heresy, for Vienna is the world in the popular belief here. Richter told me that his plans had not been changed regarding his Chicago concerts as a part of the series associated with the exposition there. He will leave here early in June, and return immediately after his short stay in Chicago, to prepare to take his wife and family to Boston, in which city he expects to be established permanently by the middle of next September.

It is difficult for me to convey to the HERALD readers the

Consternation in Art Circles
here over this intended departure of Richter. It will be apparent from the facts that he directs the choral church service at the Imperial Chapel, is first director at the Grand Opera and conductor of the Philharmonic Society that he is thoroughly identified with Vienna art life. It does not appear to be realized here that all these duties make demands upon such a man that even his great energy is not at all times sufficient to carry him through them all.

From a pecuniary standpoint, although I am not at liberty to quote figures, I can say that the two concerts each week will give a much better return to Richter than all his engagements here.

Tomorrow Richter directs for the last time here the ninth symphony, and the excitement over the event is widespread. A grand ovation awaits him upon his appearance at the conductor's desk, and he will be made to realize once more how large a place he holds in the hearts of the Vienna musical public.

I am satisfied that Wilhelm Gericke, the former director of the Boston orchestra, has had not a little to do with the decision of Richter in regard to Mr. Higginson's contract, and I should not be surprised if it was largely due to his influence that Boston is to have the services of the greatest orchestral conductor now in Europe.

SOME LOCAL CHATS.

It is to be assumed that intelligent Bostonians know who Hans Richter is and what he has done. Certainly there can be few who are at all interested in the line of effort in the art world with which he is so prominently identified who do not know of his man and his life work.

Well knowing the almost unreasonable reticence of Mr. H. L. Higginson in regard to his association with the Symphony orchestra, it appeared useless to trouble him by asking further questions as to the coming of Hans Richter.

The HERALD was duly notified of negotiations pending for a successor to Mr. Nikisch, and assured that so soon as an engagement was definitely made the fact should be made public officially. It was not until yesterday morning that Mr. Higginson had any certainty that he had a contract with Mr. Richter, despite the fact that the press at large had settled the matter definitely. Courtesy to Mr. Higginson appeared to demand delayed action in giving publicity to his own private business, especially as the city at large is, and has been, his debtor for years for the possession of the best orchestra in America.

In chatting with members of the Boston orchestra who have played under the baton of Mr. Richter in Europe, some facts were gained which will be of interest at the present time. It may be said at once that he has the profound respect of all with whom he came in contact, and that he is a polished gentleman, and one whose acquaintance or friendship is eagerly sought.

His masterly skill is spoken of with almost reverence by the men he has directed, and he is admitted to be the most successful organizer of orchestras now before the public in Europe. This is the universal comment of the musicians of the Boston orchestra who have played under Hans Richter.

Mr. Charles R. Adams, the tenor singer, has had peculiarly good opportunities to know Hans Richter personally and to form an estimate of his abilities both as an operatic and concert conductor. He confirms all that the men of the Boston orchestra say of their former leader, and says that his reputation as the first conductor of Europe is well deserved. In regard to his tastes, Mr. Adams thinks we will be found to be quite as classical as Mr. Gericke, if not even having a stronger bearing toward the severer classes of orchestral works. Mr. Adams speaks in the highest terms of Richter personally, and says he will be found a delightful man by all with whom he is brought in contact.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PETER ILYITCH TSCHAIKOWSKY. OVERTURE-FANTASY.
"Romeo and Juliet."

FRANZ LISZT. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in A major.

BACH. PRÆLUDIUM, ADAGIO AND GAVOTTE, for
STRING ORCHESTRA.
(Arranged by Bachrich.)

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60.

- I. Adagio. B flat major.
- Allegro vivace. B flat major.
- II. Adagio. E flat major.
- III. Allegro vivace. B flat major.
- Trio: Un poco meno allegro. B flat major.
- IV. Allegro ma non troppo. B flat major.

SOLOIST:

MR. FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

that his contract with the opera house has four more years to run, and that he cannot retire until its expiration. This did not appear to affect him in any way, and he simply reiterated his statement that he should fulfil his contract with Mr. Higginson to the letter. He told me that calls for his direction of two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of next October, and his duties under his new contract will, he thinks, be a great relief after those he has been subjected to here.

His Boston Contract

The two reasons which have led him to accept Mr. Higginson's contract are, first, a feeling that it will give him a relief from the overwork now imposed upon him here, which he feels the need of; and, second, what I am satisfied is a thorough and sincere admiration for and sympathy with the American people and American ideas.

Financially he is so situated that whatever money inducement has been held out by Mr. Higginson would have little or no influence upon his action in the matter.

When I ventured to suggest that he might find obstacles to carrying out his plans from his official associations he scowled in the way all who have ever played under him will readily remember, and said that he should carry out his contract with Mr. Higginson at any cost. He added, with a smile, that when once in America he expected he should quickly become thoroughly identified with its people, manners and ideas. For a resident of Vienna this is an approach to heresy, for Vienna is the world in the popular belief here. Richter told me that his plans had not been changed regarding his Chicago concerts as a part of the series associated with the exposition there. He will leave here early in June, and return immediately after his short stay in Chicago, to prepare to take his wife and family to Boston, in which city he expects to be established permanently by the middle of next September.

It is difficult for me to convey to the HERALD readers the

Consternation in Art Circles

here over this intended departure of Richter. It will be apparent from the facts that he directs the choral church service at the Imperial Chapel, is first director at the Grand Opera and conductor of the Philharmonic Society that he is thoroughly identified with Vienna art life. It does not appear to be realized here that all these duties make demands upon such a man that even his great energy is not at all times sufficient to carry him through them all.

From a pecuniary standpoint, although I am not at liberty to quote figures, I can say that the two concerts each week will give a much better return to Richter than all his engagements here.

Tomorrow Richter directs for the last time here the ninth symphony, and the excitement over the event is widespread. A grand ovation awaits him upon his appearance at the conductor's desk, and he will be made to realize once more how large a place he holds in the hearts of the Vienna musical public.

I am satisfied that Wilhelm Gericke, the former director of the Boston orchestra, has had not a little to do with the decision of Richter in regard to Mr. Higginson's contract, and I should not be surprised if it was largely due to his influence that Boston is to have the services of the greatest orchestral conductor now in Europe.

SOME LOCAL CHATS.

It is to be assumed that intelligent Bostonians know who Hans Richter is and what he has done. Certainly there can be few who are at all interested in the line of effort in the art world with which he is so prominently identified who do not know of his man and his life work.

Well knowing the almost unreasonable reticence of Mr. H. L. Higginson in regard to his association with the Symphony orchestra, it appeared useless to trouble him by asking further questions as to the coming of Hans Richter.

The HERALD was duly notified of negotiations pending for a successor to Mr. Nikisch, and assured that so soon as an engagement was definitely made the fact should be made public officially. It was not until yesterday morning that Mr. Higginson had any certainty that he had a contract with Mr. Richter, despite the fact that the press at large had settled the matter definitely. Courtesy to Mr. Higginson appeared to demand delayed action in giving publicity to his own private business, especially as the city at large is, and has been, his debtor for years for the possession of the best orchestra in America.

In chatting with members of the Boston orchestra who have played under the baton of Mr. Richter in Europe, some facts were gained which will be of interest at the present time. It may be said at once that he has the profound respect of all with whom he came in contact, and that he is a polished gentleman, and one whose acquaintance or friendship is eagerly sought.

His masterly skill is spoken of with almost reverence by the men he has directed, and he is admitted to be the most successful and he is admitted to be the most successful organizer of orchestras now before the public in Europe. This is the universal comment of the musicians of the Boston orchestra who have played under Hans Richter.

Mr. Charles R. Adams, the tenor singer, has had peculiarly good opportunities to know Hans Richter personally and to form an estimate of his abilities both as an operatic and concert conductor. He confirms all that the men of the Boston orchestra say of their former leader, and says that his reputation as the first conductor of Europe is well deserved. In regard to his tastes, Mr. Adams thinks we will be found to be quite as classical as Mr. Gericke, if not even having a stronger bearing toward the severer classes of orchestral works. Mr. Adams speaks in the highest terms of Richter personally, and says he will be found a delightful man by all with whom he is brought in contact.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PETER ILYITCH TSCHAIKOWSKY. OVERTURE-FANTASY.
"Romeo and Juliet."

FRANZ LISZT. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in A major.

BACH. PRÆLUDIUM, ADAGIO AND GAVOTTE, for
STRING ORCHESTRA.
(Arranged by Bachrich.)

LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60.

- I. Adagio. B flat major.
- Allegro vivace. B flat major.
- II. Adagio. B flat major.
- III. Allegro vivace. B flat major.
- Trio: Un poco meno allegro. B flat major.
- IV. Allegro ma non troppo. B flat major.

SOLOIST:

MR. FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

The Symphony Concert.

Blessings brighten as they take their flight; some of the recent overture readings in our symphony concerts have been remarkable, and Tschaiakowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture was a most brilliant piece of work from beginning to end. Among the many musical thoughts that Shakespeare's play has inspired, ranging all the way from operas to symphonies, this great overture may be accorded a prominent place. It deals more with the feud of Montagues and Capulets than with the young pair, but Romeo is present on the English horn, and Juliet on the muted violins. To these instruments and to the pizzicati of the contrabasses and the fiery trumpet passages the chief praise must be given, but every part was well sustained and the performance was a pronounced success in the modern style.

Upon the heels of this came more spice in the shape of Liszt's piano concerto in A major. Liszt's concertos are not concertos in the sense in which Beethoven and Brahms have employed the term, and they depart altogether from the form which Mozart founded; they are free rhapsodies for the piano combined with orchestra and present, instead of any symmetrical shape, continuity and development. The concerto in E flat will ever be the more popular work of the two, but for all that this one in A major is immensely the greater music. De l'Audace, de l'Audace, et toujours de l'Audace might well be the motto of the work; but it has an audacity which compels admiration. It is not according to rule; then so much the worse for the rules. Never has the work had so perfect a presentation in Boston; the pianist, Ferruccio Busoni, won a triumph which is all the more remarkable as coming from a Pakerewski-saturated public. The work seems to touch the boundaries of technique on every side, and the utmost lightness and rapidity in passagen and runs is there as well as the heaviest chord passages and the most dangerous skips. It may be sweepingly stated that the pianist met every exaction with absolute surety and entirely mastered every difficulty, so that technique properly became a means and not an end; one thought of the poetry of the work and not of its difficulty. The orchestra was inspired by the exaltation of the soloist and played with a perfect ensemble in the midst of most elastic caprice. After the finale it seemed as if the applause would never cease. At last the prophet received honor in his own country. And now, suddenly, the orchestra renounced the world, the flesh, and the piccolo, and turned from modern agony to classic purity, from Tschaiakowsky and Liszt to Bach and Beethoven. The change was perhaps a trifle too abrupt and neither the audience nor the musicians could at once adapt themselves to the new condition of things; the playing was not so perfect as in the preceding works. The Bach prelude seemed taken at too quick a pace, an impossible speed for the contrabasses, but the adagio was finely rendered on the first violins, and the gavotte was crisply and clearly given. If only our modern gavotte composers would study the shape which Bach always uses in this dance the musical repertoire would be the gainer; always beginning the quadruple rhythm on the third beat, he gains that light syncopation which is one of the charms of the form; the skipping style is always present in his chief theme, and if there be a musette as trio (here there was none) the flowing style is introduced as contrast. Short and incisive phrases, too, are always in order. How few of the modern Gavottes follow the above model!

It was delightful to find Bach applauded with as much heartiness as Tschaiakowsky. The set of Bach pieces had been arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich, but not modernized or tampered with to any degree.

With Beethoven's fourth symphony the concert ended. While praising the reading of the second movement, the reviewer can take exception to the speed of the finale and its extreme caprice. This symphony bears a hornet sting in its tail, for the coda has a passage for the contrabasses that would be difficult even for violins; at the pace at which it was given it was bound to be blurred. Beethoven's fourth symphony bears capricious treatment better than any of the others of the nine, but one does not like to see too much individuality in a Beethoven performance in any case.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Twentieth Symphony Programme.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist at the Symphony concert last evening, playing Liszt's concerto No. 2 in A major. The reception accorded the artist indicated the appreciation which concert patrons feel for this cultivated exponent of the divine art, who during the winter season has firmly established himself in the ranks of our foremost musicians.

The concerto has no title, and is probably a characteristic piece of brilliant composition by Liszt in which melody runs riot in ever-changing harmonies and instrumental variations. Mr. Busoni played superbly and without an attempt at theatric effects. His modesty of demeanor impresses his audience with the idea that the artist is thoroughly in love with his art for art's sake alone, and that he interprets the author conscientiously, honestly and with true artistic feeling.

Mr. Busoni's touch is musical and correct. His use of the pedals is judicious, and he preserves the balance of power without undue contrasts of light and shade. His execution is brilliant and very rapid, and the whimsical and fantastic concerto was given with a spirit and dash which aroused great enthusiasm. The performer was recalled at the close of the piece half a dozen times.

The orchestral numbers were Tschaiakowsky's overture, "Romeo and Juliet," Bach's three movements for violin, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich, and Beethoven's beautiful fourth symphony.

The love theme in the Tschaiakowsky number was wonderfully well played, and the performance by the strings in Bach's composition was also a notable example of fine ensemble work by that contingent. Beethoven's symphony calls for high praise, the orchestra as a whole scoring the best results in the grand composition.

This week the programme for the rehearsal and concert will be solos by Mr. Max Heinrich, a dramatic overture for the first time by Margaret Ruthven Lang, Haydn's symphony in C minor, No. 9, and a scherzo by Antonin Dvorak.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Handel's "Samson"—Notes.

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Music Hall last evening. The following was the programme: Overture—fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikowsky; Concerto No. 2 in A major, Liszt; Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte, Bach; and Symphony No. 4, Beethoven. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the soloist.

The playing of the orchestra throughout the evening, with one or two exceptions, calls for high praise. Delicacy, precision and discreet power were happily present. Never under the present regime has the work of the orchestra been so gratifying. Had the accompaniment to the piano concerto been less boisterous, and the fortes of the Bach "Gavotte" less exaggerated, the playing would have been admirable in every respect. The need of a conductor with better judgment and more vigilant attention was unfortunately evident in the accompaniment to Mr. Busoni's solo; one with delicacy and discretion sufficient to restrain the overloud manner of the band. Objection might be raised to the tempi of the Symphony No. 4 of Beethoven, but so far as the rendering is concerned, the playing of the orchestra commands high praise. Had the orchestra during the past four seasons played always in the manner it did on Saturday evening there would have been little necessity for the frequent severe criticisms to which its efforts have been subjected at the hands of the majority of the critics of this city. It must be mentioned that the "Romeo and Juliet" Fantasie was played with splendid effect. All of these orchestral works were warmly applauded by the audience.

Mr. Busoni gave a superb rendering of the Liszt concerto. A more masterly effort is seldom heard in our concert halls. The ease and brilliancy that marked his playing were simply wonderful. Delicacy and beauty of touch, rhythmic excellence and a powerful grasp of technical facility in the broader parts of the work in conjunction with many other excellences served to display the extraordinary ability of this remarkably proficient artist. The audience recognized his superb performance, and in the most enthusiastic manner recalled him several times. Mr. Busoni was the recipient also of a mammoth laurel wreath. Here is an artist whose career will be watched with the greatest interest by the critical listeners of this city. Paderewski, the warm-hearted, generous, noble and handsome, sat at the entrance to the ante-room during the playing of Mr. Busoni and applauded his brother artist warmly. Next Saturday the programme will embrace a "dramatic overture by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang (from manuscript); "Scherzo Capriccioso," Dvorak; Symphony in C minor, Haydn; and some vocal numbers by Mr. Max Heinrich.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture—fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikowsky
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, A major, Liszt
Praeludium, adagio and gavotte, for string orchestra (arranged by Bachrich), Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, Beethoven

Mr. Busoni was the pianist, and he gave a remarkable performance of the fantastic concerto of Liszt. He appeared not only as a virtuoso of supreme excellence; he displayed refined taste and rare self-control. There was an ever-present appreciation of values; there was the keenest sense of the relation of the solo instrument to the orchestra. Conventional words of praise are here a mockery. Such a performance is an event in these days of musical sentimentalism, affectation, eccentricity and worship of personality; it puts the player in the very front rank of pianists.

The noble, passionate overture of Tchaikowsky gains in effect with each hearing. The objection has been urged against it that there is too much shock of warring factions; but does not the prologue of the play itself lay stress on the ancient grudge, the new mutiny, civil blood making civil hands unclean? With-out the riots in the streets of Verona, Romeo, having wedded his second sweetheart, would have grown old and fat and bald. There is hot love enough in this overture; for nothing can surpass the noble sensuousness of the chant of love, the chant of despairing, triumphant passion.

The other numbers are familiar to our concert-goers and do not call for comment. The programme of the concert of next Saturday will be as follows: Dramatic overture (MSS.), Miss Lang; Scherzo capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak; symphony, C minor, No. 9 (B. and H.), Haydn. Mr. Max Heinrich will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

It has been suggested to the Listener that a subscription be started to purchase felt shoes for the ushers at Music Hall. To have a delicate instrumental passage interrupted by the creaking of an usher's shoes, as actually happened the other evening, is barbarous. Why should not ushers and other assistants in public places, where perfect silence is required, wear felt shoes, anyway, as nurses do in sick chambers? These shoes are sufficiently warm, perfectly sightly, and noiseless. There are probably no leather shoes, however carefully made and however pumice-stoned between the soles, that can be regarded as creak-proof on all occasions. They may behave perfectly well for weeks and months, and then squeak abominably when it is most necessary that they shall be silent. Slippers are out of the question, because, though they do not squeak, they generally make a disagreeable squashing sound. Ushers' shoes are among the things that should be felt and not heard.

MUSIC.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The composers chosen for the twentieth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening were Tchaikowsky, Liszt, Dvorak and Beethoven. The concert had as its chief attraction the performance of the concerto in A major, No. 2, by Franz Liszt. The soloist was Mr. Ferruccio Busoni. The concerto is the product of Liszt's best period. In it the old established concerto form is conspicuous by its absence. It thus antagonizes the musical conservator, but as an interesting type of Liszt's individuality and of that school of pianoforte music of which he was the pioneer, the concerto will always remain a masterpiece. The orchestral score of the work is richly endowed; the themes are impressively rhythmical as well as poetic and they are linked together with masterly power into a homogeneous whole of the profoundest interest. Mr. Busoni's performance of it was extraordinary. It was photographically clear and accurate in its loyalty to the concerto, while the depth of perception and truth of delineation that constantly attended it could not have a more perfect medium for their natural expression than the artist's eminently well-rounded and unerring technique. The huge and fantastic outlines of the work, the bold modulations and quaintly marked rhythms, the subtle melodic turns and exuberant ornamentation were one and all presented with the strictest attention to detail, and yet with the utmost refinement and ease.

In brief Mr. Busoni was a virtuoso par excellence with the work. Its herculean difficulties were easily at his command. He played it not simply as a pianist with superbly trained fingers, but also as a musician of the highest endowments. At the conclusion of his performance he was honored with the most prolonged ovation that has been bestowed upon any artist at the Symphony concerts this season. The "Romeo and Juliet" overture by Tchaikowsky more nearly approximates the symphonic poem than any other instrumental form. The composer offers no exposition of its poetic basis, and all one can glean from it is the reference on the title page, "After Shakespeare." The music, however, is replete with evidence that it was the great love-drama of the poet that inspired the composer, who has not been especially influenced, however, by its love episodes. Hence the work has more power than sentiment. One need not question long before deciding that two scenes of Shakespeare's drama are unmistakably embodied in the music, — namely, the combat between the Montagues and Capulets, and the fete at Juliet's father's house.

The temperamental affinity to the exciting and dramatic spirit of the work which characterized Mr. Nikisch's reading was very noticeable in its effect upon the orchestral performance. The fortes, pianos, crescendos, diminuendos and the wide variety of nuances with which the score abounds were one and all excellently observed. The Praeludium, adagio and gavotte by Bach, arranged for orchestra by S. Bachrich from the composer's violin sonatas received the refined, scholarly and interesting treatment of a thoroughly loyal reading. The fourth symphony of Beethoven was finished in 1806. It lies between two greater ones, an expression of absolute sunshine and joviality, which came so rarely in the composer's life. It followed the "Ervica" after two years, and antedated the symphony in C minor, No. 5, two years. The symphony stands in great contrast to those that preceded it, not alone because its theme is less mighty than the "Ervica," but because of the new manner and constant surprises in style of its opus. Beethoven's versatility was extraordinary, scarcely ever does he repeat himself. Each of the nine symphonies differs from the other, and each introduction, allegro, andante, scherzo and finale is quite distinct from each corresponding movement of the other eight.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tchaikowsky: Overture—Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."

Liszt: Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in A major.
Bach: Praeludium, Adagio and Gavotte, from the violin sonatas, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.
Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the pianist.

Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" grows in favor with every hearing. We have heard some musicians pronounce it, not only Tchaikowsky's greatest work, but one of the greatest compositions of modern times. There must be something wrong about us, for we fail to see it. Even among Tchaikowsky's own works, we should hesitate to rank it higher than the B-flat minor pianoforte concerto. It is a brilliant, dramatic composition, the rapid parts of which have at times a strong smack of Meyerbeer, and in other parts of which there is no little depth of real feeling shown. But we can see nothing in it that entitles it to be called really great; the famous second theme, about which so much talk is made, seems to us emotionally rather than purely melodically beautiful; and this very theme is so marred in our ears by that obstinately and tiresomely persistent accompanying counter-figure on the horns, that it is exceedingly hard for us to feel its full beauty. The work was splendidly played, and rapturously received. It is always a source of pleasure to hear anything by Bach; even transcriptions cannot lose all their charm. The three movements chosen by Bachrich for arrangement for string orchestra are fine examples of his style. But, in transferring them from violin solo to all the strings, the transcriber has not always done his work in the most effective way, and some of the passages where he has distributed the original violin part among two or three orchestral parts do not sound quite so well as they look on paper. Beethoven's ever-beautiful fourth symphony was excellently played, the orchestra doing especially fine work in the Adagio. We were glad, too, to find Mr. Nikisch take the Finale at somewhat less of a break-neck pace than some conductors do.

Mr. Busoni made an absolutely superb impression in the Liszt concerto. The work itself has always seemed to us exceedingly brilliant, with a sort of kaleidoscopic magic in its effectiveness. To this side of it Mr. Busoni did the fullest justice; but he also did much more and better; he is the first pianist we have yet heard play the work who has shown it to us as a coherently written and artistically balanced composition; he really makes musical sense out of it. How much musical brain power this task requires can best be appreciated by those who have attempted it themselves; still, those who can compare Mr. Busoni's triumphant success in performing it with the comparative failures of other pianists who have tried it here, can form at least some idea of it. Mr. Busoni's playing was marked by every fine quality; in a word, it was completely masterly. The audience showed that they knew a good thing when they heard it by the rapturous way in which they recalled the pianist again and again when his performance was over.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Handel's "Samson"—Notes.

The 50th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Music Hall last evening. The following was the programme: Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikowsky; Concerto No. 2 in A major, Liszt; Prelude, Adagio and Gavotte, Bach; and Symphony No. 4, Beethoven. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the soloist.

The playing of the orchestra throughout the evening, with one or two exceptions, calls for high praise. Delicacy, precision and discreet power were happily present. Never under the present regime has the work of the orchestra been so gratifying. Had the accompaniment to the piano concerto been less boisterous, and the fortes of the Bach "Gavotte" less exaggerated, the playing would have been admirable in every respect. The need of a conductor with better judgment and more vigilant attention was unfortunately evident in the accompaniment to Mr. Busoni's solo; one with delicacy and discretion sufficient to restrain the overloud manner of the band. Objection might be raised to the tempi of the Symphony No. 4 of Beethoven, but so far as the rendering is concerned, the playing of the orchestra commands high praise. Had the orchestra during the past four seasons played always in the manner it did on Saturday evening there would have been little necessity for the frequent severe criticisms to which its efforts have been subjected at the hands of the majority of the critics of this city. It must be mentioned that the "Romeo and Juliet" Fantasia was played with splendid effect. All of these orchestral works were warmly applauded by the audience.

Mr. Busoni gave a superb rendering of the Liszt concerto. A more masterly effort is seldom heard in our concert halls. The ease and brilliancy that marked his playing were simply wonderful. Delicacy and beauty of touch, rhythmic excellence and a powerful grasp of technical facility in the broader parts of the work in conjunction with many other excellences served to display the extraordinary ability of this remarkably proficient artist. The audience recognized his superb performance, and in the most enthusiastic manner recalled him several times. Mr. Busoni was the recipient also of a mammoth laurel wreath. Here is an artist whose career will be watched with the greatest interest by the critical listeners of this city. Paderewski, the warm-hearted, generous, noble and handsome, sat at the entrance to the ante-room during the playing of Mr. Busoni and applauded his brother artist warmly. Next Saturday the programme will embrace a dramatic overture by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang (from manuscript); "Scherzo Capriccioso," Dvorak; Symphony in C minor, Haydn; and some vocal numbers by Mr. Max Heinrich.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twentieth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," Tchaikowsky
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, A major, Liszt
Praeludium, adagio and gavotte, for string orchestra (arranged by Bachrich)..... Bach
Symphony No. 4..... Beethoven

Mr. Busoni was the pianist, and he gave a remarkable performance of the fantastic concerto of Liszt. He appeared not only as a virtuoso of supreme excellence; he displayed refined taste and rare self-control. There was an ever-present appreciation of values; there was the keenest sense of the relation of the solo instrument to the orchestra. Conventional words of praise are here a mockery. Such a performance is an event in these days of musical sentimentalism, affectation, eccentricity and worship of personality; it puts the player in the very front rank of pianists.

The noble, passionate overture of Tchaikowsky gains in effect with each hearing. The objection has been urged against it that there is too much shock of warring factions; but does not the prologue of the play itself lay stress on the ancient grudge, the new mutiny, civil blood making civil hands unclean? With-out the riots in the streets of Verona, Romeo, having wedded his second sweetheart, would have grown old and fat and bald. There is not love enough in this overture; for nothing can surpass the noble sensuousness of the chant of love, the chant of despairing, triumphant passion.

The other numbers are familiar to our concert-goers and do not call for comment. The programme of the concert of next Saturday will be as follows: Dramatic overture (MSS.), Miss Lang; Scherzo capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak; symphony, C minor, No. 9 (B. and H.), Haydn. Mr. Max Heinrich will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

It has been suggested to the listener that a subscription be started to purchase felt shoes for the ushers at Music Hall. To have a delicate instrumental passage interrupted by the creaking of an usher's shoes, as actually happened the other evening, is barbarous. Why should not ushers and other assistants in public places, where perfect silence is required, wear felt shoes, anyway, as nurses do in sick chambers? These shoes are sufficiently warm, perfectly sightly, and noiseless. There are probably no leather shoes, however carefully made and however pumice-stoned between the soles, that can be regarded as creak-proof on all occasions. They may behave perfectly well for weeks and months, and then squeak abominably when it is most necessary that they shall be silent. Slippers are out of the question, because, though they do not squeak, they generally make a disagreeable squashing sound. Ushers' shoes are among the things that should be felt and not heard.

MUSIC.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The composers chosen for the twentieth symphony concert in Music Hall last evening were Tchaikowsky, Liszt, Dvorak and Beethoven. The concert had as its chief attraction the performance of the concerto in A major, No. 2, by Franz Liszt. The soloist was Mr. Ferruccio Busoni. The concerto is the product of Liszt's best period. In it the old established concerto form is conspicuous by its absence. It thus antagonizes the musical conservator, but as an interesting type of Liszt's individuality and of that school of pianoforte music of which he was the pioneer, the concerto will always remain a masterpiece. The orchestral score of the work is richly endowed; the themes are impressively rhythmical as well as poetic and they are linked together with masterly power into a homogeneous whole of the profoundest interest. Mr. Busoni's performance of it was extraordinary. It was photographically clear and accurate in its loyalty to the concerto, while the depth of perception and truth of delineation that constantly attended it could not have a more perfect medium for their natural expression than the artist's eminently well-rounded and unerring technique. The huge and fantastic outlines of the work, the bold modulations and quaintly marked rhythms, the subtle melodic turns and exuberant ornamentation were one and all presented with the strictest attention to detail, and yet with the utmost refinement and ease.

In brief Mr. Busoni was a virtuoso par excellence with the work. Its herculean difficulties were easily at his command. He played it not simply as a pianist with superbly trained fingers, but also as a musician of the highest endowments. At the conclusion of his performance he was honored with the most prolonged ovation that has been bestowed upon any artist at the Symphony concerts this season. The "Romeo and Juliet" overture by Tchaikowsky more nearly approximates the symphonic poem than any other instrumental form. The composer offers no exposition of its poetic basis, and all one can glean from it is the reference on the title page, "After Shakespeare." The music, however, is replete with evidence that it was the great love-drama of the poet that inspired the composer, who has not been especially influenced, however, by its love episodes. Hence the work has more power than sentiment. One need not question long before deciding that two scenes of Shakespeare's drama are unmistakably embodied in the music, — namely, the combat between the Montagues and Capulets, and the fete at Juliet's father's house.

The temperamental affinity to the exciting and dramatic spirit of the work which characterized Mr. Nikisch's reading was very noticeable in its effect upon the orchestral performance. The fortes, pianos, crescendos, diminuendos and the wide variety of nuances with which the score abounds were one and all excellently observed. The Praeludium, adagio and gavotte by Bach, arranged for orchestra by S. Bachrich from the composer's violin sonatas received the refined, scholarly and interesting treatment of a thoroughly loyal reading. The fourth symphony of Beethoven was finished in 1806. It lies between two greater ones, an expression of absolute sunshine and joyfulness, which came so rarely in the composer's life. It followed the "Ervica" after two years, and antedated the symphony in C minor, No. 5, two years. The symphony stands in great contrast to those that preceded it, not alone because its theme is less mighty than the "Ervica," but because of the new manner and constant surprises in style of its opus. Beethoven's versatility was extraordinary, scarcely ever does he repeat himself. Each of the nine symphonies differs from the other, and each introduction, allegro, andante, scherzo and finale is quite distinct from each corresponding movement of the other eight.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tchaikowsky: Overture—Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."
Liszt: Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in A major.
Bach: Praeludium, Adagio and Gavotte, from the violin sonatas, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni was the pianist.

Tchaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" grows in favor with every hearing. We have heard some musicians pronounce it, not only Tchaikowsky's greatest work, but one of the greatest compositions of modern times. There must be something wrong about us, for we fail to see it. Even among Tchaikowsky's own works, we should hesitate to rank it higher than the B-flat minor pianoforte concerto. It is a brilliant, dramatic composition, the rapid parts of which have at times a strong smack of Meyerbeer, and in other parts of which there is no little depth of real feeling shown. But we can see nothing in it that entitles it to be called really great; the famous second theme, about which so much talk is made, seems to us emotionally rather than purely melodically beautiful; and this very theme is so marred in our ears by that obstinately and tiresomely persistent accompanying counter-figure on the horns, that it is exceedingly hard for us to feel its full beauty. The work was splendidly played, and rapturously received. It is always a source of pleasure to hear anything by Bach; even transcriptions cannot lose all their charm. The three movements chosen by Bachrich for arrangement for string orchestra are fine examples of his style. But, in transferring them from violin solo to all the strings, the transcriber has not always done his work in the most effective way, and some of the passages where he has distributed the original violin part among two or three orchestral parts do not sound quite so well as they look on paper. Beethoven's ever-beautiful fourth symphony was excellently played, the orchestra doing especially fine work in the Adagio. We were glad, too, to find Mr. Nikisch take the Finale at somewhat less of a break-neck pace than some conductors do.

Mr. Busoni made an absolutely superb impression in the Liszt concerto. The work itself has always seemed to us exceedingly brilliant, with a sort of kaleidoscopic magic in its effectiveness. To this side of it Mr. Busoni did the fullest justice; but he also did much more and better; he is the first pianist we have yet heard play the work who has shown it to us as a coherently written and artistically balanced composition; he really makes musical sense out of it. How much musical brain power this task requires can best be appreciated by those who have attempted it themselves; still, those who can compare Mr. Busoni's triumphant success in performing it with the comparative failures of other pianists who have tried it here, can form at least some idea of it. Mr. Busoni's playing was marked by every fine quality; in a word, it was completely masterly. The audience showed that they knew a good thing when they heard it by the rapturous way in which they recalled the pianist again and again when his performance was over.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Busoni.

"The Mountebanks," with Lillian Russell—"The Isle of Champagne" Relocated—Paderewski's Ovation Yesterday—Columbian Festival—The Hinrich Opera Company's Season.

At the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, the soloist was Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, the pianist whose recent series of recitals attracted so much attention.

Mr. Busoni chose for his appearance the concerto No. 2 in A major, by Liszt, which proved an excellent selection for the display of his abilities as a brilliant concert artist.

His masterly work throughout the concerto, his remarkably clear touch, technical proficiency and faultless accuracy, all combined to give the best results, and he held his own against the occasionally overwhelming volume of the orchestra with splendid effect.

He was made the object of quite an ovation as he concluded the concerto, and was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

Director Nikisch took occasion to show the string players in the Bachrich arrangement of Bach's "Prelude, adagio and gavotte," and the men of this section of the band did some notably good work in their playing in this number of the programme, the final movement creating a marked impression upon the audience and winning a well merited recognition of the excellence of the string players.

The admirable "overture fantasy" by Tchaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet," was given a most satisfactory interpretation at the beginning of the evening, and the fourth of the "Immortal nine" symphonies brought the concert to an end, the recital of the several movements of Beethoven's work gaining Director Nikisch unstinted applause.

Mr. Max Heinrich will be the soloist next week, and the orchestra will play a new "dramatic overture" by Margaret Ruthven Lang, the scherzo capriccioso by Dvorak, and Haydn's symphony in C minor, No. 9 (B. & H.).

UNIQUE NIKISCH.

Some of His Strong Points and His Weak Ones,

And Why He Has Decided to Leave Boston.

Arthur Nikisch is unique.

I can easily imagine him as saying: "Let the critics fire away and do their worst. I have my own ideas how these pieces should be played, and I am in the position to have them played as I wish."

He rarely reads the comments of the press on his work. He hasn't time, and what is more, he hasn't the inclination.

I have been more and more surprised that Mr. Nikisch should think of leaving Boston. He has legions of friends here, and is making money fast.

During his two years' sojourn here he received five or six splendid offers to direct orchestras in Germany. But he always declined. The offer from Frankfurt he threw into the waste basket.

Of course the only reason why he is going to leave us in the lurch is that he can do better at Pesth. There he will have several assistant directors under him.

This is his own reason, as he gives it, and that of his friends.

Full of Vim.

I called upon a well-known lady in the Back Bay yesterday to see if she wouldn't talk about Mr. Nikisch. "Ah," she said, "Mr. Nikisch is such a man, so full of strong emotion and vim! He stands before his men and seems to electrify them by his enthusiasm. They become as sensitive to his baton as a needle to a lodestone."

"How thoroughly he enters into the soul of the pieces he directs! Every note has its significance to him, and he feels the sentiment suggested through and through. Then he begins to lead the music and his crescendos and diminuendos, his retards and piu mossoes, often metamorphose the very character of the piece."

"I am grieved that we are to lose the director—our great director, I should say—whose originality is so extraordinary and brilliant."

Not Complimentary.

There are several well-known musical critics in Boston who never did like Mr. Nikisch, and one of them thus spoke of the symphony director:—

"In plain English, Nikisch is a 'faker' and allows his eccentricity to run away with him. John Mullahy is 10 times a better and more substantial director than he. Why, Nikisch came here with scarcely any experience in symphonic music, and the first time he stood up before the orchestra he gave himself all away. The men in the orchestra saw what he was in a minute."

"He was lax in authority. I told members of the orchestra at the time that they had a different man from Gericke, and they knew it. To lead the Symphony Orchestra a man must have an inflexible command, as Gericke did, and as Nikisch has not."

He is too explosive, too fiery, to please anybody but enthusiasts. What we want is a man of iron like Gericke."

His Individuality.

Prof. J. R. Felton of the New England Conservatory gave me the following crisp interview about Mr. Nikisch and his work:—

"I have always enjoyed Mr. Nikisch's productions exceedingly. They abound in individuality and originality. Of course his ideas may not please everybody. As many heads, so many opinions,—tantis fests, quanti cervelli."

"He is spontaneous and shows us pieces in a new light. Hungarian is a fiery blood and makes fiery music. Have you not noticed that his renderings of a piece are always different? Once played, that ends it. The next time there is a brand-new edition."

An Inspired Magician.

"Take an accomplished singer and under the inspiration of the moment he will vary his music. So with Mr. Nikisch; there he stands, an inspired magician, unfettered by rules that are generally immutable by directors. And, by the way, let his orchestra accompany a vocalist and his sympathetic leading follows the singer with extraordinary facility, even in the most sudden departure from the accustomed rendering. He is as quick as a flash and as brilliant! While others ponder and reflect he does the thing off-hand, a genius of the moment, a meteor in the sky."

"He was not a leader of the symphony before he came to America, but here he has acclimatized himself rapidly to his new conditions and grasped the idea quickly. The first year he memorized all his scores and so conducted all the symphonies. Berlioz's music could not be played better than he has it played, and Berlioz is one of the most difficult composers to conduct. He is thoroughly a master hand with Haydn and conducts his pieces with wonderful skill and ingenuity."

Will Always Be Popular.

Prof. Elson answered my questions as follows:—

"As director of the Symphony Orchestra has Mr. Nikisch been a success?"

"I deem Mr. Nikisch emphatically a musician, and he is always likely to be popular. But while he has shown himself to be great in certain directions, I by no means consider him great in all. He is scarcely of the symphonic temperament."

"In what line is he specially gifted?"

"Well, you know that he has had operatic training, and in that direction he is most proficient."

"How does he compare with Gericke?"

"Gericke is a man eminently proficient in the symphony and is a superb drillmaster. The difference between the two leaders has been shown admirably in their ideas of how Beethoven's ninth symphony should be played. The first movement of that symphony Gericke gives with a kid-glove handling, and the last movement, which is of an extremely difficult character, he has given better than it was ever played before or after him in Boston."

A Man of Enthusiasm.

"Nikisch, on the other hand, is a man of enthusiasm and often gives very fiery readings. While he makes the first movement in the ninth symphony a great success, he is essentially poor in the last movement."

"Has the orchestra deteriorated or improved under Mr. Nikisch?"

"I deem the Symphony Orchestra the best orchestra in America, but still it is not as great as it was five years ago. Mr. Nikisch could never have made the orchestra what it is. That was Gericke's work. Gericke came here, found a poor orchestra and left it a good one. Mr. Nikisch took it in hand already made."

"Is Mr. Nikisch regarded favorably among musicians?"

"Oh, like all leaders, he has his friends and his adverse critics. His theatrical readings are favored by some, but the classicists do not admire his style. Mr. Nikisch is always bound to be popular, as I said before, but he is not likely to become an educator."

Conductor Nikisch was known, for one thing, as the most severe disciplinarian who has been in charge of the orchestra for a long time. The men under him were in a way like little boys at school, in the way in which they were required to be at rehearsal.

This is one thing which has aroused adverse comment upon him. Men grown are apt to be restive of such treatment.

When he came to America the enthusiasm that greeted him turned his head, and later on, when some of the most experienced writers in the land occasionally expressed a divergence of views as to a tempo, or pointed out that the discipline of the band was less admirable than in Mr. Gericke's days, the new leader waxed wroth.

Mrs. Nikisch, too, is uncomfortable in the United States, people obstinately refusing to acclaim her as a great songstress. There are plenty of good men in Germany to replace Mr. Nikisch. On the roster of conductors his name stands far below those of Richter, Mottl, Levy, Mahler and Gericke; and, in spite of his assertion that his reputation was made in Europe before he came hither, he is only known abroad as a first-rate conductor of operatic performances in Leipzig.

What is the use of mincing matters and refraining to tell Mr. Otto Floersheim—or the person who writes to the Musical Courier over his initials—that he does not speak the truth, and that the falsehood he writes about Boston inclines one to believe him capable of claiming the credit for work done by somebody else. He has certainly been charged in print with getting another person to prepare the orchestral score for a certain triviality which was allowed a place on a Boston Symphony programme, and he has never refuted the charge, so far as is known here. He writes from Berlin to his paper thus:—

The news that Arthur Nikisch will soon leave Boston has spread here with great rapidity and caused quite some astonishment. Not, however, to me. It is far better and more satisfactory to an artist of Nikisch's rank and abilities to be the intendent and conductor of the Pesth Opera House (a position similar to that held by Jahn in Vienna) than to be chef d'orchestre at Boston and be harassed by the Hub's voracious music

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Busoni.

"The Mountebanks," with Lillian Russell—"The Isle of Champagne"—Relocated—Paderewski's Ovation Yesterday—Columbian Festival—The Hinrich Opera Company's Season.

At the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, the soloist was Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, the pianist whose recent series of recitals attracted so much attention.

Mr. Busoni chose for his appearance the concerto No. 2 in A major, by Liszt, which proved an excellent selection for the display of his abilities as a brilliant concert artist.

His masterly work throughout the concerto, his remarkably clear touch, technical proficiency and faultless accuracy, all combined to give the best results, and he held his own against the occasionally overwhelming volume of the orchestra with splendid effect.

He was made the object of quite an ovation as he concluded the concerto, and was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

Director Nikisch took occasion to show the string players in the Bachrich arrangement of Bach's "Prelude, adagio and gavotte," and the men of this section of the band did some notably good work in their playing in this number of the programme, the final movement creating a marked impression upon the audience and winning a well merited recognition of the excellence of the string players.

The admirable "overture fantasy" by Tschalkowsky, "Romeo and Juliet," was given a most satisfactory interpretation at the beginning of the evening, and the fourth of the "immortal nine" symphonies brought the concert to an end, the reading of the several movements of Beethoven's work gaining Director Nikisch unstinted applause.

Mr. Max Heinrich will be the soloist next week, and the orchestra will play a new "dramatic overture" by Margaret Ruthven Lang, the scherzo capriccioso by Dvorak, and Haydn's symphony in C minor, No. 9 (B. & H.).

UNIQUE NIKISCH.

Some of His Strong Points and His Weak Ones,

And Why He Has Decided to Leave Boston.

Arther Nikisch is unique.

I can easily imagine him as saying: "Let the critics fire away and do their worst. I have my own ideas how these pieces should be played, and I am in the position to have them played as I wish."

He rarely reads the comments of the press on his work. He hasn't time, and what is more, he hasn't the inclination.

I have been more and more surprised that Mr. Nikisch should think of leaving Boston. He has legions of friends here, and is making money fast.

During his two years' sojourn here he received five or six splendid offers to direct orchestras in Germany. But he always declined. The offer from Frankfurt he threw into the waste basket.

Of course the only reason why he is going to leave us in the lurch is that he can do better at Pesth. There he will have several assistant directors under him.

This is his own reason, as he gives it, and that of his friends.

Full of Vim.

I called upon a well-known lady in the Back Bay yesterday to see if she wouldn't talk about Mr. Nikisch. "Ah," she said, "Mr. Nikisch is such a man, so full of strong emotion and vim! He stands before his men and seems to electrify them by his enthusiasm. They become as sensitive to his baton as a needle to a lodestone."

"How thoroughly he enters into the soul of the pieces he directs! Every note has its significance to him, and he feels the sentiment suggested through and through. Then he begins to lead the music and his crescendos and diminuendoes, his retards and piu mossoes, often metamorphose the very character of the piece."

"I am grieved that we are to lose the director—our great director, I should say—whose originality is so extraordinary and brilliant."

Not Complimentary.

There are several well-known musical critics in Boston who never did like Mr. Nikisch, and one of them thus spoke of the symphony director:—

"In plain English, Nikisch is a 'faker' and allows his eccentricity to run away with him. John Mullahy is 10 times a better and more substantial director than he. Why, Nikisch came here with scarcely any experience in symphonic music, and the first time he stood up before the orchestra he gave himself all away. The men in the orchestra saw what he was in a minute."

"He was lax in authority. I told members of the orchestra at the time that they had a different man from Gericke, and they knew it. To lead the Symphony Orchestra a man must have an inflexible command, as Gericke did, and as Nikisch has not."

He is too explosive, too fiery, to please anybody but enthusiasts. What we want is a man of iron like Gericke."

His Individuality.

Prof. J. R. Felton of the New England Conservatory gave me the following crisp interview about Mr. Nikisch and his work:—

"I have always enjoyed Mr. Nikisch's productions exceedingly. They abound in individuality and originality. Of course his ideas may not please everybody. As many heads, so many opinions,—tante teste, quanti cervelli."

"He is spontaneous and shows us pieces in a new light. Hungarian is a fiery blood and makes fiery music. Have you not noticed that his renderings of a piece are always different? Once played, that ends it. The next time there is a brand-new edition."

An Inspired Magician.

"Take an accomplished singer and under the inspiration of the moment he will vary his music. So with Mr. Nikisch; there he stands, an inspired magician, unfettered by rules that are generally immutable by directors. And, by the way, let his orchestra accompany a vocalist and his sympathetic leading follows the singer with extraordinary facility, even in the most sudden departure from the accustomed rendering. He is as quick as a flash and as brilliant! While others ponder and reflect he does the thing off-hand, a genius of the moment, a meteor in the sky."

"He was not a leader of the symphony before he came to America, but here he has acclimatized himself rapidly to his new conditions and grasped the idea quickly. The first year he memorized all his scores and so conducted all the symphonies. Berlioz's music could not be played better than he has it played, and Berlioz is one of the most difficult composers to conduct. He is thoroughly a master hand with Haydn and conducts his pieces with wonderful skill and ingenuity."

Will Always Be Popular.

Prof. Elson answered my questions as follows:—

"As director of the Symphony Orchestra has Mr. Nikisch been a success?"

"I deem Mr. Nikisch emphatically a musician, and he is always likely to be popular. But while he has shown himself to be great in certain directions, I by no means consider him great in all. He is scarcely of the symphonic temperament."

"In what line is he specially gifted?"

"Well, you know that he has had operatic training, and in that direction he is most proficient."

"How does he compare with Gericke?"

"Gericke is a man eminently proficient in the symphony and is a superb drillmaster. The difference between the two leaders has been shown admirably in their ideas of how Beethoven's ninth symphony should be played. The first movement of that symphony Gericke gives with a kid-glove handling, and the last movement, which is of an extremely difficult character, he has given better than it was ever played before or after him in Boston."

A Man of Enthusiasm.

"Nikisch, on the other hand, is a man of enthusiasm and often gives very fiery readings. While he makes the first movement in the ninth symphony a great success, he is essentially poor in the last movement."

"Has the orchestra deteriorated or improved under Mr. Nikisch?"

"I deem the Symphony Orchestra the best orchestra in America, but still it is not as great as it was five years ago. Mr. Nikisch could never have made the orchestra what it is. That was Gericke's work. Gericke came here, found a poor orchestra and left it a good one. Mr. Nikisch took it in hand already made."

"Is Mr. Nikisch regarded favorably among musicians?"

"Oh, like all leaders, he has his friends and his adverse critics. His theatrical readings are favored by some, but the classicists do not admire his style. Mr. Nikisch is always bound to be popular, as I said before, but he is not likely to become an educator."

Conductor Nikisch was known, for one thing, as the most severe disciplinarian who has been in charge of the orchestra for a long time. The men under him were in a way like little boys at school, in the way in which they were required to be at rehearsal.

This is one thing which has aroused adverse comment upon him. Men grown are apt to be restive of such treatment.

When he came to America the enthusiasm that greeted him turned his head, and later on, when some of the most experienced writers in the land occasionally expressed a divergence of views as to a tempo, or pointed out that the discipline of the band was less admirable than in Mr. Gericke's days, the new leader waxed wroth.

Mrs. Nikisch, too, is uncomfortable in the United States, people obstinately refusing to acclaim her as a great songstress. There are plenty of good men in Germany to replace Mr. Nikisch. On the roster of conductors his name stands far below those of Richter, Mottl, Levy, Mahler and Gericke; and, in spite of his assertion that his reputation was made in Europe before he came hither, he is only known abroad as a first-rate conductor of operatic performances in Leipzig.

What is the use of mincing matters and refraining to tell Mr. Otto Floersheim—or the person who writes to the Musical Courier over his initials—that he does not speak the truth, and that the falsehood he writes about Boston inclines one to believe him capable of claiming the credit for work done by somebody else. He has certainly been charged in print with getting another person to prepare the orchestral score for a certain triviality which was allowed a place on a Boston Symphony programme, and he has never retuted the charge, so far as is known here. He writes from Berlin to his paper thus:—

The news that Arthur Nikisch will soon leave Boston has spread here with great rapidity and caused quite some astonishment. Not, however, to me. It is far better and more satisfactory to an artist of Nikisch's rank and abilities to be the intendent and conductor of the Pesth Opera House (a position similar to that held by Jahn in Vienna) than to be chef d'orchestre at Boston and be harassed by the Hub's voracious music critics, who howl like wolves in the teeth of every artist who dares to please the public longer than two seasons.

A second letter from this same man includes this further insolent statement:—

The Boston critics drove away Nikisch, as they did Gericke before him.

The last assertion is a flat, out-and-out lie or else a specimen of the grossest ignorance, being contradicted by Mr. Nikisch's frequent assertions that he did not read the newspapers and neither knew nor cared what they said. Huge and outrageous as this falsity is, it is matched in size at least by the impudence and arrogance of the lines with which the paragraph ends:—

If Colonel Higginson wants to know the right man to take upon his shoulders the cloak of Nikisch, let him apply to me at once and I will tell him whom to engage.

For sheer, unadulterated effrontery, there has not been anything equal to this for a good while. Mr. "O. F." must have been elevating himself with his own "Elevation."

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Fit Announcing of the New Symphony Conductor.

There are rumors concerning the probable successor to Mr. Nikisch, who will leave us at the end of the season to indulge himself in the more congenial task of conducting opera in Buda Pesth, a town of Hungarian enjoyment and Hungarian appreciation. Speculation concerning the successor is undoubtedly vain.

The next conductor will not be named by a show of hands.

Nor is it likely that the musicians, the amateurs, or the careless frequenters of the Symphony concerts will be invited to avail themselves of the Australian ballot.

No. The announcement will be proclaimed. There should be formality, however, in the proclamation of the decision.

There are historic precedents worthy of imitation.

When Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, set up the image of gold in the plain of Bura, in the province of Babylon, he sent to gather together the Princes, the Governors and the Captains, the Judges, the Treasurers, the Counsellors, the Sheriffs and all the rulers of the provinces to come to the dedication.

Then a herald cried aloud, To you, it is commended, Oh, people, nations and languages, that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer and all kinds of music ye fall down and worship the golden image.

As the announcement will probably be made in balmy weather, the Common would be a fitting place for the ceremony. The heavily veiled unknown should stand with the orchestra, the master musicians, the Governor, the Mayor and the Board of Aldermen upon a platform raised high in the air. The Cadets and the Naval Battalion in full uniform would lend brilliancy and pomp. At a given signal and with a flourish of trumpets the veil should fall, as at the inauguration of a statue. The successor would then address the throng in German, but a translator would follow him in explanation.

No sale of liquors should be allowed until the exercises are over. A balloon ascension or a display of fireworks might please the visitors from adjacent towns, but even without such an attraction the scene would be a suitable inauguration of the next series of twenty-four functions.

If there were any doubters, any cavillers, any modern Shadrachs, Meshacks and Abednegos, the Frog Pond would not be far from the platform, and water would take the place of the burning, fiery furnace.

Many were in hopes that there might be opera in this city during the reign of Mr. Nikisch, for he has had experience in the conducting of opera, and he has natural qualifications for such a position. There are enough opera singers of a position. Suppose that a company respectable company. Suppose that a company formed out of this material with Mr. Nikisch, and members of the Symphony Orchestra were engaged for a short season at the Boston Theatre, the natural and fitting home of grand opera, would the manager lose or gain?

Some one may say rashly that such an employment of the orchestra would be unworthy of the purpose for which it was organized.

The beauty of the orchestral concerts in Dresden, Munich and other European towns is surely not impaired by the fact that the players and the conductors are seen at work in the opera houses.

Or is it a more dignified employment for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch as conductor, to serve the idle amusement of the frequenters of parlors of New York; to strive in music against the babble of conversation; to enlarge by musical endeavor the arrogance of the host rejoicing in his purse?

The orchestra might say of such a task as Samson of the Philistines:
"Have they not sword-players, and every sort of gymnastic artists, wrestlers, riders, runners, jugglers, and dancers, antics, mummers, mimics: But they must pick me out, with shackles And over-labored at their public mill, to make them sport?"

Mr. Nikisch, in an interview that was published in the Journal, spoke words that are weighty, words that should be considered thoughtfully by the managers and by possible successors. "It is true that I intend to resign," said Mr. Nikisch. "This work is too hard for me, and I am not in the best of health. I could not stand it much longer, for I have to give so many concerts and do so much traveling. During the past seven months I have conducted 124 great Symphony concerts, besides doing an immense amount of traveling."

Mr. Nikisch might have added that he had also appeared during the season in different towns as a player of chamber music, an accompanist, and even as a solo pianist. It is not strange that such industry has told upon his physical condition.

Mr. Gericke, a man of iron will, found that he suffered in health on account of the long journeys and many concerts. The experience of Mr. Nikisch is the same. Nor is it unlikely that the members of the orchestra are affected at the end of the season so that they with difficulty display accuracy and enthusiasm in the final concerts.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 8, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MARGARET RUTHVEN LANG. DRAMATIC OVERTURE (Manuscript).
Maestoso. E minor.
(First time.)

SPOHR. RECITATIVE AND ARIA. "Faust." Der-Hölle-selbst-will-ich-Segen Entzingen.

JOSEF HAYDN. SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 9, (B. & H.).
I. Allegro. C minor.
II. Andante cantabile. E flat major.
III. Menuetto. C minor. Trio. C major.
IV. Finale: Vivace. C major.

SCHUBERT. SONGS with PIANO.
a) GRUPPE AUS DEM TARTARUS.
b) DIE ALLMACHT.

MORITZ MOSZKOWSKI. TWO MOVEMENTS from SUITE No. 1, in F major, op. 39.
III. Tema con variazioni: Andante. A major.
V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace. F major.

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK. SCHERZO CAPRICCIOSO, op. 66.
Allegro con fuoco. D flat major.
Trio: Poco tranquillo. D major.

SOLOIST:

MR. MAX HEINRICH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

critics, who howl like wolves in the teeth of every artist who dares to please the public longer than two seasons.

A second letter from this same man includes this further insolent statement:—

The Boston critics drove away Nikisch, as they did Gericke before him.

The last assertion is a flat, out-and-out lie or else a specimen of the grossest ignorance, being contradicted by Mr. Nikisch's frequent assertions that he did not read the newspapers and neither knew nor cared what they said. Huge and outrageous as this falsity is, it is matched in size at least by the impudence and arrogance of the lines with which the paragraph ends:—

If Colonel Higginson wants to know the right man to take upon his shoulders the cloak of Nikisch, let him apply to me at once and I will tell him whom to engage.

For sheer, unadultered effrontery, there has not been anything equal to this for a good while. Mr. "O. F." must have been elevating himself with his own "Elevation."

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Fit Announcing of the New Symphony Conductor.

There are rumors concerning the probable successor to Mr. Nikisch, who will leave us at the end of the season to indulge himself in the more congenial task of conducting opera in Buda Pesth, a town of Hungarian enjoyment and Hungarian appreciation.

Speculation concerning the successor is undoubtedly vain.

The next conductor will not be named by a show of hands.

Nor is it likely that the musicians, the amateurs, or the careless frequenters of the Symphony concerts will be invited to avail themselves of the Australian ballot.

No. The announcement will be proclaimed.

There should be formality, however, in the proclamation of the decision.

There are historic precedents worthy of imitation.

When Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, set up the image of gold in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon, he sent to gather to the province the Princes, the Governors and the Captains, the Judges, the Treasurers, the Counsellors, the Sheriffs and all the rulers of the provinces to come to the dedication.

"Then a herald cried aloud, To you, it is commended, Oh, people, nations and languages, that at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer and all kinds of music ye fall down and worship the golden image."

As the announcement will probably be made in balmy weather, the Common would be a fitting place for the ceremony. The heavily veiled unknown should stand with the orchestra, the master musicians, the Governor, the Mayor and the Board of Aldermen upon a platform raised high in the air. The Cadets and the Naval Battalion in full uniform would lend with a flourish of trumpets the veil should fall, as at the inauguration of a statue. The successor would then address the throng in German, but a translator would follow him in explanation.

No sale of liquors should be allowed until the exercises are over. A balloon ascension or a display of fireworks might please the visitors from adjacent towns, but even without such an attraction the scene would be a suitable inauguration of the next series of twenty-four functions.

If there were any doubters, any cavillers, any modern Shadrachs, Meshacks and Abednegos, the Frog Pond would not be far from the platform, and water would take the place of the burning, fiery furnace.

Many were in hopes that there might be opera in this city during the reign of Mr. Nikisch, for he has had experience in the conducting of opera, and he has natural qualifications for such a position. There are enough opera singers of a position. There are enough opera singers of a position. Suppose that a company formed out of this material with Mr. Nikisch, and members of the Symphony Orchestra were engaged for a short season at the Boston Theatre, the natural and fitting home of grand opera, would the manager lose or gain?

Some one may say rashly that such an employment of the orchestra would be unworthy of the purpose for which it was organized.

The beauty of the orchestral concerts in Dresden, Munich and other European towns is surely not impaired by the fact that the players and the conductors are seen at work in the opera houses.

Or is it a more dignified employment for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch as conductor, to serve the idle amusement of the frequenters of parlors of New York; to strive in music against the babble of conversation; to enlarge by musical endeavor the arrogance of the host rejoicing in his purse?

The orchestra might say of such a task as Samson of the Philistines: "Have they not sword-players, and every sort of gymnastic artists, wrestlers, riders, runners, jugglers, and dancers, antics, mimmers, mimics? But they must pick me out, with shackles And over-labored at their public mill, tir'd, To make them sport?"

Mr. Nikisch, in an interview that was published in the Journal, spoke words that are weighty, words that should be considered thoughtfully by the managers and by possible successors. "It is true that I intend to resign," said Mr. Nikisch. "This work is too hard for me, and I am not in the best of health. I could not stand it much longer, for I have to give so many concerts and do so much traveling. During the past seven months I have conducted 124 great Symphony concerts, besides doing an immense amount of traveling."

Mr. Nikisch might have added that he had also appeared during the season in different towns as a player of chamber music, an accompanist, and even as a solo pianist. It is not strange that such industry has told upon his physical condition.

Mr. Gericke, a man of iron will, found that he suffered in health on account of the long journeys and many concerts. The experience of Mr. Nikisch is the same. Nor is it unlikely that the members of the orchestra are affected at the end of the season so that they with difficulty display accuracy and enthusiasm in the final concerts.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 8, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MARGARET RUTHVEN LANG. DRAMATIC OVERTURE (Manuscript).
Maestoso. E minor.
(First time.)

SPOHR. RECITATIVE AND ARIA. "Faust." Der-Hölle-selbst-will-ich-Segen Entzingen.

JOSEF HAYDN. SYMPHONY in C minor, No. 9, (B. & H.).
I. Allegro. C minor.
II. Andante cantabile. E flat major.
III. Menuetto. C minor. Trio. C major.
IV. Finale: Vivace. C major.

SCHUBERT. SONGS with PIANO.
a) GRUPPE AUS DEM TARTARUS.
b) DIE ALLMACHT.

MORITZ MOSZKOWSKI. TWO MOVEMENTS from SUITE No. 1, in F major, op. 39.
III. Tema con variazioni: Andante. A major.
V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace. F major.

ANTONIN DVOŘÁK. SCHERZO CAPRICCIOSO, op. 66.
Allegro con fuoco. D flat major.
Trio: Poco tranquillo. D major.

SOLOIST:

MR. MAX HEINRICH.

The Piano used is a Steinway.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was as follows:

Margaret Ruthven Lang: Dramatic Overture No. 2, in E-minor, Opus 12.
 Spohr: Recitative, "Der Hölle selbst will ich Segen entgegen," and Aria, Liebe ist die zarte Blüte, from "Faust," Act I, scene 2.
 Haydn: Symphony in C-minor, No. 9 (Breitkopf & Härtel Ed.)
 Songs with pianoforte:
 Schubert: Gruppe aus dem Tartarus.—Die Allmacht.
 Moszkowski: Two Movements from Suite No. 1, in F major, Opus 39.
 Dvorák: Scherzo Capriccioso, Opus 66.
 Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

This is, we believe, the first time that an orchestral composition by a woman has been played at one of our symphony concerts. It is rather odd how exceedingly little women have done in music—save in the way of singing and playing. In the creative part of the art they have done next to nothing of importance. They have done far more in painting, sculpture, or poetry. Fanny Hensel (Mendelssohn's sister) seems to stand rather at the head of female composers, and her baggage is neither large nor very important; Augusta Holmès seems to hold the first place today, but we have as yet seen nothing bearable of her composition. Louise Bertin wrote an opera, "Esmeralda,"—at least, Berlioz swore that he did not write a note of it—which was brought out at the Paris Opéra, and made fiasco. Upon the whole, the record is not brilliant. Miss Lang now comes forward with a work which must certainly stand very high indeed among compositions by women; indeed there is no special need of bringing her sex into the question at all, for this overture of hers does not need to be ranked in a special class in order to have good said of it. The beginning is particularly impressive—a grim phrase is given out by the trumpets and trombones in octaves, interrupted by syncopated thuds on the kettle-drums, and is followed by a most effective piece of harmony in the strings—a chord of C-major is struck, and then merges into a passing harmony which you expect to lead, by a half cadence, directly to the dominant chord of B-major; but no! instead of leading to the dominant, it leads directly to the tonic chord of E-minor. The effect of this sudden appearance of the chord of E-minor is startling, the chord seems to come from a hundred miles away, the effect is as unearthly as that of the famous C-sharp minor chord on "et lux" in Verdi's "Manzoni" Requiem. If there is perhaps no other stroke in the overture that equals this in originality and force, what follows it has none the less conspicuous merit of its own. The thematic material is natural and unforced, the treatment coherent, often strikingly ingenious. Only once toward the latter part of the overture does the composer seem to lose her way for a moment in the maze of working-out; but she soon finds it again and pushes on to the end with very sure step. The general character of the work is passionate, with a warmth that seems wholly genuine and unsought-for, and now and then with more idyllic moments of much beauty. The instrumentation is brilliant, always skillfully managed, if not precisely what one would call masterly; one now and then feels the lack of a certain something which is to be found in the scoring of the great masters of orchestration, from Mozart to Wagner; a certain way of using orchestral color to add to the formal coherence of the writing. Miss Lang's varied play of color seems at moments more fitful and fantastic than her musical form and thematic development. Yet, in one respect, her scoring shows a very fine instinct; unlike most young composers, she is singularly thrifty in her use of orchestral material and does not waste her heavy artillery on effects of sheer dynamic force where it can be more wisely spent on effects of contrast. Upon the whole, she in no wise lays herself open to the criticism once passed on Augusta Holmès by a Paris musician: that, "like most women, she tries to prove her own virility by making a tremendous noise!" The overture was admirably played and most enthusiastically received, Mr. Nikisch being called out three times after it.

The Haydn symphony is one not often played; it is one of the shortest of symphonies, but none the less great for that. The work is strong as steel, every part of it is welded to its adjacent parts so firmly that the whole shows not a single flaw. In listening to and studying such a work as this, one is reminded of what the late Otto Dressel once said, "I find much that is admirable, much that shows genuine talent, perhaps even genius, in the works of the modern composers you all admire so unreservedly; what I do not find is that complete mastery that marks the great classic writers." Now in this symphony by Haydn one does find the most complete mastery; a way of doing things that admits of no doubt, but carries immediate conviction with it; there is no indecision, not a moment of weakness, every phrase stands there as by a divine right of fitness. The symphony was admirably played.

The Theme and Variations and the Perpetuum mobile from Moszkowski's first suite are pretty playthings in the salon vein; more than this can hardly be said of them. They are brilliant and show off a virtuoso orchestra to fine advantage; they were played with immense effectiveness. The Dvorák Scherzo is on a somewhat higher plane; it has moments of no little charm, and is conspicuous for its brilliancy of orchestral coloring. There is not much nutrition in it, but it is good fun to listen to for once in a while. It was exceedingly brilliantly played.

Mr. Heinrich sang the aria from Spohr's "Faust" which he sang here some years ago with wonderful beauty of expression. The music begins to show the wrinkles of age a little, its beauty is not based on very conspicuous strength, but that it is beautiful is not to be denied. In the two Schubert songs, especially in "Die Allmacht," Mr. Heinrich carried everything before him; it was really great singing, and fully appreciated by the audience.

The next programme is—Schumann, overture to "Manfred;" Brahms, violin concerto in D; Busoni, symphonic tone-poem (MS.); Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

The Twenty-first Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert was as follows:

Dramatic Overture (manuscript)—first time. Margaret R. Lang
 Recitative and aria, "Faust".....Spohr
 Symphony, C minor, No. 9 (B. and H.).....Haydn
 Songs with piano—
 "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" }.....Schubert
 "Die Allmacht"
 Two movements from Suite No. 1, F major, op. 39. Moszkowski
 Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66.....Dvorak
 Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

The phrase Place aux dames should be without meaning on the concert stage.

The conductor of an orchestra should judge of the fitness of a composition proposed for performance without consideration of the sex of the composer.

Sex is here an accident.

A symphony is not good because the young and talented composer has suffered acutely from indigestion. A badly written song is still bad, even if the author sold newspapers at the age of six. The sufferings or the joys of the individual may color the composition and give it individuality, but its musical worth is not accurately determined by mere mention of sickness or health, poverty or riches, religious belief or sex.

A concert devoted to "the education of popular taste" should not be turned into a class room exercise for the purpose of testing compositions of students for the discovery of merit and the correction of faults.

Nor should Music Hall be turned into a not-house for the purpose of forcing talent.

It is the duty of a conductor to put gallantry in his pocket and examine carefully the score, even when the work is presented by a blushing maiden, a matron of reserve or a toothless crone.

These observations of a general nature may be applied in part to the case of Miss Lang, who has in the past given undeniable proofs of her possession of a musical nature. She has shown in certain songs with pianoforte accompaniment a pretty knack of melody, and her compositions have been often characterized by refinement and grace. But there is a mighty difference between a song and a "dramatic overture" for orchestra.

In the present instance Miss Lang has little to say, although she seeks many means of expression. Her themes are neither of marked originality nor of musical importance. The working-out is not so much working-out as working-after something. There is no apparent definite purpose, or the purpose is frittered away in the search after effects. As an overture, the piece is amorphous. Dramatic, to be sure, is a comparative term, but in the common acceptance of the word, there is not one dramatic stroke in the whole work, nor is there a climax. As a fantastic tone poem, it is vague. Miss Lang finds at her disposal the orchestral paint box, and she colors her themes with this instrumental tablet and with that one; thus she gains, occasionally, a piquant effect, a pleasing passage, but the whole lacks coherency and is diffuse.

In a word, this composition might well please the eye of a prudent and skilled teacher. He might look kindly at the pupil and say: "This is good; this shows promise; you are making progress. Now put it away and we will review our exercises in the strict style." He would not be satisfied with "the spirit of the form" or "the sympathy with the form." He would demand the thing itself and not its impalpable atmosphere.

The overture was applauded and there was a vain effort made to call the composer forward.

Mr. Heinrich's number with orchestra was the air from Spohr's "Faust," the air with the recitative that opens with these mellifluous words: "Der Hœlle selbst will ich Segen entringen." Spohr wrote the part of Faust for a baritone, and yet in the opera the hero is obliged once to take a low E flat, and on another occasion he trills on a low G. In the air chosen by Mr. Heinrich there are old-fashioned and meaningless ornamental passages, and the air, as a whole, is neither dramatic nor interesting. Although the singer often showed admirable control of the breath, and although he sang with intelligence, he did not appear to full advantage; for in pure cantabile of merely sensuous beauty and in ornamentation Mr. Heinrich is never as successful as in music of strongly marked dramatic character. He is powerful in the conception, and the carrying out of the diabolical, the terrible, the grotesque; he rides at ease in the storm of passion; he can be dignified in a priestly role; he rises with the intensity of an occasion. It is not surprising then that he was eminently successful in the songs by Schubert, or that he was recalled again and again after his impassioned delivery of them.

The orchestral numbers gave the audience much pleasure. A Haydn Symphony is always welcome, and the brilliant numbers of Moszkowski and Dvorak show the favorable side of modern instrumentation. The incidental solos contributed by Mr. Schulz and Mr. Molé were warmly applauded.

The New York Tribune shows its usual understanding of matters in Boston when it says that "it is no news that admirers of Gericke, the immediate predecessor of the present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have criticized Mr. Nikisch pretty freely these last two seasons." This may not be news in Gotham, but it is here, where it has always been supposed that any criticisms of Mr. Nikisch's work were inspired only by admiration of fine such programmes and symmetrical playing as he did not provide.

We hear from the New York Times the surprising intelligence that the Boston music critics are doing their best to drive Mr. Nikisch out of the city. The Boston music critics would scarcely undertake to do this thing, in view of the fact that they are fully aware that a mortifying defeat would attend their efforts. They perhaps do not rate Mr. Nikisch as high as he is rated in New York; but there are various good and sufficient reasons for that, all of a purely critical nature. This statement of the Times is just as reliable as its other statement that these same critics assert that New York is the only city in the United States which possesses a first-class permanent orchestra with a thoroughly competent conductor. On the contrary, the Boston music critics have steadily insisted that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the best in the country, and is unsurpassed anywhere. The thoroughly competent conductor is quite another story; but certainly, critical Boston does not cast its eyes in the direction of New York, in the hope of discovering one there; especially since the New York music critics drove Theodore Thomas out of that city.

Anent the Symphony Orchestra Conductor.

Nothing is publicly known, as yet, regarding the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The unexpected secession of the present conductor, has caused some perplexity in finding a successor at a moment's notice. Many rumors have gone abroad regarding the cause of Mr. Nikisch's resignation. Among them is one that the music critics of Boston had made the position irksome to him, by reason of their unfavorable attitude toward his eccentricities as a conductor, and that he could bear it no longer. This of course, is absurd, for he has proclaimed that he has no time to read criticisms, that he is ignorant of what they say of him, and consequently cannot be either pained or pleased by them. As we understand it, Mr. Nikisch's contract had one year to run when the offer of the position at Buda Pesth, came to him after it had been declined by Mr. Anton Seidl. While hesitating whether to accept it or not, it is said that he looked forward to a renewal of his contract as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for another term of five years. The prospect of such an arrangement not being encouraging, he closed with the proposition from Buda Pesth, and as it was imperative on him to begin his duties there next season, he felt obliged to depart without filling out the remaining year of his contract here. How true or how false this may be, we have no means of knowing, and we only give the report for what it is worth. One thing, however, is certain, and that is that the adverse criticisms in nowise inspired his action. All things considered, the departure of Mr. Nikisch is not to be greatly deplored. Charming as he may be as a man, talented as he may be as a musician, he has been, from the very beginning, sadly out of place as the director of the Symphony Orchestra. That body has steadily degenerated since it came under his control, and another year would have inevitably seen its still further fall from the efficiency that characterized it when it first came into his charge. He is essentially an opera conductor, and, not being eclectic in style, he impressed an operatic color on every work that he interpreted. This, together with an evident laxity in discipline, or a lack of knowledge how to drill and to keep a symphony orchestra up to a high standard of efficiency, made his efforts far from satisfactory, from the very outset. During his first season the fine condition in which the orchestra was left by his predecessor was still unimpaired, and he reaped the advantage of it, despite his innovating readings. From that time to the present, the splendid body of artists, that he had so thoroughly disciplined, has lost almost every quality that made it the equal of the best orchestras in Europe. The players remain, prepared to regain their earlier perfection, under favorable circumstances, but their work is far from what it was. The conductor has always been, too, much en evidence. He seemed to be more concerned with himself than with the music he caused to be played; the composer was pushed into the background in order that the conductor might become prominent; the artistic was made to give way to the purely personal; Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert were all subjected to the same process, and their individualities were suppressed that the individuality of the conductor might take their place. In other words, the composers, and orchestra, were secondary, and the conductor was first. This was all wrong. It reversed the proper order of things, and, instead of elevating the musical taste of the public, it simply elevated the conductor. We entertain no feelings of animosity toward Mr. Nikisch personally; but we are, and have been from the first, averse to his peculiar methods of utilizing his position for his own special glorification; and we frankly confess that we glad, in the cause of art, that he is going. We trust that the next conductor may not be chosen from the ranks of the unknown, as Mr. Nikisch was. The head of such an orchestra should be an experienced leader, one who can enforce the respect of his musicians by indisputable knowledge of his art, and win their confidence from the beginning by his manifest fitness to be appointed over them. Such a body of artists as those which form the Symphony Orchestra soon takes the measure of a conductor, and if it finds him in any way lacking in skill and experience, loses interest in and esteem for him. We have now had three German conductors at these concerts; and our musical tastes have been thoroughly Germanized in consequence. Would it not be wise, now, to try some eminent French conductor by way of bringing back matters to a fair level of eclecticism in taste?

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Dramatic Overture (MS.), by Margaret Ruthven Lang, (first time); Recitative and aria, for tenor, from "Faust," by Spohr; Symphony C-minor, No. 9 (B. & H.), Haydn; "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht," Schubert; Andante and Vivace from Suite No. 1, in F, Tchaikowsky; Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak. The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich. The novelty of the concert was Miss Lang's overture. It was notable as the first purely orchestral work by a native woman composer, that has been performed here. Of the composition itself there is not much to be said that is pleasant in the saying. It is creditable as the result of a laudable ambition to essay an important work, and it may be pronounced a promising first attempt; but it is scarcely of a worth to warrant its performance, unless, indeed, to afford the composer an opportunity to hear it, and to profit by the experience. In the first place, it is hardly an overture, as the term is generally understood, and it is not dramatic in any sense. It has more the character of an orchestral fantasia. Nothing is clearly defined, nothing is completed. It is one long effort to say something, without any very clear idea of what is to be said. The general effect is spasmodic and fragmentary; and the work does not hang well together. The orchestration is vigorous, but is without richness or character. It has strong color here and there, but is never closely knit, and is often confusingly foggy. The pervading fault of the work, however, is that its meaning is not made apparent. It seems to wander on without any objective point, and, despite its length, is over before it has been made quite clear that it has really begun. In other words, it has all the faults of youth without any of its spontaneity and artless exuberance of fancy and of imagination. It is earnest in aim, and never sinks to commonplace, but is unmistakably "made music." As an evidence of its composer's serious study and its application, it is very commendable; but it is immature, and should not have been submitted to public criticisms. It

The Twenty-first Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert was as follows:

Dramatic Overture (manuscript)—first time, Margaret R. Lang
 Recitative and aria, "Faust".....Spohr
 Symphony, C minor, No. 9 (B. and H.).....Haydn
 Songs with piano—
 "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus".....Schubert
 "Die Allmacht"
 Two movements from Suite No. 1, F major, op. 39, Moszkowski
 Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66.....Dvorak
 Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

The phrase Place aux dames should be without meaning on the concert stage.

The conductor of an orchestra should judge of the fitness of a composition proposed for performance without consideration of the sex of the composer.

Sex is here an accident.

A symphony is not good because the young and talented composer has suffered acutely from indigestion. A badly written song is still bad, even if the author sold newspapers at the age of six. The sufferings or the joys of the individual may color the composition and give it individuality, but its musical worth is not accurately determined by mere mention of sickness or health, poverty or riches, religious belief or sex.

A concert devoted to "the education of popular taste" should not be turned into a class room exercise for the purpose of testing compositions of students for the discovery of merit and the correction of faults.

Nor should Music Hall be turned into a notehouse for the purpose of forcing talent.

It is the duty of a conductor to put gallantry in his pocket and examine carefully the score, even when the work is presented by a blushing maiden, a matron of reserve or a toothless crone.

These observations of a general nature may be applied in part to the case of Miss Lang, who has in the past given undeniable proofs of her possession of a musical nature. She has shown in certain songs with pianoforte accompaniment a pretty knack of melody, and her compositions have been often characterized by refinement and grace. But there is a mighty difference between a song and a "dramatic overture" for orchestra.

In the present instance Miss Lang has little to say, although she seeks many means of expression. Her themes are neither of marked originality nor of musical importance. The working-out is not so much working-out as working-after something. There is no apparent definite purpose, or the purpose is frittered away in the search after effects. As an overture, the piece is amorphous. Dramatic, to be sure, is a comparative term, but in the common acceptance of the word, there is not one dramatic stroke in the whole work, nor is there a climax. As a fantastic tone poem, it is vague. Miss Lang finds at her disposal the orchestral paint box, and she colors her themes with this instrumental tablet and with that one; thus she gains, occasionally, a piquant effect, a pleasing passage, but the whole lacks coherency and is diffuse.

In a word, this composition might well please the eye of a prudent and skilled teacher. He might look kindly at the pupil and say: "This is good; this shows promise; you are making progress." Now put it away and we will review our exercises in the strict style. He would not be satisfied with "the spirit of the form" or "the sympathy with the form." He would demand the thing itself and not its impalpable atmosphere.

The overture was applauded and there was a vain effort made to call the composer forward.

Mr. Heinrich's number with orchestra was the air from Spohr's "Faust," the air with the recitative that opens with these melodious words: "Der Hoeile selbst will ich Segen entringen." Spohr wrote the part of Faust for a baritone, and yet in the opera the hero is obliged once to take a low E flat, and on another occasion he trills on a low G. In the air chosen by Mr. Heinrich there are old-fashioned and meaningless ornamental passages, and the air, as a whole, is neither dramatic nor interesting. Although the singer often showed admirable control of the breath, and although he sang with intelligence, he did not appear to full advantage; for in pure cantabile of merely sensuous beauty and in ornamentation Mr. Heinrich is never as successful as in music of strongly marked dramatic character. He is powerful in the conception, and the carrying out of the diabolical, the terrible, the grotesque; he rides at ease in the storm of passion; he can be dignified in a priestly role; he rises with the intensity of an occasion. It is not surprising then that he was eminently successful in the songs by Schubert, or that he was recalled again and again after his impassioned delivery of them.

The orchestral numbers gave the audience much pleasure. A Haydn Symphony is always welcome, and the brilliant numbers of Moszkowski and Dvorak show the favorable side of modern instrumentation. The incidental solos contributed by Mr. Schulz and Mr. Molé were warmly applauded.

The New York Tribune shows its usual understanding of matters in Boston when it says that "it is no news that admirers of Gericke, the immediate predecessor of the present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have criticized Mr. Nikisch pretty freely these last two seasons." This may not be news in Gotham, but it is here, where it has always been supposed that any criticisms of Mr. Nikisch's work were inspired only by admiration of fine such programmes and symmetrical playing as he did not provide.

We hear from the New York Times the surprising intelligence that the Boston music critics are doing their best to drive Mr. Nikisch out of the city. The Boston music critics would scarcely undertake to do this thing, in view of the fact that they are fully aware that a mortifying defeat would attend their efforts. They perhaps do not rate Mr. Nikisch as high as he is rated in New York; but there are various good and sufficient reasons for that, all of a purely critical nature. This statement of the Times is just as reliable as is its other statement that these same critics assert that New York is the only city in the United States which possesses a first-class permanent orchestra with a thoroughly competent conductor. On the contrary, the Boston music critics have steadily insisted that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is by far the best in the country, and is unsurpassed anywhere. The thoroughly competent conductor is quite another story; but certainly, critical Boston does not cast its eyes in the direction of New York, in the hope of discovering one there; especially since the New York music critics drove Theodore Thomas out of that city.

Anent the Symphony Orchestra Conductor.

Nothing is publicly known, as yet, regarding the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The unexpected secession of the present conductor, has caused some perplexity in finding a successor at a moment's notice. Many rumors have gone abroad regarding the cause of Mr. Nikisch's resignation. Among them is one that the music critics of Boston had made the position irksome to him, by reason of their unfavorable attitude toward his eccentricities as a conductor, and that he could bear it no longer. This of course, is absurd, for he has proclaimed that he has no time to read criticisms, that he is ignorant of what they say of him, and consequently cannot be either pained or pleased by them. As we understand it, Mr. Nikisch's contract had one year to run when the offer of the position at Buda Pesth came to him after it had been declined by Mr. Anton Seidl. While hesitating whether to accept it or not, it is said that he looked forward to a renewal of his contract as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra for another term of five years. The prospect of such an arrangement not being encouraging, he closed with the proposition from Buda Pesth, and as it was imperative on him to begin his duties there next season, he felt obliged to depart without filling out the remaining year of his contract here. How true or how false this may be, we have no means of knowing, and we only give the report for what it is worth. One thing, however, is certain, and that is that the adverse criticisms in nowise inspired his action. All things considered, the departure of Mr. Nikisch is not to be greatly deplored. Charming as he may be as a man, talented as he may be as a musician, he has been, from the very beginning, sadly out of place as the director of the Symphony Orchestra. That body has steadily degenerated since it came under his control, and another year would have inevitably seen its still further fall from the efficiency that characterized it when it first came into his charge. He is essentially an opera conductor, and, not being eclectic in style, he impressed an operative color on every work that he interpreted. This, together with an evident laxity in discipline, or a lack of knowledge how to drill and to keep a symphony orchestra up to a high standard of efficiency, made his efforts far from satisfactory, from the very outset. During his first season the fine condition in which the orchestra was left by his predecessor was still unimpaired, and he reaped the advantage of it, despite his innovating readings. From that time to the present, the splendid body of artists, that he had so thoroughly disciplined, has lost almost every quality that made it the equal of the best orchestras in Europe. The players remain, prepared to regain their earlier perfection, under favorable circumstances, but their work is far from what it was. The conductor has always been, too, much in evidence. He seemed to be more concerned with himself than with the music he caused to be played; the composer was pushed into the background in order that the conductor might become prominent; the artistic was made to give way to the purely personal; Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert were all subjected to the same process, and their individualities were suppressed that the individuality of the conductor might take their place. In other words, the composers, and orchestra, were secondary, and the conductor was first. This was all wrong. It reversed the proper order of things, and, instead of elevating the musical taste of the public, it simply elevated the conductor. We entertain no feelings of animosity toward Mr. Nikisch personally; but we are, and have been from the first, averse to his peculiar methods of utilizing his position for his own special glorification; and we frankly confess that we glad, in the cause of art, that he is going. We trust that the next conductor may not be chosen from the ranks of the unknown, as Mr. Nikisch was. The head of such an orchestra should be an experienced leader, one who can enforce the respect of his musicians by indisputable knowledge of his art, and win their confidence from the beginning by his manifest fitness to be appointed over them. Such a body of artists as those which form the Symphony Orchestra soon takes the measure of a conductor, and if it finds him in any way lacking in skill and experience, loses interest in and esteem for him. We have now had three German conductors at these concerts; and our musical tastes have been thoroughly Germanized in consequence. Would it not be wise, now, to try some eminent French conductor by way of bringing back matters to a fair level of eclecticism in taste?

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Dramatic Overture (MS.), by Margaret Ruthven Lang, (first time); Recitative and aria, for tenor, from "Faust," by Spohr; Symphony C-minor, No. 9 (B. & H.), Haydn; "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht," Schubert; Andante and Vivace from Suite No. 1, in F, Tchaikowsky; Scherzo Capriccioso, op. 66, Dvorak. The soloist was Mr. Max Heinrich. The novelty of the concert was Miss Lang's overture. It was notable as the first purely orchestral work by a native woman composer, that has been performed here. Of the composition itself there is not much to be said that is pleasant in the saying. It is creditable as the result of a laudable ambition to essay an important work, and it may be pronounced a promising first attempt; but it is scarcely of a worth to warrant its performance, unless, indeed, to afford the composer an opportunity to hear it, and to profit by the experience. In the first place, it is hardly an overture, as the term is generally understood, and it is not dramatic in any sense. It has more the character of an orchestral fantasia. Nothing is clearly defined, nothing is completed. It is one long effort to say something, without any very clear idea of what is to be said. The general effect is spasmodic and fragmentary; and the work does not hang well together. The orchestration is vigorous, but is without richness or character. It has strong color here and there, but is never closely knit, and is often confusingly foggy. The pervading fault of the work, however, is that its meaning is not made apparent. It seems to wander on without any objective point, and, despite its length, is over before it has been made quite clear that it has really begun. In other words, it has all the faults of youth without any of its spontaneity and artless exuberance of fancy and of imagination. It is earnest in aim, and never sinks to commonplace, but is unmistakably "made music." As an evidence of its composer's serious study and its application, it is very commendable; but it is immature, and should not have been submitted to public criticisms. It is not gratifying to be compelled to write thus discouragingly of the work of a young composer, but no good is to be accomplished by glossing over the truth, and we are sure that it is wiser and kinder to point out the shortcomings of the composition than to indulge in insincerity and to damn it with faint praise. The audience received it in a very kind spirit, and applauded heartily. An effort was made to call the composer forward, but it was unsuccessful. Mr. Heinrich sang the archaic Spohr aria in a wholly artistic manner. He was not wholly happy in rendering its more ornate passages, but he was evidently under a cloud, and was not at his best. His fine artistic intelligence and his musicianship, however were always apparent, and he fairly won the two cordial recalls that rewarded his efforts. In the Schubert songs he was wholly successful and sang them magnificently and with noble dramatic effect; again winning two recalls. The Haydn Symphony was well read and sympathetically played. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Concerto for violin, D-minor, Brahms; Symphonic Tone Poem, Busoni, (first time); Overture "Oberon," Weber. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

At the Symphony concert last evening the first selection, entitled a "Dramatic Overture," was composed by Margaret Ruthven Lang. The composer is well known in this city as the daughter of Mr. B. J. Lang, the esteemed director of the Apollo and Cecilia Clubs, and a musician who for many years has been prominently identified with the musical growth of our city. Miss Lang was born in Boston, Nov. 27, 1867. At an early age she displayed a decided talent for musical composition, yet her serious study of this important branch of her art was later on in life under the direction of Gluth in Munich. Her earliest study of music began with the pianoforte under the instruction of one of her father's pupils. Miss Lang afterwards received personal instruction from her father, and later began the study of the violin under Schmidt. Her subsequent instructors were Drechsler, Abel and Gluth in Munich and recently Mr. E. A. MacDowell, of Boston.

The overture while evidently the work of a skillful, and refined musician is nevertheless a very characteristic sample of kapelmestermusik. There is a certain benign composure and nobility of intant in the writing of it, that is all too conspicuous, but the work appears to contain but a single well defined theme which is very reminiscent of the oriental music in Verdi's Aida. This theme is so tautologically treated and so frequently repeated that the prevailing impression created by it is one of monotony and languor. Perhaps the most praiseworthy feature of the overture is in the orchestral coloring of its harmonic development which is altogether excellent.

Mr. Max Heinrich in his rendering of the aria by Spohr was characteristically successful in making melody what it ought to be, namely, not an exhibition of acquired skill, but a pliant and sympathetic language for the expression of thought and feeling. The enchanting cantabile and an absolutely pure and unaffected style that characterized Mr. Heinrich's vocal delivery were beyond comparison with any singing that has been heard from any vocalist who has appeared in the present series of symphony concerts. Later in the evening Mr. Heinrich sang with exquisite expressiveness two songs by Schubert, "Grüße aus dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht." The artist was heartily complimented by the audience and four times recalled after his singing of the songs by Schubert.

The performance of a Haydn symphony (No. 9 Breitkopf and Hartel edition) last evening was a no less rare than welcome variation of the general character of the Boston symphony concert programmes this season. Haydn's symphonies sparkle with an indescribable true, pure and genial sentiment which can be found no where else. Salomon, the English concert agent and musician, who instigated Haydn's two visits to England, and for whom Haydn wrote twelve symphonies, classifies the C minor symphony (No. 9, B. & H.) as No. 5. It is a composition in which we find the master's ever sunny nature pouring out the whole wealth of its emotional life; and yet it is not without an abundance of the quaintness and formality of the fastidious old master, for it is said that Haydn, like Buffon, always thought it necessary, before he sat down to his work, to have his hair put in the same nice order as though he were going out, and that on all such occasions he dressed himself with a very pronounced degree of magnificence. It is even related that Haydn felt that he could not summon a single idea for either a sonata or symphony unless he had on the diamond ring that Frederic II sent him. But father Haydn was by no means an exception to great masters in general in entertaining certain whims as quite indispensable to the development of their art work. Tartini before composing, invariably read one of the soft sonnets from a classic poet. Charles Rink could not develop a composition until he had first written at the head of it the words "Mit Gott." The bilious Alfieri, whose paintings of tyrants has exhibited all the stern bitterness which preys upon them, was passionately fond of listening to music before he sat down to work. Haydn was not only particular as to the style of dress with which he approached his art, but the paper on which he wrote had to be of the finest and whitest possible; and unlike Beethoven, he wrote with so much neatness and care that the most artistic copyist could not have surpassed him in the symmetry and cleverness of his notation. Such little heads and slender tails had his notes that he (Haydn) used quite appropriately to call them file's legs. The analysis of G. P. Upton in writing of Haydn's ninth symphony calls attention to the bold steps at the opening and the march-like rhythm of the third and fourth bars, although subdued in a dynamic sense and never used in a military mood, gives the movement a certain crispness which is effectively counteracted by the second theme. The andante cantabile in E flat in its idyllic theme betrays the composer of "with verdure clad," and fairly out-rides that well-known melody in sweetness. The working out of this theme in a number of variations is, perhaps, the most antique feature of the work. The minuet is one of the favorite concert numbers and is an ingenious as well as a characteristic specimen of grace and refined humor, combined with the always quaint stateliness of the old-fashioned dance. The trio varies from the previous ones in that the movement of eight notes appears staccato throughout and is given to the cellos, the violins only marking the rhythm. The finale vivace is very rich in the treatment of counterpoint and fugue; but the leading theme at once tells us that we have nothing to fear in the way of dry or pendant music. The general treatment reminds one of Haydn's earlier symphonies, although much of it shows the influence of Mozart.

The Symphony was somewhat coarsely and unsympathetically read by Mr. Nikisch, and the orchestral performance corresponded. Perhaps the worthiest orchestral performances in the concert was of the two movements from the Moszkowski, Suite No. 1. With this work the artistic sympathy that prevailed among the performing musicians was very noticeable, and the composer's music throughout was very beautifully and refinedly interpreted. The voluptuous alluring effects of the perpetuum mobile movement tickled the audience immensely and the performance of it was loudly applauded. The concert ended with the "Scherzo Capriccioso," opus 66, by Dvorak, which was delightfully played.

Mr. Nikisch's determination to leave Boston is perhaps not so strange if we consider that, according to the Evening Record, one of "several well-known musical critics in Boston who never did like Mr. Nikisch" said the other day that "John Mullaly is ten times a better and more substantial director than he. Why, Nikisch came here with scarcely any experience in symphonic music, and the first time he stood up before the orchestra he gave himself all away. The men in the orchestra saw what he was in a minute."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday began with a "dramatic overture" by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang. It is the reviewer's task to state that this work was not up to the level of these concerts. Miss Lang has won some deserved successes at the Apollo Club concerts in the field of chorus composition, and has written some graceful bits of instrumental music which have achieved the dignity of publication, but it is a long stride from this to orchestral work in a large form, and to make the first public attempt in a concert course which is supposed to present the finest music that the world affords, to enter a programme which presented selections by Haydn, Dvorak and Moszkowski, was little less than rash. One may pay tribute to an evident tact in the matter of orchestral coloring that holds forth good promise for the future, but it may be at once added that these concerts are not supposed to be devoted to the presentation of incipient greatness. As the work was entitled a "dramatic overture," one need not quarrel with the fact that its form was very vague, but the dramatic element was not powerful enough to sustain the interest, nothing was carried to a logical conclusion, much was spasmodic, and at times the whole case could only be diagnosed as orchestral hysteria. It is not true encouragement of young genius to allow tasks to be undertaken before adequate strength is attained; great reputation acquired too soon is ever the heaviest of burdens, and it was not the friendliest act in the world to allow entrance to the symphony programmes to a young composer (who has done good work, and will do more,) before she was equipped for the task.

Of all the numerous Fausts Spohr's is the weakest. The libretto becomes a parody when placed beside that of Goethe, and the formal platitudes of the composer portray a love story that is worthy of the sentimental Kotzebue. Mr. Max Heinrich sang the aria "Der Hoelle Selbst," from this work, with much surety in the modulations, and with good shading, but in the roulades there was a degree of over-accentuation present which somewhat marred the effect. The best of Mr. Heinrich's work was done in the two Schubert songs which came later in the programme; here Mr. Nikisch accompanied very finely, and the singer gave a degree of dramatic expression that won every auditor. Three recalls followed the conclusion of "Die Allmacht," but, in accordance with the old traditions of usage at these concerts, no encore was given.

The Haydn symphony (No. 9, Breitkopf & Haertel) was well played; the first movement had more virility given to it than is often the case. The andante seemed rather a periwigged specimen of the formal Haydn; its shape is not unlike the slow movement of Beethoven's fifth symphony, being a set of variations with episodes interspersed, but what a difference in treatment! And yet one of the reviewers in Beethoven's lifetime said "Mr. Beethoven cannot, and never could, properly vary a theme. If he desires to achieve anything in this direction, let him study the models of Haydn."

The trio of the minuet consisted of a cello solo, which Mr. Schulz played so finely that the audience would not be satisfied until he had bowed his acknowledgments from his seat in the orchestra. The finale of the symphony was one of those rollicking, rather inconsequential affairs which were the regulation endings of the symphony before Beethoven gave a deeper meaning to the last movement. The influence of the gigue, which ended the suite (from which the cyclical form of the symphony came) is plainly apparent in such movements.

But the great success of the programme lay in the last two selections. Here modern passion and caprice came on the tapis and Mr. Nikisch was entirely in his element. The theme and variations from Moszkowski's suite in F major, is one of the most fluent bits of orchestral writing that has been recently heard; it is not deep, it is not soul-stirring, but within its own graceful domain it is perfection. Such a work serves admirably to display the technique of the orchestra in detail, since the different departments of the organizations pass, as it were, in review before the auditor. In this parade the following points of excellence were apparent: The violins did superb work in the second and sixth variations and in the finale, the pizzicato effects of the seventh were exquisitely done, and the caprice of the fifth variation was caught up with perfect ensemble by the entire orchestra. The flute playing of the fourth variation could have been better, as it was rather spasmodic and the breathing was not so well managed as we have come to expect from this player. In the Moto Perpetuo which ended this selection, the first violins proved that they are artists every one; no orchestra in the world could have done this number more perfectly.

The concert ended with Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso, which was as brilliant as anything that has been done in these concerts for years. It seemed to exactly suit Mr. Nikisch's mood, and the sparks flew in the exciting way from one of the wildest compositions that the repertoire contains. Amid all its wildness and caprice the ensemble was not once irregular, which is saying very much for both director and orchestra.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MISS LANG'S OVERTURE

Heard for the First Time at the Symphony Concert.

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was given: Dramatic Overture (manuscript), Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang; recitative and aria, "Faust," Spohr; symphony in C minor, Haydn; two songs of Schubert, with pianoforte accompaniment; two movements from Suite No. 1, in F major, Moszkowski; scherzo capriccioso, Dvorak. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist. The audience is not gratifying to be compelled to write thus discouragingly of the work of a young composer, but no good is to be accomplished by glossing over the truth, and we are sure that it is wiser and kinder to point out the shortcomings of the composition than to indulge in insincerity and to damn it with faint praise. The audience received it in a very kind spirit, and applauded heartily. An effort was made to call the composer forward, but it was unsuccessful. Mr. Heinrich sang the archaic Spohr aria in a wholly artistic manner. He was not wholly happy in rendering its more ornate passages, but he was evidently under a cloud, and was not at his best. His fine artistic intelligence and his musicianship, however, were always apparent, and he fairly won the two cordial recalls that rewarded his efforts. In the Schubert songs he was wholly successful and sang them magnificently and with noble dramatic effect; again winning two recalls. The Haydn Symphony was well read and sympathetically played. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Concerto for violin, D-minor, Brahms; Symphonic Tone Poem, Busoni, (first time); Overture "Oberon," Weber. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

MUSIC.

THE SYMPHONY.

At the Symphony concert last evening the first selection, entitled a "Dramatic Overture," was composed by Margaret Ruthven Lang. The composer is well known in this city as the daughter of Mr. B. J. Lang, the esteemed director of the Apollo and Cecilia Clubs, and a musician who for many years has been prominently identified with the musical growth of our city. Miss Lang was born in Boston, Nov. 27, 1867. At an early age she displayed a decided talent for musical composition, yet her serious study of this important branch of her art was later on in life under the direction of Gluth in Munich. Her earliest study of music began with the pianoforte under the instruction of one of her father's pupils. Miss Lang afterwards received personal instruction from her father, and later began the study of the violin under Schmidt. Her subsequent instructors were Drechsler, Abel and Gluth in Munich and recently Mr. E. A. MacDowell, of Boston.

The overture while evidently the work of a skillful, and refined musician is nevertheless a very characteristic sample of kapelmeistermusik. There is a certain benign composure and nobility of intent in the writing of it, that is all too conspicuous, but the work appears to contain but a single well defined theme which is very reminiscent of the oriental music in Verdi's Aida. This theme is so tautologically treated and so frequently repeated that the prevailing impression created by it is one of monotony and languor. Perhaps the most praiseworthy feature of the overture is in the orchestral coloring of its harmonic development which is altogether excellent.

Mr. Max Heinrich in his rendering of the aria by Spohr was characteristically successful in making melody what it ought to be, namely, not an exhibition of acquired skill, but a pliant and sympathetic language for the expression of thought and feeling. The enchanting cantabile and an absolutely pure and unaffected style that characterized Mr. Heinrich's vocal delivery were beyond comparison with any singing that has been heard from any vocalist who has appeared in the present series of symphony concerts. Later in the evening Mr. Heinrich sang with exquisite expressiveness two songs by Schubert, "Grüße ans dem Tartarus" and "Die Allmacht." The artist was heartily complimented by the audience and four times recalled after his singing of the songs by Schubert.

The performance of a Haydn symphony (No. 9 Breitkopf and Hartel edition) last evening was a no less rare than welcome variation of the general character of the Boston symphony concert programmes this season. Haydn's symphonies sparkle with an indescribable true, pure and genial sentiment which can be found no where else. Salamon, the English concert agent and musician, who instigated Haydn's two visits to England, and for whom Haydn wrote twelve symphonies, classifies the C minor symphony (No. 9, B. & H.) as No. 5. It is a composition in which we find the master's ever sunny nature pouring out the whole wealth of its emotional life; and yet it is not without an abundance of the quaintness and formality of the fastidious old master, for it is said that Haydn, like Buffon, always thought it necessary, before he sat down to his work, to have his hair put in the same nice order as though he were going out, and that on all such occasions he dressed himself with a very pronounced degree of magnificence. It is even related that Haydn felt that he could not summon a single idea for either a sonata or symphony unless he had on the diamond ring that Frederic II sent him. But father Haydn was by no means an exception to great masters in general in entertaining certain whims as quite indispensable to the development of their art work. Tartini before composing, invariably read one of the soft sonnets from a classic poet. Charles Rink could not develop a composition until he had first written at the head of it the words "Mit Gott." The bilious Alfieri, whose paintings of tyrants has exhibited all the stern bitterness which preys upon them, was passionately fond of listening to music before he sat down to work. Haydn was not only particular as to the style of dress with which he approached his art, but the paper on which he wrote had to be of the finest and whitest possible; and unlike Beethoven, he wrote with so much neatness and care that the most artistic copyist could not have surpassed him in the symmetry and cleverness of his notation. Such little heads and slender tails had his notes that he (Haydn) used quite appropriately to call them fle's legs. The analysis of G. P. Upton in writing of Haydn's ninth symphony calls attention to the bold steps at the opening and the march-like rhythm of the third and fourth bars, although subdued in a dynamic sense and never used in a military mood, gives the movement a certain crispness which is effectively counteracted by the second theme. The andante cantabile in E flat in its idyllic theme betrays the composer of "with verdure clad," and fairly out- rivals that well-known melody in sweetness. The working out of this theme in a number of variations is, perhaps, the most antique feature of the work. The minuet is one of the favorite concert numbers and is an ingenious as well as a characteristic specimen of grace and refined humor, combined with the always quaint stateliness of the old-fashioned dance. The trio varies from the previous ones in that the movement of eight notes appears staccato throughout and is given to the cellos, the violins only marking the rhythm. The finale vivace is very rich in the treatment of counterpoint and fugue; but the leading theme at once tells us that we have nothing to fear in the way of dry or pendant music. The general treatment reminds one of Haydn's earlier symphonies, although much of it shows the influence of Mozart.

The Symphony was somewhat coarsely and unsympathetically read by Mr. Nikisch, and the orchestral performance corresponded. Perhaps the worthiest orchestral performances in the concert were of the two movements from the Moszkowski Suite No. 1. With this work the artistic sympathy that prevailed among the performing musicians was very noticeable, and the composer's music throughout was very beautifully and refinedly interpreted. The voluptuous alluring effects of the perpetuum mobile movement tickled the audience immensely and the performance of it was loudly applauded. The concert ended with the "Scherzo Capriccio," opus 66, by Dvorak, which was delightfully played.

Mr. Nikisch's determination to leave Boston is perhaps not so strange if we consider that, according to the Evening Record, one of "several well-known musical critics in Boston who never did like Mr. Nikisch" said the other day that "John Mullaly is ten times a better and more substantial director than he. Why, Nikisch came here with scarcely any experience in symphonic music, and the first time he stood up before the orchestra he gave himself all away. The men in the orchestra saw what he was in a minute."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday began with a "dramatic overture" by Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang. It is the reviewer's task to state that this work was not up to the level of these concerts. Miss Lang has won some deserved successes at the Apollo Club concerts in the field of chorus composition, and has written some graceful bits of instrumental music which have achieved the dignity of publication, but it is a long stride from this to orchestral work in a large form, and to make the first public attempt in a concert course which is supposed to present the finest music that the world affords, to enter a programme which presented selections by Haydn, Dvorak and Moszkowski, was little less than rash. One may pay tribute to an evident tact in the matter of orchestral coloring that holds forth good promise for the future, but it may be at once added that these concerts are not supposed to be devoted to the presentation of incipient greatness. As the work was entitled a "dramatic overture," one need not quarrel with the fact that its form was very vague, but the dramatic element was not powerful enough to sustain the interest, nothing was carried to a logical conclusion, much was spasmodic, and at times the whole case could only be diagnosed as orchestral hysteria. It is not true encouragement of young genius to allow tasks to be undertaken before adequate strength is attained; great reputation acquired too soon is ever the heaviest of burdens, and it was not the friendliest act in the world to allow entrance to the symphony programmes to a young composer (who has done good work, and will do more,) before she was equipped for the task.

Of all the numerous Fausts Spohr's is the weakest. The libretto becomes a parody when placed beside that of Goethe, and the formal platitudes of the composer portray a love story that is worthy of the sentimental Kotzebue. Mr. Max Heinrich sang the aria "Der Hoeile Selbst," from this work, with much surety in the modulations, and with good shading, but in the roulades there was a degree of over-accentuation present which somewhat marred the effect. The best of Mr. Heinrich's work was done in the two Schubert songs which came later in the programme; here Mr. Nikisch accompanied very finely, and the singer gave a degree of dramatic expression that won every auditor. Three recalls followed the conclusion of "Die Allmacht," but, in accordance with the old traditions of usage at these concerts, no encore was given.

The Haydn symphony (No. 9, Breitkopf & Haertel) was well played; the first movement had more virility given to it than is often the case. The andante seemed rather a periwigged specimen of the formal Haydn; its shape is not unlike the slow movement of Beethoven's fifth symphony, being a set of variations with episodes interspersed, but what a difference in treatment! And yet one of the reviewers in Beethoven's lifetime said "Mr. Beethoven cannot, and never could, properly vary a theme. If he desires to achieve anything in this direction, let him study the models of Haydn."

The trio of the minuet consisted of a cello solo, which Mr. Schulz played so finely that the audience would not be satisfied until he had bowed his acknowledgments from his seat in the orchestra. The finale of the symphony was one of those rollicking, rather inconsequential affairs which were the regulation endings of the symphony before Beethoven gave a deeper meaning to the last movement. The influence of the gigue, which ended the suite (from which the cyclical form of the symphony came) is plainly apparent in such movements.

But the great success of the programme lay in the last two selections. Here modern passion and caprice came on the tapis and Mr. Nikisch was entirely in his element. The theme and variations from Moszkowski's suite in F major, is one of the most fluent bits of orchestral writing that has been recently heard; it is not deep, it is not soul-stirring, but within its own graceful domain it is perfection. Such a work serves admirably to display the technique of the orchestra in detail, since the different departments of the organizations pass, as it were, in review before the auditor. In this parade the following points of excellence were apparent: The violins did superb work in the second and sixth variations and in the finale, the pizzicato effects of the seventh were exquisitely done, and the caprice of the fifth variation was caught up with perfect ensemble by the entire orchestra. The flute playing of the fourth variation could have been better, as it was rather spasmodic and the breathing was not so well managed as we have come to expect from this player. In the Moto Perpetuo which ended this selection, the first violins proved that they are artists every one; no orchestra in the world could have done this number more perfectly.

The concert ended with Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso, which was as brilliant as anything that has been done in these concerts for years. It seemed to exactly suit Mr. Nikisch's mood, and the sparks flew in the exciting way from one of the wildest compositions that the repertoire contains. Amid all its wildness and caprice the ensemble was not once irregular, which is saying very much for both director and orchestra.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MISS LANG'S OVERTURE

Heard for the First Time at the Symphony Concert.

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was given: Dramatic Overture (manuscript), Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang; recitative and aria, "Faust," Spohr; symphony in C minor, Haydn; two songs of Schubert, with pianoforte accompaniment; two movements from Suite No. 1, in F major, Moszkowski; scherzo capriccioso, Dvorak. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist. The audience was perhaps the smallest of the season, but there was considerable applause during the evening.

294

It would be a pleasant task to speak in praise of Miss Lang's orchestral piece but the results gained would not warrant such a course. Miss Lang has written many pretty songs and has shown talent in the pieces written for male voices and sung by the Apollo Club, but the step from this grade of material to the writing of a dramatic overture of sufficient worth to claim a place upon a Symphony concert programme is quite a long one.

The effort of this "dramatic overture" was a purposeless one, and it could as well be called the "Babes in the Wood," as far as any dramatic significance is concerned. Any capable student can make such music as this who has a little invention at hand, and to write similarly for the orchestra is not so difficult either, with the hundreds of stereotyped formulas that are available in the works of modern composers and student-writers.

The first thing to be considered is what is the musical value of a composition? Has it form; has it a defined purpose?

Miss Lang should not be discouraged because of this failure to compose a dramatic overture. Through the ill advice of her friends and the lack of discrimination upon the part of the person who arranges the programmes for the Symphony concerts, this youthful composer has had her inability to reach certain heights made plain, and the lesson should be a profitable one. It should not dampen her ambition, however. Her case is not an isolated one. The audience applauded the playing loudly.

Mr. Max Heinrich is an artist of rare musical qualities. It is seldom that such broad, comprehensive singing as Mr. Heinrich presented upon this occasion is heard upon our concert stage. His intonation was not immaculate by any means, neither were some of his processes of voice production to be observed as models for emulation, but beyond these discrepancies his singing was masterly. Would that more of our vocal aspirants possessed the cantabile that Mr. Heinrich has at his command.

It is gratifying to record that he was recalled several times after each number.

Mr. Heinrich is a German, to be sure, but he is an English-speaking one, and his performance would have been enhanced by his using our native tongue. Only a few Germans in the audience understood what he was singing about.

Our concert public has been Germanized to death, nearly, for years. It is time we had a change in this direction. Mr. Arthur Nikisch played the piano accompaniments to the two Schubert songs with skill and fine effect. Mr. Nikisch is quite a master in this difficult art.

Throughout the evening the orchestra played remarkably well, the only drawback to a wholly commendable performance was the overloud and rough manner in which the forte passages in the Haydn Symphony were given. Mr. Leo Schulz played the cello solo in the minuet of the symphony in such an admirable manner he was obliged to bow to the acknowledgment by the audience. The flute solo in the Moskowski piece was not played in Mr. Mole's best manner. Both the Moskowski and the Dvorak numbers were admirably performed by the orchestra.

Next Saturday, Mr. Kneisel will play the concerto for violin in D major by Brahms, and there will be a manuscript symphonic tone poem by Mr. Busoni, played for the first time. Schumann's "Manfred" overture and the overture to Weber's "Oberon" will complete the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Steb
Symphony Concert.

Miss Margaret Ruthven Lang's new dramatic overture was given for the first time at the Symphony last week, the fine composition by our talented townswoman proving to be of great merit. In the beginning two themes are developed, one sombre and of an antique character, the other passionate and modern in treatment, each played against the other and producing a dramatic effect original but melodious.

The working out is concise and beautifully harmonized, and the return to the first part is gradual and regular, without harsh cadences or Wagnerian style of orchestration.

The young composer has treated the stronger instruments of the orchestra very effectively, utilizing them for special themes in several instances, which gives a marked tonal color and contrast to the gentler fortissimo passages.

The work received a most flattering reception, and Mr. Nikisch's orchestra gave a delightful interpretation of the number.

Mr. Max Heinrich was the solo singer, and his work, as usual, was thoroughly enjoyable. A recitative and aria from Spohr's "Faust" was sung with notable expression and dramatic fire, and in the Schubert numbers, in which Mr. Heinrich played his own accompaniments, the accomplished artist again illustrated his wonderful dual ability as a player and singer.

Haydn's ninth symphony received adequate treatment, the performance of the celloist in the trio being specially noteworthy. The brilliant finale was also extremely well played.

Two movements from Moszkowski's suite No. 1 were capitally given as a whole. The many difficult variations for the different instruments were as a rule smoothly played, and the "perpetual motion" finale seemed to present but few stumbling blocks to the orchestra.

Dvorak's scherzo capriccioso was given with delightful dash and brilliancy.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 15, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

ROBERT SCHUMANN.

OVERTURE. "Manfred."

JOHANNES BRAHMS.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D major.

I. Allegro non troppo. D major.

II. Adagio. F major.

III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace. D major.

FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

SYMPHONIC TONE POEM. (Manuscript).
(First time.)

KARL MARIA VON WEBER. OVERTURE. "Oberon."

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The overture to Manfred is the most powerful of its school, and as a portrayal of soul-conflict can only be compared with Wagner's "Faust" overture, but is superior to that work in that here we find the feminine element in vivid contrast with the masculine, the tender theme of Astarte being in beautiful contrast with the dark broodings of Manfred, while Wagner has given us the self-torture of Faust, but purposely omitted reference to Marguerite, in his overture.

The performance was a good one but the depth of Manfred is not as apt to be appreciated by the general public as the glitter of a "Carnaval Romaine," or the theatrical touches of a "Freischuetz" overture, and the applause was not as hearty as deserved. One may especially praise the trumpets which have exceptionally difficult and important work to do and did it excellently. Strange warnings of death and disaster, are those weird trumpet tones.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist, and he received a welcome of which he may be proud. He at once proceeded to justify this by a wonderfully dignified and impressive performance of Brahms' violin concerto.

To compare the last violin solo given in these concerts (a sugary confection by Raff) with this noble work was, if not likening Hyperion to a Satyr, at least to compare a giant with a fop. Yet the strength of the work seems to lie in its first movement, and some of the subsequent matter comes as an anticlimax.

Mr. Kneisel has not the breadth of tone of a Joachim or the abandon and passion of a Sarasate, but he has a surety equal to even these masters. In some of his work refinement replaces ardor, and intellectuality compensates for an occasional lack of fire. It was, all in all, a pure, artistic, and satisfying performance. The climax of technical excellence was attained in the cadenza of the first movement, composed by Mr. Kneisel himself, which presented the acme of double-stopping, almost continuous trilling, and ended with brilliant chromatic work. The second movement charmed by the delicacy with which the principal subject was played, and here one may conjoin the oboe player (M. Sautet) with Mr. Kneisel in speaking of the perfection of the movement; his performance was without flaw. The last movement had no tangible fault, but it scarcely attained the high level of the first one. Mr. Kneisel deserved the great applause which followed the end of the work, and the recalls were many and accompanied with floral tributes.

Now followed a tonal labyrinth by Ferruccio B. Busoni. It was called a Symphonic Tone-poem, and it reminded strongly of the style of the orchestral rhapsodies in which Liszt has indulged. It began with a moan in the deepest woodwind and continued in the atmosphere of agony and conflict to the very end. Yet the writer received the impression that there was some beauty in it, and some coherent ideas somewhere, if he could have had the opportunity to have studied it. The wild boldness of it all made it comparable to a Turner painting of the latest epoch. Every possible tone-color was there; the Glockenspiel, which has been supposed to be an instrument of sweetness, came in during the most tempestuous passages, and there were military phrases for trumpets and drums; the trombones gave a series of phrases which alternated with ferocious rushes on the strings, and there were spasmodic moments of sweetness that seemed to suggest the apotheosis of something or other. One can only echo the words of Southey's Young Peterkin, "Now tell us what 'twas all about," and rely upon the composer for a solution of the tangle of tones. Such a work, by a man of proved genius, is a strong argument for a return to more definite forms; it would be unfortunate to have the Wagnerian spirit (so glorious when combined with words and portraying a definite idea) attempt to seize upon the symphony. Bruckner led the attack upon the instrumental forms, waving the Wagnerian banner, and one is seldom troubled with his symphonies nowadays; one may remonstrate against Mr. Busoni charging with the same "forlorn hope."

With Weber's "Oberon" overture the concert ended. Mr. Nikisch gives Weber his full due, and is as dramatic and theatrical as any could desire. The introduction, nevertheless, seemed somewhat overdrawn. The rest of the work, however, was of the utmost brilliancy, and its verve and dash call for great commendation.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC.

The Twenty-second Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second concert of the Symphony Orchestra was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred".....Schumann
Concerto for violin, D-major.....Brahms
Symphonic Tone Poem (Manuscript).....Busoni
Overture, Oberon.....Weber

Mr. Kneisel was the violinist.

Mr. Busoni's orchestral poem is dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

It calls for a modern orchestra that includes harp, double-bassoon, bass-clarinet, English horn, gong, cymbals, xylophone and drums in plenty.

And yet, with all these instruments, Mr. Busoni does not succeed in catching one effect.

He is alert, he is eager; he deliberately makes great preparations, so that the hearer sees him laying trains of gunpowder for the future explosions; or, again, he hopes to catch the hearer napping, and startle him by an unexpected discharge of orchestral artillery.

But try as he may; let him use silence or the xylophone, or let him set everything going at full speed; lo, there is no effect, except that the hearer, however well-disposed, is disturbed and dismayed.

The poem is said to be "purely fanciful," "absolutely free."

The hearer therefore enjoys the privilege of discovering things in the music.

The hearer is first introduced to Snensser's darksome cave, where he finds "That cursed man, low sitting on the ground, Musing full sadly in his sullied mind,"

The scene changes and the curtain rises on the earthquake at Lisbon. There is a funeral march in honor of the engulfed. The mourning is dispelled by the advance of the Chinese army arrayed in all the glorious panoply of war. Again we are in Europe, and the sun rises on the battle of Austerlitz. After the realistic description of the battle, there are groans for the defeated, lamentation for the slain, and cheers for the little Man in Gray. But now the hearer becomes confused; the music is wilder and is thrown from the stage in spasmodic jets. There are suggestions of the blowing up of Hell Gate and an audible aurora borealis. And there is a final return to the cave in the first scene.

Mr. Busoni is a pianist of remarkable ability. No one in this country to-day is in certain respects his superior, and in other certain respects he is superior to his colleagues. He has orchestral technique as well as the technique of the pianist. But when he wrote this orchestral poem he had nothing to say. And so he wrote many notes for many instruments.

A little simplicity would have been more to the purpose. One melody of power or beauty would have been grateful.

A logical sentence firmly knit would have pleased more than this rhapsody, punctuated solely by dashes, exclamation points and points of interrogation.

The feature of the concert was Mr. Kneisel's fine performance of the concerto. There might have been a more marked display of power in the last movement, and nowhere in the performance was there a revelation of temperament. But the playing of Mr. Kneisel was pure, accurate, chaste and full of noble serenity. He deserved the hearty applause that followed each movement; for he is an artist whose chief aim is to glorify the chosen composer, and he devotes himself body and soul to the task.

The overtures were played with dramatic power, and the concert was of reasonable length.

The next concert will be devoted to selections from the works of Wagner. Miss Kaschowska, Mrs. Nikisch, Miss Leimer and Mr. Meyn will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Schumann... Overture, "Manfred."
Brahms..... Concerto for violin in D major.
F. B. Busoni-Symphonic Tone Poem. (Manuscript). (First time.)

Weber..... Overture, "Oberon."

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist.

The novelty upon the programme, the "Symphonic Tone Poem" of Busoni's, proved to be anything but an agreeable experience. It is without exception the most hideous thing that has been produced during the entire existence of these concerts. It has nothing whatever to say, and is but a mass of sound and noise. The fact that it presents some invention in orchestral effects does not in the least enhance its value, for the interest one might take in such inge-nulty is strangled by the constant cacophony that exists.

No wonder the programme analyst says: "This composition well-nigh defies technical analysis. It has little in common with ordinary symphonic forms, or indeed with traditional musical forms of any sort." Now this is really a pretty strong condemnation of the work, but as rank as it is, it is drawing it very mild when the absolute worthlessness of the composition as a musical work is considered. If this is a specimen of Mr. Busoni's talent as a composer then he has shown himself rotten before ripe. The lunga pausa near the end was the only agreeable moment during its performance. The piece fell flat upon the audience, there being a slight scattering applause.

Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto in that charming, highly artistic manner that always marks his efforts. It is refreshing to listen to the playing of Mr. Kneisel. The wonderful technique that meets the most exacting demands, the faultless intonation, the delicacy, the total absence of any rasping or scraping in the forte passages, the comprehensive grasp of the composer's intentions, in fact all of the attainments that mark the master performer are observable in the playing of Mr. Kneisel.

The enthusiastic and prolonged welcome he received when he stepped forth and the tremendous applause and numerous recalls at the end of his performance showed the high estimation of the public concerning this artist's superb abilities. The accompaniment, although quite discrete upon the part of his associates, who to a man recognize his rare abilities, needed the controlling influence of a competent conductor in securing a more exacting condition of delicacy in order that Mr. Kneisel's refined interpretation of the solo should have been at all times more apparent.

There was much to praise in the manner that the orchestra played the Schumann and Weber overtures. The superb effects that Mr. Gericke always obtained in the playing of these overtures were not realized, but, as a whole, considering how badly the orchestra has played during the present regime, the critical listener must have found much that was gratifying, more particularly in the "Oberon" overture. Next Saturday evening the programme will consist wholly of Wagner excerpts.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Overture to "Manfred," Opus 115.
Brahms: Concerto for violin, in D major, Opus 77.
Busoni: Symphonic Tone Poem (MS.).
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

The ever-beautiful "Manfred" overture, with its divine second theme, was admirably played. Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni's tone-poem is a novelty in more senses than one; it is both new and novel. As a piece of orchestration, of the most astounding and often wondrously beautiful orchestral coloring, it may seek its fellow; even Gilson's "La Mer" does not attain to such a pitch of magical beauty of clang-tint. It seems as if Mr. Busoni had at one fell swoop exhausted the capabilities of the modern orchestra. But when we pass beyond color and get to form, then we must own to being thoroughly baffled by this tone-poem. We have listened to it, we have studied the score, but we must admit that it seems to us more nearly formless than any composition we ever saw. It does not so much give the impression of a work in a new, hitherto untried form as it does of a work that really has no musical form at all. Still it is pleasant to listen to, if you can make up your mind in the beginning to give up all attempts to understand it musically; to us it is a series of physically delightful sounds. The orchestra played it wonderfully well. Weber's "Oberon" overture, coming immediately after it as it did, shone with redoubled brilliancy by its definiteness of musical purpose and clearness of expression. Is there any other single passage in all orchestral music as brilliant as the first phrase in the Allegro of this overture? No doubt there may be, but it is hard to believe it. The orchestra covered itself with glory in the performance.

After this, the third, hearing of Brahms's violin concerto here, the work impresses one as distinctly noble, beautiful and full of power. Yet, with all its beauty, it has a rather fateful sound, as of one more voice proclaiming the approaching end of the violin concerto as a current form of musical composition. That writing an extended work for solo violin and orchestra should demand a certain amount of self-abnegation in the composer of the present day is already an ill-boding symptom; that even a composer of Brahms's classical bent should find this self-abnegation more than he is willing to exercise, and should thus transfer a considerable share of it to the solo performer's shoulders is a still graver symptom. Here are three long movements, each one of them in a nowadays exceptionally pure form; and one hardly finds more than three or four passages in the whole work which do not carry the conviction that the composer, in his heart of hearts, would have preferred to have the solo instrument out of the way, so that he could make play with his orchestra. Except when he exercises the most conscientious self-control, his orchestra throws the solo violin into the shade: you can almost hear his sigh of relief at the beginning of a tutti, or in places where he answers a phrase of the violin with this or that orchestral combination. The soul and spirit of the solo instrument is not in him; he finds it not an inspiration, but a shackle. To ask him to give it the commanding prominence it should have in a concerto is asking more than he can find in his heart to do; he does his best, but perfunctorily and joylessly; in doing it he has to keep back much of what is best in him. And the solo player has to bear the rest of the burden, in finding himself almost constantly in the shade, in having to play purely ornamental passages that do not adorn, or in trying to do things on his own poor fours trings that it would really take an orchestra to do well and effectively. In very truth the effective writing of violin concertos is diametrically opposed to the instinctive musical spirit of our day. The concerto for a wind instrument is already dead past the hope of resurrection; the knell of the 'cello concerto is even now sounding; the violin concerto will go next! The pianoforte concerto will doubtless live on longer but its end also will come—it is predestined. One can say to it, as Richelieu said to de Baradas, "Behind thee looms the head-man!"

Mr. Kneisel's playing of the work was simply masterly from beginning to end; in fineness and totality of conception, in quantity of personal force, in perfection of execution, it was admirable at every point. To call it highly effective would, however, be saying too much; we do not believe that the solo violin part in this otherwise admirable concerto possibly can be made effective. Mr. Kneisel played his own cadenza in the first movement; a most effective and musicianly piece of writing, in which certain exceedingly beautiful and novel effects of tone-color are especially to be noted. His performance aroused the utmost enthusiasm, which it thoroughly merited.

The next programme is wholly devoted to excerpts from the works of Richard Wagner, and is as follows—Overture to "Rienzi," introduction and scene 1 from "Das Rheingold," Siegfried's passage through the fire ("Siegfried," act iii., scene 2), Daybreak and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine ("Götterdämmerung," prologue); Siegfried's Dead-march ("Götterdämmerung," act iii., scene 2); Brünnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body ("Götterdämmerung," act iii., scene 3). Miss Felicia Kaschowska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn will be the singers.

April 15 HANS RICHTER. 1193

The New Symphony Leader an Eminent Conductor.

There is little doubt but that Hans Richter, the eminent conductor, has resigned his position as director of the Court Opera at Vienna, as well as conductor of the Imperial Chapel, and that this resignation is preparatory to accepting the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Higginson refuses to be interviewed upon the subject, so there is no way of confirming the news of Dr. Richter's acceptance of the position believed to have been tendered him by Mr. Higginson.

At the end of Mr. Henschel's term Mr. Higginson urged Dr. Richter to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but he could not be prevailed upon at that time to accept, and thereby give up the opportunities offered through remaining in Vienna as court conductor.

Dr. Richter consequently recommended Wilhelm Gericke, and upon this recommendation the latter was engaged, and his complete success in the position he was called to is now a matter of history; and had Mr. Gericke desired to have continued his duties here in Boston, he could have remained indefinitely, for Mr. Higginson urged him to renew his contract at the end of his five years' service, and even delayed in engaging a successor for six months beyond the time he otherwise would have consummated such an engagement, hoping all the while that Mr. Gericke would reconsider his decision not to remain longer.

The low state of Mr. Gericke's health, which demanded absolute rest from all excitement, however, obliged him to refuse Mr. Higginson's urgent request that he remain, and so the position he had so completely honored for five years fell into the hands of the present incumbent. If Dr. Richter comes to Boston, we shall possess a conductor eminent in his profession and one of world-wide fame. It remains to be seen, however, what the Emperor of Austria will do as regards accepting Dr. Richter's resignation. One thing is sure, Mr. Higginson must have made Dr. Richter a magnificent offer to have induced him to relinquish his distinguished and profitable post in Vienna.

It is probable, also, that there will be an assistant conductor attached to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for Dr. Richter will find an excess of duties here that he is unaccustomed to in Vienna, where he has two if not three assistants. Dr. Richter is in the prime of life, being about 50 years of age. He has a wife and five children. His taste is thoroughly classical and his standard is the Viennese one, Beethoven and Brahms being the musical gods. Add to this the opposite swing of the pendulum, Wagner, and an idea of his repertoire is fairly gained. Unless he becomes cosmopolite with his advent here there will be little catholicism experienced in his programmes as regards the presentation of the modern French school of composition or other works in the romantic class. Whatever is done, however, will be well done, for Dr. Richter is a master of the orchestra.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert last evening had perhaps its most gratifying feature in the performance of Brahms' concerto for violin in D major. To perform a work of such magnitude as this concerto it is absolutely essential to possess just such earnestness, artistic sincerity and technical mastery as are the never falling auxiliaries of Mr. Kneisel's art; and last evening he was not only in his element so far as the distinguishing and all important characteristics of his virtuosal ability were concerned, but he was more than ever successful in individualizing himself with the composer. If anything his performance of the great work was throughout so eminently sincere and refined, that he perhaps excited a less appreciative degree of interest than has frequently attended the performances of men whose general attainments have been below his standard; but, in this connection, it is well to bear in mind that our concertmeister's feeling for his art is conspicuously more like that of a musician than a virtuoso. While far from being deficient in the virtuosity, so essential to the making of a really great player, Mr. Kneisel's ideas of musical interpretation are much too lofty and too sacred to admit of his being rated as a mere performer or a violin gymnast.

His taste is cultivated to the highest excess and his execution is so exquisitely finished, graceful and refined that it sometimes appears to encroach upon the energy of his performance. The quality of bravura which for its inherent allurements is as a sine qua non for other violinists, is by Mr. Kneisel cast into the shade and rendered less perceptibly at his command than it really is, owing to the predominating influence of his ever-scrupulous refinement and unrelenting loyalty.

While this is true there are apparently no technical difficulties that he can not master with the greatest ease, and his success with the concerto that he performed last evening, aside from his making the work itself perfectly clear and intelligible to the auditor without the slightest deviation from its beauty of form and expression, was also characterized by an inherent brilliancy that Mr. Kneisel has seldom equalled here. In brief he executed the exceedingly difficult concerto with such precision, assurance and calmness and at the same time with a self-effacement that enabled him to add to his interpretation of the composer, a sympathetic instinct and poetic appreciation, that he might easily have driven to despair some of the most skilful artists in orchestra who have studied the violin all their lives.

At the conclusion of his performance Mr. Kneisel was heartily eulogized in the prolonged applause of the audience and was made the recipient of several floral tributes including an elegant basket of flowers the very choice offering of his admiring pupils.

Following the concerto was a symphonic poem composed by F. B. Busoni. It would seem disrespectful to a musician, pianist and composer so deservedly esteemed as Mr. Busoni to attempt to pass final judgment after a single hearing of a work so elaborate and so profoundly conceived as this symphonic tone poem.

The orchestration of the poem is apparently its noblest feature, and is marvellously ingenious. The opening bars contain some very clever canonic imitations, but wherein the tone poem as a whole is the logical development of a single poetic idea, it would seem impossible upon a first acquaintance with it to state. Considerable of it indeed would appear to be nothing more or less than an orchestral delirium; and nothing more or less than an orchestral delirium; and seemingly contains much sound and fury signifying nothing more indeed than the possible pain and agony which might have incited the composer to write the work at a time when he would appear to have been a fit subject for a country doctor.

The concert had two overtures, namely "Manfred," by Schumann and "Oberon," by Weber. Few overtures have so powerfully influenced composers as "Oberon." It was the happy remark of one of Weber's biographers that through "Oberon" Weber became the father of all the musical elves, the naiads and the mermaids. Thus also may be have invited Mendelssohn to write his "Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Melusina" and "Hebrides;" and it is more than possible that "Oberon" may have suggested to Bennett his "Naiads" and to Wagner his "Rhine Daughters." Oberon was literally Weber's Swan Song. After the opera was first performed on the ninth of April, 1826, in London, the composer, who for some time had been in ill health, entertained but the single thought that he must go home and die among his people. "Der Freischütz" was to be performed for Weber's benefit on June 8, but on the second of that month (1826), he wrote his last letter, which ended thus: "God bless and preserve you in health. Would that I were with you"—this to his wife. On the morning of the 6th, writer his son and biographer, "Sir George Smart's servant knocked at his chamber door. No answer came. He knocked again and louder. . . . It was then resolved to force the door. All was still within. The watch which the last movement of the great hand which had written Freischütz Enryanthe and Oberon had wound up, alone ticked with painful distinctness. The bed curtains were torn back. There lay the beloved master, dead." Yes, Oberon was Weber's "Swan Song."

The orchestral playing throughout the concert was fairly if not quite on a par with the orchestra's well known standard.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Concerto for Violin, in D, Brahms; Symphonic Tone Poem (MS.), F. B. Busoni (first time), and Overture, "Oberon," Weber. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel. The novelty of the evening, Mr. Busoni's work, was the most extraordinary composition that has ever been performed at these concerts. Why it should have been performed baffles understanding; why it should have been written is still more perplexing. It is abundant in ingenious and novel instrumental combinations, some of which are rich and beautiful in effect; but we must frankly confess that we found it impossible to detect what the music meant. If ever a musical work imperatively needed a minute description of its meaning printed on the programme, surely this is the very work. To us it seemed no more than a wild charivari, beginning in nothing particular, going nowhere, and leading to nothing but confusion. It says nothing intelligible and nothing that appears worth the saying. To us this tone poem seemed to depict a full-fledged Dakota cyclone roaring through a wholesale tin-ware establishment, destroying two or three dynamite factories with wildly explosive results, and causing the collapse of a six-story crockery warehouse. In other words it is nothing but noise, and hideous noise for the most part, as well. The audience listened to it in almost amazed astonishment, meekly applauded it when it was over, and then drew a breath of relief. Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto with his familiar parity of taste and finish of style. He was received with prolonged enthusiasm, and, at the end of each movement, was stormily applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert will be devoted wholly to Wagner, with Miss F. Kaschowska, Mrs. A. Nikisch, Miss L. Leimer and Mr. H. Meyn as soloists.

CYNICISMS.

The announcement that Herr Hans Richter was to be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was received with much excitement here, last week. The papers discussed the subject with great enthusiasm, and in a few hours people knew more about Richter than they had ever known before. Some of the writers for the press almost lost their heads over the matter. One of them took extreme grounds and expressed his delight that "our orchestra again falls into German hands." He told us that "Its traditions are German, its personnel is largely German, and its repertoire must, of course, be drawn largely from German sources." The news regarding its traditions is news indeed. We fancied that it was an American orchestra, founded by an American, and that it was not established for the especial purpose of glorifying everything German, but was conceived in a large and cosmopolitan spirit as far as musical art is concerned. It is true that its personnel is German, but that is a matter of accident and not of design, and we doubt if even the writer of the article in question would attempt to maintain that fully as excellent a body of players could not be selected from other nationalities. When he goes on to say that "a Frenchman, no matter what his musical abilities, could not have been in full sympathy with the men, and would have found the position an especially arduous one," he begs the question. It is not for a conductor to be in sympathy with the men, but it is for the men to be in sympathy with the conductor. It is for the conductor to bring his men around to his way of thinking and not for the men to discipline the conductor into theirs; and men that are not so in sympathy can be readily replaced by those that are. And as for finding the position arduous, it seems to me that men who fail to come into sympathy with a conductor would find the situation far more arduous than would the conductor, for their services would be no longer needed. A Frenchman, such as Lamoureux or Colonne could very soon settle the sympathy business and show on what side of the orchestra the position was likely to be arduous. This propensity to see no other art than German art, and no other musicians than German musicians is to be sternly deprecated. It out-Germans the Germans themselves; at least those Germans who dwell in their native land, and appreciate all good art and all good artists no heed under what flag they had their birth. It may be true, as the writer of the article to which we refer, says, "The coming of Richter will ease the minds of more than one member of the orchestra," but then the peace of mind of these musicians is not of vital importance to the cause of art; and as but little consideration has been hitherto shown to the peace of mind of those players whose native tongue did not happen to be German, the argument of the advocate for the perpetuation of this condition of affairs is somewhat lopsided. He is quite within the bounds of probability when he reflects that, "if Mr. Nikisch had had a Gallic successor, there would have been changes in the list of the musicians." But why not? Why should not a French conductor have that same preference for his fellow countrymen that a German conductor has for his? It surely will not be claimed that there are not as good orchestral players to be found among Frenchmen as there are among Germans. While freely conceding that the ac-

270 to have been tendered him by Mr. Higginson.

At the end of Mr. Henschel's term Mr. Higginson urged Dr. Richter to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but he could not be prevailed upon at that time to accept, and thereby give up the opportunities offered through remaining in Vienna as court conductor.

Dr. Richter consequently recommended Wilhelm Gericke, and upon this recommendation the latter was engaged, and his complete success in the position he was called to is now a matter of history; and had Mr. Gericke desired to have continued his duties here in Boston, he could have remained indefinitely, for Mr. Higginson urged him to renew his contract at the end of his five years' service, and even delayed in engaging a successor for six months beyond the time he otherwise would have consummated such an engagement, hoping all the while that Mr. Gericke would reconsider his decision not to remain longer.

The low state of Mr. Gericke's health, which demanded absolute rest from all excitement, however, obliged him to refuse Mr. Higginson's urgent request that he remain, and so the position he had so completely honored for five years fell into the hands of the present incumbent. If Dr. Richter comes to Boston, we shall possess a conductor eminent in his profession and one of world-wide fame. It remains to be seen, however, what the Emperor of Austria will do as regards accepting Dr. Richter's resignation. One thing is sure, Mr. Higginson must have made Dr. Richter a magnificent offer to have induced him to relinquish his distinguished and profitable post in Vienna.

It is probable, also, that there will be an assistant conductor attached to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for Dr. Richter will find an excess of duties here that he is unaccustomed to in Vienna, where he has two if not three assistants. Dr. Richter is in the prime of life, being about 50 years of age. He has a wife and five children. His taste is thoroughly classical and his standard is the Viennese one, Beethoven and Brahms being the musical gods. Add to this the opposite swing of the pendulum, Wagner, and an idea of his repertoire is fairly gained. Unless he becomes cosmopolite with his advent here there will be little catholicism experienced in his programmes as regards the presentation of the modern French school of composition or other works in the romantic class. Whatever is done, however, will be well done, for Dr. Richter is a master of the orchestra.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC.

TWENTY-SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert last evening had perhaps its most gratifying feature in the performance of Brahms's concerto for violin in D major. To perform a work of such magnitude as this concerto it is absolutely essential to possess just such earnestness, artistic sincerity and technical mastery as are the never failing auxiliaries of Mr. Kneisel's art; and last evening he was not only in his element so far as the distinguishing and all important characteristics of his virtuosity were concerned, but he was more than ever successful in individualizing himself with the composer. If anything his performance of the great work was throughout so eminently sincere and refined, that he perhaps excited a less appreciative degree of interest than has frequently attended the performances of men whose general attainments have been below his standard; but, in this connection, it is well to bear in mind that our concertmaster's feeling for his art is conspicuously more like that of a musician than a virtuoso. While far from being deficient in the virtuosity, so essential to the making of a really great player, Mr. Kneisel's ideas of musical interpretation are much too lofty and too sacred to admit of his being rated as a mere performer or a violin gymnast.

His taste is cultivated to the highest excess and his execution is so exquisitely finished, graceful and refined that it sometimes appears to encroach upon the energy of his performance. The quality of bravura which for its inherent allurements is as a sine qua non for other violinists, is by Mr. Kneisel cast into the shade and rendered less perceptibly at his command than it really is, owing to the predominating influence of his ever-scrupulous refinement and unrelenting loyalty.

While this is true there are apparently no technical difficulties that he can not master with the greatest ease, and his success with the concerto that he performed last evening, aside from his making the work itself perfectly clear and intelligible to the auditor without the slightest deviation from its beauty of form and expression, was also characterized by an inherent brilliancy that Mr. Kneisel has seldom equalled here. In brief he executed the exceedingly difficult concerto with such precision, assurance and calmness and at the same time with a self-effacement that enabled him to add to his interpretation of the composer, a sympathetic instinct and poetic appreciation, that he might easily have driven to despair some of the most skilful artists in orchestra who have studied the violin all their lives.

At the conclusion of his performance Mr. Kneisel was heartily eulogized in the prolonged applause of the audience and was made the recipient of several floral tributes including an elegant basket of flowers the very choice offering of his admiring pupils.

Following the concerto was a symphonic poem composed by F. B. Busoni. It would seem disrespectful to a musician, pianist and composer so deservedly esteemed as Mr. Busoni to attempt to pass final judgment after a single hearing of a work so elaborate and so profoundly conceived as this symphonic tone poem.

The orchestration of the poem is apparently its noblest feature, and is marvellously ingenious. The opening bars contain some very clever canonic imitations, but wherein the tone poem as a whole is the logical development of a single poetic idea, it would seem impossible upon a first acquaintance with it to state. Considerable of it indeed would appear to be nothing more or less than an orchestral delirium; and nothing contains much sound and fury signifying seemingly more indeed than the possible pain and agony nothing more indeed than the composer to write the which might have incited the composer to have been a work at a time when he would appear to have been a fit subject for a country doctor.

The concert had two overtures, namely "Manfred," by Schumann and "Oberon," by Weber. Few overtures have so powerfully influenced composers as "Oberon." It was the happy remark of one of Weber's biographers that through "Oberon" Weber became the father of all the musical elves, the naiads and the mermaids. Thus also may be have invited Mendelssohn to write his "Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Melusina" and "Hebrides;" and it is more than possible that "Oberon" may have suggested to Bennett his "Naiads" and to Wagner his "Rhine Daughters." Oberon was literally Weber's Swan Song. After the opera was first performed on the ninth of April, 1826, in London, the composer, who for some time had been in ill health, entertained but the single thought that he must go home and die among his people. "Der Freischütz" was to be performed for Weber's benefit on June 6, but on the second of that month (1826), he wrote his last letter, which ended thus: "God bless and preserve you in health. Would that I were with you"—this to his wife. On the morning of the 6th, writer his son and biographer, "Sir George Smart's servant knocked at his chamber door. No answer came. He knocked again and louder. . . . It was then resolved to force the door. All was still within. The watch which the last movement of the great hand which had written Freischütz Enryanthé and Oberon had wound up, alone ticked with painful distinctness. The bed curtains were torn back. There lay the beloved master, dead." Yes, Oberon was Weber's "Swan Song."

TIGHT BINDING

The orchestral playing throughout the concert was fairly if not quite on a par with the orchestra's well known standard.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Overture, "Manfred," Schumann; Concerto for Violin, in D, Brahms; Symphonic Tone Poem (MS.), F. B. Busoni (first time), and Overture, "Oberon," Weber. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel. The novelty of the evening, Mr. Busoni's work, was the most extraordinary composition that has ever been performed at these concerts. Why it should have been performed baffles understanding; why it should have been written is still more perplexing. It is abundant in ingenious and novel instrumental combinations, some of which are rich and beautiful in effect; but we must frankly confess that we found it impossible to detect what the music meant. If ever a musical work imperatively needed a minute description of its meaning printed on the programme, surely this is the very work. To us it seemed no more than a wild charivari, beginning in nothing particular, going nowhere, and leading to nothing but confusion. It says nothing intelligible and nothing that appears worth the saying. To us this tone poem seemed to depict a full-fledged Dakota cyclone roaring through a wholesale tin-ware establishment, destroying two or three dynamite factories with wildly explosive results, and causing the collapse of a six-story crockery warehouse. In other words it was nothing but noise, and hideous noise for the most part, as well. The audience listened to it in almost amazed astonishment, meekly applauded it when it was over, and then drew a breath of relief. Mr. Kneisel played the Brahms concerto with his familiar parity of taste and finish of style. He was received with prolonged enthusiasm, and, at the end of each movement, was stormily applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert will be devoted wholly to Wagner, with Miss F. Kaschotka, Mrs. A. Nikisch, Miss L. Leimer and Mr. H. Meyn as soloists.

CYNICISMS.

271 The announcement that Herr Hans Richter was to be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was received with much excitement here, last week. The papers discussed the subject with great enthusiasm, and in a few hours people knew more about Richter than they had ever known before. Some of the writers for the press almost lost their heads over the matter. One of them took extreme grounds and expressed his delight that "our orchestra again falls into German hands." He told us that "Its traditions are German, its personnel is largely German, and its repertoire must, of course, be drawn largely from German sources." The news regarding its traditions is news indeed. We fancied that it was an American orchestra, founded by an American, and that it was not established for the especial purpose of glorifying everything German, but was conceived in a large and cosmopolitan spirit as far as musical art is concerned. It is true that its personnel is German, but that is a matter of accident and not of design, and we doubt if even the writer of the article in question would attempt to maintain that fully as excellent a body of players could not be selected from other nationalities. When he goes on to say that "a Frenchman, no matter what his musical abilities, could not have been in full sympathy with the men, and would have found the position an especially arduous one," he begs the question. It is not for a conductor to be in sympathy with the men, but it is for the men to be in sympathy with the conductor. It is for the conductor to bring his men around to his way of thinking and not for the men to discipline the conductor into theirs; and men that are not so in sympathy can be readily replaced by those that are. And as for finding the position arduous, it seems to me that men who fail to come into sympathy with a conductor would find the situation far more arduous than would the conductor, for their services would be no longer needed. A Frenchman, such as Lamoureux or Colonne could very soon settle the sympathy business and show on what side of the orchestra the position was likely to be arduous. This propensity to see no other art than German art, and no other musicians than German musicians is to be sternly deprecated. It out-Germans the Germans themselves; at least those Germans who dwell in their native land, and appreciate all good art and all good artists no heed under what flag they had their birth. It may be true, as the writer of the article to which we refer, says, "The coming of Richter will ease the minds of more than one member of the orchestra," but then the peace of mind of these musicians is not of vital importance to the cause of art; and as but little consideration has been hitherto shown to the peace of mind of those players whose native tongue did not happen to be German, the argument of the advocate for the perpetuation of this condition of affairs is somewhat lopsided. He is quite within the bounds of probability when he reflects that, if Mr. Nikisch had had a Gallic successor, there would have been changes in the list of the musicians." But why not? Why should not a French conductor have that same preference for his fellow countrymen that a German conductor has for his? It surely will not be claimed that there are not as good orchestral players to be found among Frenchmen as there are among Germans. While freely conceding that the acquisition of Richter as conductor of the Symphony Concerts is to be earnestly desired, yet it would seem, that after twelve years of German supremacy, in which our musical tastes have been thoroughly Germanized, it would have not been a bad move by any means, to have engaged some eminent and able French conductor to restore the balance. If, as we are told, the traditions of the orchestra are German and Germany dominates it in every way, it is fully time for a broader and more eclectic taste to be stimulated. It is wrong to cramp art progress by making it run in one groove, even to ease the minds of some of the members of the Symphony orchestra. Just the same it will be a great thing if Richter be really coming; but let us hear no more of maintaining one-sidedness in musical art.

277

CHATTERER.

OPERA AND CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Season Soon to End.

Mr. Nikisch presented but one novelty at the Symphony concert yesterday, works by Schumann, Brahms and Weber making up the principal portion of the programme. The new composition was a symphonic tone poem in MS. by the talented composer and pianist, Mr. F. B. Busoni, dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

The piece is a fanciful work, without any title to indicate the musical picture the author wished to present. The scoring is brilliant, tumultuous at times, and calls into play all of the instruments of the orchestra. Some of the effects are Wagnerian in the forte passages, and might well typify the tortures of a guilty soul in inferno.

As a piece of orchestration it must be ranked highly, for the color and variety of the different phrases and themes are ever changing and effective, but as a coherent, descriptive work it fails to fully satisfy the auditor.

It was played with vigor and confidence by the orchestra and evidently in harmony with the ideas of the composer.

Mr. Kneisel's performance of the Brahms' concerto was the gem of the evening, and he renewed his success of three seasons ago when he first played the piece in this city.

His glides, trills and double chords were notably true, and his introduced cadenza was most delicately played.

The whole interpretation was seemingly without a blemish, and the accomplished artist was several times summoned to the platform at the close of the number to bow his acknowledgments.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Weber's "Oberon" completed the programme. The tremendous orchestral crash in the latter piece was given with the proper force and aroused the usual astonishment among the spectators.

This week a Wagner programme will be given, with Miss Felicia Kaschowska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Heinrich Meyn as soloists.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra Resigns His Position.

It is rumored, and the rumor seems to be a fact, that Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has resigned his position.

The resignation will take effect at the end of this, the twelfth season of the organization.

Mr. Nikisch will, in all probability, go to Budapest, where he will have full charge of the orchestra of the opera and concert hall of that city.

Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian by birth, for he was born at Szent Miklos Oct. 12, 1855. His father was head accountant in the service of Prince Liechtenstein. Mr. Nikisch was educated in the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied composition under Dessoff and the violin under Hellmesberger. He left the Conservatory in 1874, with prizes in composition (sextet for strings) and violin playing. In 1878 he was engaged by Neumann as second conductor of the Stadt Theatre in Leipzig, and he then left Vienna, where he was busy as violinist in the Imperial Orchestra. In 1882 he was appointed first chapelmaster at Leipzig. Mr. Nikisch was called in 1889 to take the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position that was vacated by Mr. William Gericke. Mr. Nikisch's first appearance here at a Saturday evening concert was Oct. 12, 1889. During his stay in this city he has made many friends who will learn with regret of his resignation.

There are rumors already of other directors. First of all comes the name of Mr. Gericke, who gave to the orchestra the reputation that it so richly deserved. He is now in Vienna, and it is doubtful whether he could be persuaded to leave his home. If he should appear again as conductor of our orchestra his first appearance would be a memorable scene, for few are held in such respect by musicians and laymen as the modest and thoroughly capable Gericke.

There is talk of Hans Richter. Richter was born in Raab, Hungary, April 4, 1843. He studied in Vienna the horn, pianoforte and composition. In 1866-67 he was with Wagner in Luzerne. Richter was chorus director in Munich in 1868-69. In 1870 he directed the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Brussels. From 1871 to 1875 he was conductor at the National Theatre at Budapest. In 1875 he was appointed conductor of the opera and the Philharmonic concerts at Vienna. In 1878 he directed at Baireuth. For some time he has been busied with concerts in London.

Edouard Colonne of Paris is also mentioned. He was born at Bordeaux, July 23, 1838, and was a pupil of the Paris Conservatory, where he took, in 1863, the first prize for violin playing. He was then first violin of the Paris Opera, until in 1871 he founded a concert organization, the performances of which were given during the winter, first at the Odeon, afterward at the Chatelet. He is now also first conductor at the Opera. He is known throughout Europe as a conductor of the very first rank.

Felix Mottl is also mentioned. He was born Aug. 29, 1856, at Unter-St. Veit, near Vienna. He was a pupil of the Vienna Conservatory; in 1881 he was called to Carlsruhe to take charge of the opera orchestra. In 1888 he refused a call to Berlin. In the same year he directed at Baireuth with great success. Of late his health has been poor, and he has directed at rare intervals in different German cities. Mottl has written an opera "Agnes Bernauer," performed at Weimar 1880.

It is a singular and humiliating fact that no American has been mentioned or apparently thought of as successor to Mr. Nikisch.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Lillian Russell's Triumphs in "Girofle Girofle"—The Coming Damrosch Orchestra's Concerts—"The Isle of Champagne" Attracts Crowds—Hilrichs' Grand Opera Season—Notes.

Director Nikisch is certainly to be commended for giving his Symphony concert programmes of the present season an up-to-date character, and whatever ill-success has attended his efforts in this direction cannot be attributed to him so much as to the composers of the present day, from whose works he has been obliged to select contributions.

Last evening he brought forward, as among the novelties of the season, the "Symphonic Tone Poem," by F. B. Busoni, which is dedicated to Director Nikisch, and was given its first performance in public on this occasion.

Mr. Busoni will be recalled with much pleasure as the pianist who has made such a favorable record for himself, both in recitals and with the Symphony orchestra the present season, and it is disappointing that he should appear at such a disadvantage in this, his first, contribution in the way of a large work of a symphonic character. Mr. Busoni is evidently a thorough student of the modern orchestra, and in his "Poem" he has not been satisfied with less than a full complement of all the instruments known in the grand orchestra of today.

It is somewhat to be regretted that he has used such large means to such small ends, for he has been successful only in saying the most inconsequential things in the most magnificent way. He is evidently familiar with the compositions of the writers of the past and present, and has succeeded in showing most catholic taste in choosing his models to be followed in this composition.

The composition appeared to meet with favor by those who appreciate music from a scientific standpoint, and it certainly commands approval as the work of an able musician, however much it is lacking in evidences of Mr. Busoni's genius as a composer.

The appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist of the concert was a most enjoyable event, and this talented musician has seldom had a more pronounced evidence of his personal and professional popularity in Boston than that given him on this occasion. He played the Brahms' concerto in D major as his contribution to the programme, and gave a masterly performance of its movements that won him a grand demonstration at the end of the work, in which both audience and orchestra joined with great unanimity. The programme was begun with a very pleasing performance of Schumann's overture to "Manfred" and ended with a remarkably brilliant performance of Weber's overture to "Oberon."

NOW FOR THE CORRECT THING!

To the Editor of the Transcript: In view of the reported resignation of Mr. Nikisch from the charge of the Symphony Orchestra, permit me to offer the following suggestion for the future conduct of the concerts:

Instead of importing some obscure German musician, possibly brought up under the influence of a Wagner, Von Bülow or Richter, and saturated with the musical traditions of an effete European civilization, let the concerts be conducted in turn by our various local music critics, both the regularly constituted and the self-appointed ones. It is safe to say we shall at last have an exact musical embodiment of the ideas of Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn. We shall hear, for the first time, everything played in the exact tempi intended by the composer (heretofore only known to himself and the critics), and shall learn the true value of a thirty-second note as differentiated from a dotted sixty-fourth. Add to this, for the supervision of the programmes, a committee composed of those persons who know exactly what a symphony programme should be, and it seems certain that at length the efforts of our estimable fellow-citizen, Mr. Higginson, to provide Boston with orchestral performances of the highest grade, will be crowned with full success. Charles W. D. X.

April 3.

NO SUCCESSOR TO NIKISCH YET.

Colonel Higginson Denies the Story About the Engagement of Hans Richter.

The stories that were given to the public in Boston and New York this morning that Hans Richter, director of the opera at Vienna, had been engaged to succeed Arthur Nikisch as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are stamped by Colonel Higginson as false. He says that no contract has yet been entered into with anyone. There is only one man who has anything to do with procuring a leader for this orchestra, and that is Colonel Higginson, and when he has found the right man for the place, and the agreements are signed, then the name of the new leader will be announced. In the mean time the Boston public may rest assured that Mr. Nikisch's successor will be an able man, whoever he may be. It is argued that, inasmuch as Mr. Richter has recently refused an offer for a tour in this country with a guarantee of $1000 a night, he is not likely to accept any position commanding a salary of from six to eight thousand dollars per annum. Then again, the hard and fast rules of the Vienna Opera, would only allow Mr. Richter just four weeks to fill his engagement at the Chicago Exposition and return to his duties in Austria. Should he retire from the opera now, he would lose his pension, to which two more years of service would entitle him; so it is hardly probable that Mr. Richter will be the man to lead the symphonies next season.

qulsition of Richter as conductor of the Symphony Concerts is to be earnestly desired, yet it would seem, that after twelve years of German supremacy, in which our musical tastes have been thoroughly Germanized, it would have not been a bad move by any means, to have engaged some eminent and able French conductor to restore the balance. If, as we are told, the traditions of the orchestra are German and Germany dominates it in every way, it is fully time for a broader and more eclectic taste to be stimulated. It is wrong to cramp art progress by making it run in one groove, even to ease the minds of some of the members of the Symphony orchestra. Just the same it will be a great thing if Richter be really coming; but let us hear no more of maintaining one-sidedness in musical art.

CHATTERER.

OPERA AND CONCERT.

Boston Symphony Season Soon to End.

Mr. Nikisch presented but one novelty at the Symphony concert yesterday, works by Schumann, Brahms and Weber making up the principal portion of the programme. The new composition was a symphonic tone poem in MS. by the talented composer and pianist, Mr. F. B. Busoni, dedicated to Mr. Nikisch.

The piece is a fanciful work, without any title to indicate the musical picture the author wished to present. The scoring is brilliant, tumultuous at times, and calls into play all of the instruments of the orchestra. Some of the effects are Wagnerian in the forte passages, and might well typify the tortures of a guilty soul in inferno.

As a piece of orchestration it must be ranked highly, for the color and variety of the different phrases and themes are ever changing and effective, but as a coherent, descriptive work it fails to fully satisfy the auditor.

It was played with vigor and confidence by the orchestra and evidently in harmony with the ideas of the composer.

Mr. Kneisel's performance of the Brahms concerto was the gem of the evening, and he renewed his success of three seasons ago when he first played the piece in this city.

His glides, trills and double chords were notably true, and his introduced cadenza was most delicately played.

The whole interpretation was seemingly without a blemish, and the accomplished artist was several times summoned to the platform at the close of the number to bow his acknowledgments.

Schumann's "Manfred" overture and Weber's "Oberon" completed the programme. The tremendous orchestral crash in the latter piece was given with the proper force and aroused the usual astonishment among the spectators.

This week a Wagner programme will be given, with Miss Felicia Kaschowska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Heinrich Meyn as soloists.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra Resigns His Position.

It is rumored, and the rumor seems to be a fact, that Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has resigned his position.

The resignation will take effect at the end of this, the twelfth season of the organization.

Mr. Nikisch will, in all probability, go to Budapesth, where he will have full charge of the orchestra of the opera and concert hall of that city.

Mr. Nikisch is a Hungarian by birth, for he was born at Szent Miklos Oct. 12, 1855. His father was head accountant in the service of Prince Liechtenstein. Mr. Nikisch was educated in the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied in composition under Dessoff and the violin under Hellmesberger. He left the Conservatory in 1874, with prizes in composition (sextet for strings) and violin playing. In 1878 he was engaged by Neumann as second conductor of the Stadt Theatre in Leipzig, and he then left Vienna, where he was busy as violinist in the Imperial Orchestra. In 1882 he was appointed first chapelmaster at Leipzig. Mr. Nikisch was called in 1889 to take the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a position that was vacated by Mr. William Gericke. Mr. Nikisch's first appearance here at a Saturday evening concert was Oct. 12, 1889. During his stay in this city he has made many friends who will learn with regret of his resignation.

There are rumors already of other directors. First of all comes the name of Mr. Gericke, who gave to the orchestra the reputation that it so richly deserved. He is now in Vienna, and it is doubtful whether he could be persuaded to leave his home. If he should appear again as conductor of our orchestra his first appearance would be a memorable scene, for few are held in such respect by musicians and laymen as the modest and thoroughly capable Gericke.

There is talk of Hans Richter. Richter was born in Raab, Hungary, April 4, 1843. He studied in Vienna the horn, pianoforte and composition. In 1866-67 he was with Wagner in Luzerne. Richter was chorus director in the Munich in 1868-69. In 1870 he directed the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Brussels. From 1871 to 1875 he was conductor at the National Theatre at Budapesth. In 1875 he was appointed conductor of the opera and the Philharmonic concerts at Vienna. In 1876 he directed at Baireuth. For some time he has been busied with concerts in London.

Edouard Colonne of Paris is also mentioned. He was born at Bordeaux, July 23, 1838, and was a pupil of the Paris Conservatory, where he took, in 1863, the first prize for violin playing. He was then first violin of the Paris Opera, until in 1871 he founded a concert organization, the performances of which were given during the winter, first at the Odeon, afterward at the Chatelet. He is now also first conductor at the Opera. He is known throughout Europe as a conductor of the very first rank.

Felix Mottl is also mentioned. He was born Aug. 29, 1856, at Unter-St. Veit, near Vienna. He was a pupil of the Vienna Conservatory; in 1881 he was called to Karlsruhe to take charge of the opera orchestra. In 1886 he refused a call to Berlin. In the same year he directed at Baireuth with great success. Of late his health has been poor, and he has directed at rare intervals in different German cities. Mottl has written an opera "Agnes Bernauer," performed at Weimar 1880.

It is a singular and humiliating fact that no American has been mentioned or apparently thought of as successor to Mr. Nikisch.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Lillian Russell's Triumphs in "Girofle Girofle—The Coming Damrosch Orchestra's Concerts—"The Isle of Champagne" Attracts Crowds—Hinrichs' Grand Opera Season—Notes.

Director Nikisch is certainly to be commended for giving his Symphony concert programmes of the present season an up-to-date character, and whatever ill-success has attended his efforts in this direction cannot be attributed to him so much as to the composers of the present day, from whose works he has been obliged to select contributions.

Last evening he brought forward, as among the novelties of the season, the "Symphonic Tone Poem," by F. B. Busoni, which is dedicated to Director Nikisch, and was given its first performance in public on this occasion.

Mr. Busoni will be recalled with much pleasure as the pianist who has made such a favorable record for himself, both in recitals and with the Symphony orchestra the present season, and it is disappointing that he should appear at such a disadvantage in this, his first, contribution in the way of a large work of a symphonic character. Mr. Busoni is evidently a thorough student of the modern orchestra, and in his "Poem" he has not been satisfied with less than a full complement of all the instruments known in the grand orchestra of today.

It is somewhat to be regretted that he has used such large means to such small ends, for he has been successful only in saying the most inconsequential things in the most magnificent way. He is evidently familiar with the compositions of the writers of the past and present, and has succeeded in showing most catholic taste in choosing his models to be followed in this composition.

The composition appeared to meet with favor by those who appreciate music from a scientific standpoint, and it certainly commands approval as the work of an able musician, however much it is lacking in evidences of Mr. Busoni's genius as a composer.

The appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist of the concert was a most enjoyable event, and this talented musician has seldom had a more pronounced evidence of his personal and professional popularity in Boston than that given him on this occasion. He played the Brahms concerto in D major as his contribution to the programme, and gave a masterly performance of its movements that won him a grand demonstration at the end of the work, in which both audience and orchestra joined with great unanimity. The programme was begun with a very pleasing performance of Schumann's overture to "Manfred" and ended with a remarkably brilliant performance of Weber's overture to "Oberon."

NOW FOR THE CORRECT THING!

To the Editor of the Transcript: In view of the reported resignation of Mr. Nikisch from the charge of the Symphony Orchestra, permit me to offer the following suggestion for the future conduct of the concerts:

Instead of importing some obscure German musician, possibly brought up under the influence of a Wagner, Von Bülow or Richter, and saturated with the musical traditions of an effete European civilization, let the concerts be conducted in turn by our various local music critics, both the regularly constituted and the self-appointed ones. It is safe to say we shall at last have an exact musical embodiment of the ideas of Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn. We shall hear, for the first time, everything played in the exact tempi intended by the composer (heretofore only known to himself and the critics), and shall learn the true value of a thirty-second note as differentiated from a dotted sixty-fourth. Add to this, for the supervision of the programmes, a committee composed of those persons who know exactly what a symphony programme should be, and it seems certain that at length the efforts of our estimable fellow-citizen, Mr. Higginson, to provide Boston with orchestral performances of the highest grade, will be crowned with full success. Charles W. D. X.

NO SUCCESSOR TO NIKISCH YET.

Colonel Higginson Denies the Story About the Engagement of Hans Richter.

The stories that were given to the public in Boston and New York this morning that Hans Richter, director of the opera at Vienna, had been engaged to succeed Arthur Nikisch as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are stamped by Colonel Higginson as false. He says that no contract has yet been entered into with anyone. There is only one man who has anything to do with procuring a leader for this orchestra, and that is Colonel Higginson, and when he has found the right man for the place, and the agreements are signed, then the name of the new leader will be announced. In the mean time the Boston public may rest assured that Mr. Nikisch's successor will be an able man, whoever he may be. It is argued that, inasmuch as Mr. Richter has recently refused an offer for a tour in this country with a guarantee of $1000 a night, he is not likely to accept any position commanding a salary of from six to eight thousand dollars per annum. Then again, the hard and fast rules of the Vienna Opera, would only allow Mr. Richter just four weeks to fill his engagement at the Chicago Exposition and return to his duties in Austria. Should he retire from the opera now, he would lose his pension, to which two more years of service would entitle him; so it is hardly probable that Mr. Richter will be the man to lead the symphonies next season.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The Last Nikisch Concert.

To one who observes the signs of the times and the changes in the musical world, the most striking of all phenomena is the growing importance attached to conductors. There was a time when the singer was the absolute tyrant of conductors, librettists, and composers. To-day we are beginning to understand that the singer is only one factor in a musical production, and that if we are to have a really artistic performance he must be subordinated to the composer and to the conductor of the whole. Thirty-five years ago, when Wagner had his "Tristan" ready for performance, he complained that Dr. Hans von Bülow was the only living conductor in whom he had any confidence; he himself had trained Bülow, as he subsequently trained Hans Richter and Anton Seidl. His superb pamphlet "On Conducting" for the first time properly emphasized the importance of the conductor for a satisfactory musical performance, and it is owing to his influence that we have now reached a point where connoisseurs inquire who is going to conduct before they ask who will sing.

In Berlin this increased interest in conductors, and their different methods of interpretation, has been shown this winter by the engagement of several prominent leaders to conduct the Philharmonic concerts in succession. In America, where the best in everything is insisted upon, because we have the money to pay for it, the value of conductors has long been recognized; and in one respect we are beginning to Americanize Europe—namely, in the matter of proper remuneration. Formerly the singers got all the profits of operas and concerts; now that operas are no longer written for singers alone, conductors are beginning to get their proper share. A few months ago Mr. Seidl received an offer of $10,000 a year from the opera at Budapest—the highest sum ever offered an operatic conductor in Hungary. Fortunately Mr. Seidl has become an American citizen and is unwilling to leave his new country; he has an engagement in Chicago this summer which will bring him $15,000 in a few months, and next winter he will probably be back at the Metropolitan Opera-house.

Mr. Nikisch, unfortunately for New York, and still more so for Boston, accepted this offer and will go to Budapest at the close of the present season. Nor will any one blame him for this, however much one may regret his departure. Mr. Nikisch is primarily an operatic conductor, and his Boston engagement, therefore, did not give him opportunity for the display of all his gifts. The position he has occupied for several years is anything but a sinecure. During the last seven months, for instance, he has conducted 124 symphony concerts and spent half his time on railway cars and in hotels. It was this roving life connected with the position of conductor of the Boston Orchestra that made Mr. Gericke glad to return to Vienna.

A large audience was present in Chickering Hall to bid Mr. Nikisch farewell. The programme had to be altered somewhat, owing to the indisposition of Mr. Kneisel. In place of his numbers Mrs. Nikisch sang a few songs. Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the Forest Voices from "Siegfried," and Tchaikovsky's splendid fifth symphony were the orchestral numbers, and it was fitting that one who so strongly represents the modern romantic spirit in music should make his exit with that glowing Russian work. At the close the audience remained standing and recalled Mr. Nikisch by way of expressing their regrets at his departure. He will leave many friends and admirers behind, and he will also remember the New York press for its cordial recognition of his merits, the absence of carping criticism, and the appreciation of the individuality and unfettered freedom of his interpretations. Mr. Higginson will find it an extremely difficult task to find a successor to Mr. Arthur Nikisch.

ARTHUR NIKISCH,
Leader Symphony Orchestra.

WHO WILL SUCCEED HIM?

The announcement that Mr. NIKISCH, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had resigned his position came rather unexpectedly and occasioned general regret. Mr. NIKISCH, since he came to the orchestra in 1889, has won ungrudging respect and esteem for the merit which he has shown in his present position. That he is a conductor of no mean merit can be readily admitted. It is said that all who possess Magyar blood are musicians by instinct; but Mr. NIKISCH is a Hungarian who is a musician by training as well as by inclination. He was educated at the Vienna conservatory and left that institution with two prizes. He then became second conductor of the orchestra of the Stadt Theatre, Leipzig, having previously served as a violinist in the imperial orchestra in Vienna.

In 1889 he came to this country to succeed Mr. GERICKE, the former conductor of the "Symphony," which had already attained the leading position among American orchestras. During Mr. NIKISCH's three years in charge of the "Symphony" it has maintained its high rank, at least in virility of execution. The programmes of music rendered by the orchestra have not been above criticism in the past three years; and the work of the orchestra in detail has not been wholly free from fault in that time. Nevertheless the concerts have on the whole been characterized by music of a high order and by an artistic merit that does not need to be recounted to the people of Boston, and that is partially due to Mr. NIKISCH as well as to efforts of the former directors.

It is to be taken for granted that an effort will be made to secure a new director who will be in every way worthy to carry on the task which Mr. NIKISCH has resigned. There is certainly a strong desire that Mr. GERICKE return to the organization which owes so much to his artistic training. The existence of the orchestra in its present high state of efficiency is chiefly owing to the work of Mr. GERICKE. It is doubtful, however, whether that artist can be induced to leave Vienna for Boston. Mr. GERICKE had critics in this city, but he had also many warm friends and champions here, and if he can be persuaded to return there seems to be little doubt that the effort will be made to secure his acceptance of his former leadership. Still another who has been mentioned for the position is HANS RICHTER, who is a Hungarian, and studied in Vienna. RICHTER has been a disciple of WAGNER for more than two decades, and in 1870 directed the first performance of "Lohengrin" in Brussels. In 1875 he left the national theatre of Budapest to become conductor of the opera and the philharmonic concerts in Vienna, and in the following year he became director at Bayreuth. Among the other names mentioned are those of LAMOUREUX of Paris and FELIX MOTTL, who is a Hungarian by birth, and who in 1886 was a director at Bayreuth.

It is to be noticed that among all the names of those who are or may be considered available for the position which Mr. NIKISCH has left, there is no reference to any American. As a matter of fact there is not and never has been any American who can be ranked among the world's great orchestral directors. This fact is to be explained by the circumstance that the conditions have not been such as to warrant the expectation that such men would appear. Music is an art that is not to be found at its best among a race of hardy pioneers or their immediate successors. The education necessary for an artist who desires to lead an orchestra of high rank is of a kind that has not been within the reach of most Americans. The dearth of great American musicians has been less noticeable than the lack of great American composers. Musical art among the people of this country is no longer in its infancy, but the period of growth has not as yet been continued long enough to produce either a composer or a leader of the highest order. These things are to be accepted with patience until the future brings great American composers or leaders as the past has brought poets and authors of high merit.

HANS RICHTER FOR THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA?

A gratifying piece of news is printed in the morning papers—or, rather, it would be gratifying if all that it implies were truth, which, unfortunately, is not the case as yet. As stated in effect in the despatch from Vienna, Hans Richter has sent in his resignation of the post of conductor at the Opera and also the position of conductor at the Imperial Chapel, his reason for this course being his acceptance of the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But the Austrian Government is not of the hustling order, and we must wait, with Richter, a good two weeks or more to learn the result of the deliberations of Franz Josef's representatives. If they shall accept the great conductor's resignation it will be an act of real generosity, for besides, as is likely, giving to him a post with less work and more pay, they will deprive themselves of the services of the most distinguished conductor now living and one to whom the great theatre where he has been in charge largely owes its leading importance in the art world of Europe. Indeed, reflecting on his value and considering the practical impossibility of finding a fully equipped successor, there arises a feeling of apprehension that the kaiser's advisers in these matters will say "no." Even then, however, the incident will stand as another illustration of Colonel Higginson's constant purpose to provide the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the best men at all points, with never a thought of the question of cost.

WILL RICHTER COME?

Dare He Break His Contract With the Imperial Opera?—What May Result if He Does.

A dispatch from Vienna to this morning's Journal said that the Intendant of the Imperial Opera refuses to release Hans Richter from his contract. Now, the contract will not expire for at least two years, and, as the Austrian conductor has accepted the invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning his duties next fall, the situation will become more interesting until he makes a decided move.

To a Journal reporter this morning Mr. Bernard Listomann spoke of the matter as he views it. "Richter," he said, "will probably not be released from his contract. He is, you know, one of the great conductors, and the people of Vienna know this better than any others. They worship him.

"It is a serious thing to break a contract. Lilli Lehman left Berlin against the wishes of the intendant, and for years she was not permitted to sing in Germany. A year or two ago they began to be not so strict, and then she sang in some places, but never did she appear at any of the courts. It really ruined her in Germany.

"Now if Richter is bold enough he can do as she did. Possibly royal clemency may be extended, or perhaps Mr. Higginson has promised to compensate him for the loss during the rest of his life. If anything can do it I should think it were Mr. Higginson's money bags. I think that Richter might better have waited for two years, when his contract would have expired, and then this peculiar situation would be avoided."

THE ENTERPRISING EXPONENTS of modern journalism who made up their minds that Hans Richter will be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have the opportunity now to reflect on the danger of a too rapid development of previousness. As stated in the Transcript when first the news of the offer of the post to Richter and his acceptance was published, nothing was settled by that, but all depended upon the readiness of his official masters at Vienna to accept his resignation; and the doubts on that point expressed in the Transcript are confirmed by the official report that the directors of the Imperial Opera refuse peremptorily to release Richter from his contract, and decline to accept his resignation. With this comes a despatch that the great conductor says that he will come anyhow: a report that is almost incredible, for this reason: If at any time Mr. Richter should set foot on Austrian soil after breaking his contract (which has four years to run, by the way), he would be a prisoner, and be called to answer the charges against him with the promptitude that is characteristic of a government having a thorough and searching police system; and Mr. Richter knows this, probably, as well as any subject of the ruler of Austria and Hungary. There is still a chance, however, that the emperor may release Richter on an appeal from the directors' decision.

ING, APRIL 17, 1893.

RICHTER'S AMERICANISM.

The Coming Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in Thorough Sympathy With Us.

VIENNA, April 16.—Hans Richter, the famous musician, is well known for his immense energy in all that he undertakes, and when once he has decided upon a given course he is quite as apt to accomplish it as the typical American. The knowledge of this peculiarity has set all Vienna talking about Richter's plan of going to America since it has been known that he signed his contract with Mr. Higginson Thursday.

He says that his Boston contract calls for his direction of two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of next October, and his duties under his new contract will, he thinks, be a great relief after those he has been subject to here.

The two reasons which have led him to accept Mr. Higginson's contract are, first, a feeling that it will give him a relief from the overwork now imposed upon him here, which he feels the need of; and, second, a thorough and sincere admiration for and sympathy with the American people and American ideas.

For a resident of Vienna this is an approach to heresy, for Vienna is the world in the popular belief here. Richter's plans have not been changed regarding his Chicago concerts as a part of the series associated with the exposition there. He will leave here early in June, and return immediately after his short stay in Chicago, to prepare to take his wife and family to Boston, in which city he expects to be established permanently by the middle of next September.

The consternation in art circles here over this intended departure of Richter will be apparent from the facts that he directs the choral church service at the Imperial chapel, is first director at the Grand opera and conductor of the Philharmonic Society, that he is thoroughly identified with Vienna art life. It does not appear to be realized here that all these duties make demands upon such a man that even his great energy is not at all times sufficient to carry him through them all.

Today Richter directed for the last time here the ninth symphony, and the excitement over the event was widespread. A grand ovation greeted him upon his appearance at the conductor's desk, and he was made to realize how large a place he holds in the hearts of the Vienna musical public.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, April 23, 1893.

I RECEIVED last week an interesting letter from Mr. Feruccio B. Busoni. It was the letter of a musician and a man. I refer to it here for this reason: A paragraph in which he speaks of his extraordinary orchestral poem played at the twenty-second symphony concert is of general interest.

"The fundamental idea," he writes, "and the pessimistic idea (if you allow the phrase) of my composition is found in a poem by Lenau entitled 'Der Indifferentist.' For obvious reasons I did not prefix this title to my composition."

Now what is the motif of Lenau's poems? Paraphrased it is something like this: Whether you are a Socrates, quaffing with a smile the hemlock draught to the health of your country; whether you are a vile child of hell, blaspheming under the headsman's ax; whether you are a great genius or merely serve to fatten the grave worm. All this is of just as much importance as whether the animalcule that swims monotonously in the circle of a drop of water turns to the right or to the left at the beginning of the journey.

Now this is a cheerful subject to put to music.

* * *

Let us waive the question whether the subject per se admits of artistic treatment, and let us not discuss whether there are such things as morality and immorality in art.

The question is this: Is it possible to express these thoughts of Lenau in music?

* * *

Here let me quote the opinions of Paul Sourian as expressed in "La Suggestion dans l'Art," Paris, 1893. The book itself is well worth the reading, but these extracts bear directly on the subject of program music and I have not met with them in English translation.

"Music may have a vague meaning for the hearer and a determined meaning so far as the composer is concerned. When I speak vehemently my speech becomes a chant, and each intonation, determined by my state of feeling, expresses that state perfectly; yet a stranger, who could only judge of my feeling by this series of intonations, might easily and totally misunderstand me. I am persuaded that the composer expresses well in music that which he wishes to say. The reproach of vagueness rests on a misunderstanding.

"It is said that music is powerless to express mental feelings. But what are these feelings?

"If you mention regret, fear, hope, pride, anger, remorse, &c., feelings that we experience in daily life, I admit that such feelings cannot be expressed in music. Such sentiments are produced under special conditions and the composer cannot reproduce them; just as it is very difficult for him to indicate them by means of imitation or description.

275
the art world of Europe. Indeed, reflecting on his value and considering the practical impossibility of finding a fully equipped successor, there arises a feeling of apprehension that the kaiser's advisers in these matters will say "no." Even then, however, the incident will stand as another illustration of Colonel Higginson's constant purpose to provide the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the best men at all points, with never a thought of the question of cost.

WILL RICHTER COME?

Dare He Break His Contract With the Imperial Opera?—What May Result if He Does.

A dispatch from Vienna to this morning's Journal said that the Intendant of the Imperial Opera refuses to release Hans Richter from his contract. Now, the contract will not expire for at least two years, and, as the Austrian conductor has accepted the invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning his duties next fall, the situation will become more interesting until he makes a decided move.

To a Journal reporter this morning Mr. Bernard Listemann spoke of the matter as he views it. "Richter," he said, "will probably not be released from his contract. He is, you know, one of the great conductors, and the people of Vienna know this better than any others. They worship him.

"It is a serious thing to break a contract. Lilli Lehman left Berlin against the wishes of the intendant, and for years she was not permitted to sing in Germany. A year or two ago they began to be not so strict, and then she sang in some places, but never did she appear at any of the courts. It really ruined her in Germany.

"Now if Richter is bold enough he can do as she did. Possibly royal clemency may be extended, or perhaps Mr. Higginson has promised to compensate him for the loss during the rest of his life. If anything can do it I should think it were Mr. Higginson's money bags. I think that Richter might better have waited for two years, when his contract would have expired, and then this peculiar situation would be avoided."

THE ENTERPRISING EXPONENTS of modern journalism who made up their minds that Hans Richter will be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have the opportunity now to reflect on the danger of a too rapid development of previousness. As stated in the Transcript when first the news of the offer of the post to Richter and his acceptance was published, nothing was settled by that, but all depended upon the readiness of his official masters at Vienna to accept his resignation; and the doubts on that point expressed in the Transcript are confirmed by the official report that the directors of the Imperial Opera refuse peremptorily to release Richter from his contract, and decline to accept his resignation. With this comes a despatch that the great conductor says that he will come anyhow: a report that is almost incredible, for this reason: If at any time Mr. Richter should set foot on Austrian soil after breaking his contract (which has four years to run, by the way), he would be a prisoner, and be called to answer the charges against him with the promptitude that is characteristic of a government having a thorough and searching police system; and Mr. Richter knows this, probably, as well as any subject of the ruler of Austria and Hungary. There is still a chance, however, that the emperor may release Richter on an appeal from the directors' decision.

ING, APRIL 17, 1893.

RICHTER'S AMERICANISM.

The Coming Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in Thorough Sympathy With Us.

VIENNA, April 16.—Hans Richter, the famous musician, is well known for his immense energy in all that he undertakes, and when once he has decided upon a given course he is quite as apt to accomplish it as the typical American. The knowledge of this peculiarity has set all Vienna talking about Richter's plan of going to America since it has been known that he signed his contract with Mr. Higginson Thursday.

He says that his Boston contract calls for his direction of two concerts each week, beginning in the early part of next October, and his duties under his new contract will, he thinks, be a great relief after those he has been subject to here.

The two reasons which have led him to accept Mr. Higginson's contract are, first, a feeling that it will give him a relief from the overwork now imposed upon him here, which he feels the need of; and, second, a thorough and sincere admiration for and sympathy with the American people and American ideas.

For a resident of Vienna this is an approach to heresy, for Vienna is the world in the popular belief here. Richter's plans have not been changed regarding his Chicago concerts as a part of the series associated with the exposition there. He will leave here early in June, and return immediately after his short stay in Chicago, to prepare to take his wife and family to Boston, in which city he expects to be established permanently by the middle of next September.

The consternation in art circles here over this intended departure of Richter will be apparent from the facts that he directs the choral church service at the Imperial chapel, is first director at the Grand opera and conductor of the Philharmonic Society, that he is thoroughly identified with Vienna art life. It does not appear to be realized here that all these duties make demands upon such a man that even his great energy is not at all times sufficient to carry him through them all.

Today Richter directed for the last time here the ninth symphony, and the excitement over the event was widespread. A grand ovation greeted him upon his appearance at the conductor's desk, and he was made to realize how large a place he holds in the hearts of the Vienna musical public.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, April 23, 1893.

277
I RECEIVED last week an interesting letter from Mr. Feruccio B. Busoni. It was the letter of a musician and a man. I refer to it here for this reason: A paragraph in which he speaks of his extraordinary orchestral poem played at the twenty-second symphony concert is of general interest.

"The fundamental idea," he writes, "and the pessimistic idea (if you allow the phrase) of my composition is found in a poem by Lenau entitled 'Der Indifferentist.' For obvious reasons I did not prefix this title to my composition."

Now what is the motif of Lenau's poems? Paraphrased it is something like this: Whether you are a Socrates, quaffing with a smile the hemlock draught to the health of your country; whether you are a vile child of hell, blaspheming under the headsman's ax; whether you are a great genius or merely serve to fatten the grave worm. All this is of just as much importance as whether the animalcule that swims monotonously in the circle of a drop of water turns to the right or to the left at the beginning of the journey.

Now this is a cheerful subject to put to music.

* * *

Let us waive the question whether the subject per se admits of artistic treatment, and let us not discuss whether there are such things as morality and immorality in art.

The question is this: Is it possible to express these thoughts of Lenau in music?

* * *

Here let me quote the opinions of Paul Sourian as expressed in "La Suggestion dans l'Art," Paris, 1893. The book itself is well worth the reading, but these extracts bear directly on the subject of program music and I have not met with them in English translation.

"Music may have a vague meaning for the hearer and a determined meaning so far as the composer is concerned. When I speak vehemently my speech becomes a chant, and each intonation, determined by my state of feeling, expresses that state perfectly; yet a stranger, who could only judge of my feeling by this series of intonations, might easily and totally misunderstand me. I am persuaded that the composer expresses well in music that which he wishes to say. The reproach of vagueness rests on a misunderstanding.

"It is said that music is powerless to express mental feelings. But what are these feelings?

"If you mention regret, fear, hope, pride, anger, remorse, &c., feelings that we experience in daily life, I admit that such feelings cannot be expressed in music. Such sentiments are produced under special conditions and the composer cannot reproduce them; just as it is very difficult for him to indicate them by means of imitation or description.

278 "Let us take for instance the feeling of remorse. I do not see how a composer could make us understand that a fault had been committed. Would he try, then, to give us in musical sensations an equivalent of such a feeling? The problem may thus be propounded: To find sonorous combinations that act on the hearer as the regret for the committed fault acts on the guilty one.

"All that the composer can do in this case is to put us in a state of uneasiness, of moral constraint, which will have some analogy to the feeling of remorse; but how can the hearer recognize fully the anxiety, the dull irritation, the wounding of self esteem, the physical depression, the enervation that accompanies stormy weather? It is true that the hearer will feel something; but unless he knows the precise object to which this feeling is attached it will be impossible for him to determine its nature.

"This difficulty is not found in dramatic music where the nature of the sentiments expressed is indicated in advance by words and situation. In this case the musical expression is perfectly clear and acts on the imagination of the hearer with extraordinary force. In many instances a simple title would put us on the track. Why should they not be given? The subject of a picture is indicated. I said a little while ago that absolute music cannot suggest the sentiment of remorse. But if we knew in advance the intentions of the composer we could meet the suggestion, we could accept the most vague analogy as an equivalent. A composer could write perfectly clear descriptive music to this title: 'The Remorse of Cain.'

"Reason as you will, you will arrive at the same conclusion: absolute music can express only in the most vague manner the exact or vague sentiments of actual life.

"Yet music expresses and suggests determined sentiments. These sentiments are musical sentiments.

"Each one of us will admit that our mental condition is not the same when we hear music and when we do not hear it; that a change from major to minor affects somehow our sensitiveness; that we are differently moved when we hear Schumann's 'réverie' and Bocherini's menuet; that each piece of music has its particular expression, which you cannot define in words, as customary words are made only for the feelings of customary life, and yet this particular expression is none the less special and fixed.

"These sentiments are exclusively musical, because they are produced by listening to music, and we do not find them in any other way. They no more resemble the emotions of real life than a rhythmic or an harmonic accident resembles an incident in the street.

"These musical sentiments are the proper subjects of musical expression. The composer does not try to suggest other feelings to you, and he has not experienced other feelings in composing. Do not be disturbed at that which he wished to say; do not try to recognize in the emotion felt by you emotions previously felt; listen to the composition, or, still better, play it yourself. Sit at the piano or take part in the ensemble, and give yourself up to your spontaneous impressions! Thus you will become a part of the soul of the composer; he will have given to you all that which he experienced in the moment of inspiration. 279

"When you hear a doleful tune you are tempted to ask: 'But why was the composer so sad? When this tune occurred to him what suffering did he undergo, with what gloomy thoughts was he beset?'

"We are too easily led to believe that the composer dreams of putting his own feelings, joys, sorrows, hopes into his music. Perhaps he turns toward gay or sad music according to the state of his health and the happy or unhappy incidents of his private life. But such influences are only very vague, very general. The composer, as a rule, gives us in his work the feelings which he has experienced in his musical life.

"To enrich the human soul with emotions that are not found elsewhere; to create new feelings, to express them in a language that is perfectly clear and universally intelligible; these are the true functions of expressive music.

"These functions are lofty enough for the composer to be satisfied with them."

* * *

In a word, we must again go back to the definition of Walt Whitman: "All music is what awakes from you when you are reminded by the instruments."

Or, as Baudelaire puts it: "If trees, mountains, water, houses are grouped together and form a landscape, the landscape is beautiful, not of itself, but on account of me, on account of my own favorable impression, on account of the idea or the emotion which I attach to it."

* * *

Philip Houlès

280
A PRIVATE dispatch from London confirms the final and pretty authoritative announcement in respect of Herr Richter's decision not to accept the engagement offered him by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. While I am of the opinion still that Herr Richter is not the man for the place, there can be no doubt that his latest determination has caused Mr. Higginson and his employés lively disappointment. Richter's name would have been a great thing to conjure with, and with the renowned Hans as conductor it would have been an easy task to take the band to Europe during the summer months, not with any view of a profit, of course, but ad majorem gloriam Higginsoni. The withdrawal of Herr Richter makes matters doubly annoying, for it will be next to impossible to find a first rate conductor in his stead. Weingärtner is bound by a contract to Munich, and I hear that Felix Mottl, whom, at last accounts, Mr. Higginson was after, is also engaged in Germany for a term of years. J. W. M. May 4 '93

MORE distressing, however, than the outlook for the future, is the actual situation. Every year the B. S. O. departs on a Western tour of four weeks, in which the band gives some twenty-five concerts. The tour is now in progress, and, ere it began, Mr. Nikisch laid down his bâton and declined to accompany the orchestra on its wanderings. This, indeed, is serious, for no one is inclined to accept Mr. Kneisel in Mr. Nikisch's place, and the greater man's absence is likely to throw a wet blanket over every performance. Altogether, the situation is a discomforting one, and it suggests a feeling that the best days of the B. S. O. are o'er.

THE story of the rupture of Mr. Nikisch's relations with the B. S. O. has been rehearsed to me as follows. Mr. Nikisch, on receipt of the offer from Buda-Pesth, went straight to Mr. Higginson and asked him whether, at the end of the twelvemonth that was to conclude his actual engagement, he was prepared to renew the contract for a term of five years. Mr. Higginson was reluctant to give an immediate answer, whereupon Mr. Nikisch cabled his acceptance of the Buda-Pesth proposal, and the first news of this step that reached Mr. Higginson came to him through the Boston newspapers. I have good grounds for believing that Mr. Higginson intended to make a change of leader after next season, and that Mr. Nikisch, in some way or other, became aware of his principal's purpose. The conductor has lost ground at a fearful rate in Boston during the last twelve months, and the opinions expressed by the leading critics, several of whom regard him as a better interpreter of operatic than of symphonic music, now pervade a large part of the public. It is to be regretted that, on this head, the critics of the Hub should disagree with the writers on the New York dailies, but inasmuch as Messrs. Woolf, Hale and Apthorp are practical musicians, undesirous of having compositions they do not write interpreted by sycophantic conductors, unconnected in business with leaders or conservatories, and able and willing to devote time and attention to their critical duties, instead of depending upon the housebills to know what is played or sung, most people would rather bow to their judgment than to that of their metropolitan confrères. Mr. Nikisch, moreover, gave forty-eight concerts in Boston vice six in New York, so that the Bostonians' opportunities of forming an estimate of his merits were somewhat more numerous than were offered the lecturers and expounders of Gotham. Certain it is that, in an artistic sense, Mr. Nikisch leaves Boston under a cloud.

281
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, AT 8 P. M.

Wagner Programme.

OVERTURE to "Rienzi," in D major.

Molto sostenuto e maestoso. D major.
Allegro energico. D major.

PRELUDE to Act III. DANCE of APPRENTICES. MARCH of the MASTER-SINGERS, and HOMAGE to HANS SACHS, from "The Mastersingers of Nuernberg."

PRELUDE and FIRST SCENE from "Das Rheingold."
(The Rhine-daughters and Alberich.)

WAGNER: Miss Felicia Kaschoska.
WELLGUNDE: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
FLOSSHILDE: Miss Louise Leimer.
ALBERICH: Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

SIEGFRIED PASSING THROUGH the FIRE, from "Siegfried," Act III.
Scene 2 and MORNING DAWN, and SIEGFRIED'S VOYAGE up the RHINE, from "Goetterdaemmerung" Prologue.
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)

SIEGFRIED'S FUNERAL MARCH, from "Goetterdaemmerung," Act III.
Scene 2.

BRUENNHILDE'S DYING SPEECH OVER SIEGFRIED'S BODY, from "Goetterdaemmerung," Act III., Scene 3.
BRUENNHILDE: Miss Felicia Kaschoska.

SOLOISTS:

MISS FELICIA KASCHOSKA,
MRS. ARTHUR NIKISCH,
MISS LOUISE LEIMER,
MR. HEINRICH MEYN.

ABOUT MUSIC.

Journal

The Twenty-third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Opinions of Many Sages Concerning German Singers.

A Pleasing Unanimity of a Cloud of Witnesses.

The programme of the 23d Symphony concert was made up of selections from the works of Wagner. It was as follows:

Overture, "Rienzi."
Prelude to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, March of the Master-singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master-singers of Nuremberg."
Prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold."
(The Rhine-daughters and Alberich.)
Woglinde.....Miss Felicia Kaschoska.
Wellgunde.....Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Floßhilde.....Miss Louise Leimer.
Alberich.....Mr. Heinrich Meyn.
Siegfried, Passing through the Fire, from "Siegfried."
Act III., Scene 2, and Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine, from "Götterdämmerung."
Prologue.
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Götterdämmerung."
Act III., Scene 2.
Brünnhilde's Dying Speech over Siegfried's Body, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., Scene 3.
Brünnhilde.....Miss Kaschoska.

These numbers were applauded heartily by a large audience.

The performance of the instrumental numbers was brilliant and the applause was well deserved.

Wagner in his later years rejected "Rienzi." His most devoted disciples do not speak of this "error of youth," or they condemn it as the abomination of desolation mentioned by the Hebrew prophet.

In truth the overture is a vulgar thing. Its pomp smells of sawdust; its glory is the glory of paint and tinsel.

This circus-overture provoked, Saturday evening, a scene of tumultuous joy.

The Wagner of early years was anxious for the proper and peculiar performance of his music-dramas.

The Wagner of later years was anxious for the performance of his works, even on the concert stage, without scenic accessories.

Hence these excerpts for concert use. Hence this wearisome concert arrangement of the prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold."

In a concert arrangement the famous pedal is without force or meaning.

The Rhine Daughters swim only in the imagination of the hearer; their concert dress is hardly suitable for aquatic frolics.

For they are on the concert stage, not in a stage aquarium.

They shriek out spasmodically "Weia! Wagal! Wallala weia! weia!"
When they are tired of this amusement they refresh themselves by remarking in a loud voice, "Lalaleia! Lalei! Heia! Haha!"
They also exclaim "Heiahahei!"
Thus they bear their part in the exhibition of Wagnerian dramatic truth.

When the operas of Wagner were prepared for performance in Italy Wagner insisted that they should be sung in Italian.

He believed that opera should be sung in the language of the country of the performance.

We are obliged in a symphony concert to listen to the German language.

The German language is the fashionable speech of our concert halls.

The Germans did not invent the sonata or the cantata, the symphony or the madrigal, the opera or the oratorio.

The Netherlands and the Italians rejoiced in musical masterpieces before music was cultivated intelligently in Germany.

It is, however, the popular impression in this city that music was invented by the Germans and will die with that people.

Our own singers, born here and known to us, give pleasure in strange lands to foreign audiences.

We import for our own use German declaimers, who, too often, are known in their own country as "veterans of song."

Now, a veteran of song is not unlike an "old war-horse of Democracy;" he is cheered frantically when he appears on the platform, but no one really listens to him, for he is apt to mumble, by reason of age and dental imperfections.

And what, pray, is the sentence pronounced by many judges of different nations and of different centuries on German singers, even when they are young and fresh, on the German tongue and on German vocal art?

The characteristics of German singing have remained unchanged from the beginning.

Hearken unto Tacitus:

"Amongst them, too, are found that kind of verses, by the recital of which (by them called Barding) they inspire bravery; nay, by such chanting itself they divine the success of the approaching fight."

"Nor does what they utter so much seem to be singing, as the voice and exertion of valor."

"They chiefly study a tone fierce and harsh, with a broken and unequal murmur; and therefore apply their shields to their mouths when the voice may, by rebounding, swell with greater fullness and force."

Centuries ago Johannes Diacorus, the biographer of Gregory, complained of the inability of the Germans to sing the Gregorian song in its purity.

"Their rough voices, roaring like thunder, do not lend themselves to agreeable modulation, because their hoarse throats, accustomed to strong drink, do not allow that suppleness which pleasing melodies require, so that their horror-inspiring voices bring forth tones which sound like the rumbling of a freight wagon going down hill."

Charles V., Emperor and King of Spain, used to say that he would address women in Italian; to men he would speak French; to his horses German; but that if he were to speak to God he would employ the Spanish language.

This monarch smiled when Petrus Royzius, the poet, said to John Langus, as they all sat merrily at meat, "The Germans don't speak, but they thunder; and it is my opinion that God made use of their language when he thundered forth the sentence of condemnation on Adam."

It was James Howell who wrote concerning German: "A full-mouthed Language she is, and pronounc'd with that strength as if one had Bones in his Tongue instead of Neris."

Frederick the Great, to whom all loyal Germans still point with pride, loved dearly the mellifluous voices of Italians, and exclaimed that he would rather listen to an air whinnied by his horse than have a German prima donna in his opera house.

Weber praised heartily the singers who took part in "Oberon," London, 1823, because they had excellent voices, sang with expression and had been skillfully trained in the Italian school.

Schopenhauer claims that the truly national characteristic of the Germans is "heaviness." "Heaviness is conspicuous in their gait; in their manner of being and acting; in their talk, set speech, literature, fashion of understanding and reflecting; and above all in their style."

Let Karl August Alfred, Freiherr von Wolzogen take the witness stand. He was Intendant of the Court Theatre in Schwerin.

He wrote on musical subjects.

By an irony of Fate, his son Hans turned out to be a fanatical worshiper of Wagner; and he wrote pamphlets that serve as a Baedeker to the traveler through the mist enveloped region where Wagner sits enthroned.

The following extracts are from the older Wolzogen's "Life of Wilhelmine Schroeder-Devrient":

"The Schroeder-Devrient never found leisure for the acquisition of the very A-B-C of song, and no one can ever be a fully equipped singer, in spite of all supplementary exertion, unless he is absolute master of his organ, before he applies it to dramatic use.

"Least of all can a German be such a singer unless he was born with an extraordinary talent, and unless he has studied to an extraordinary degree.

"For, alas, it is impossible to deny the fact that of all the cultured people of Europe, the Germans, a deeply musical folk, show remarkably little aptitude for singing; and they show a want of vocal taste that puts them below the English even, a nation that occupies in the eyes of the world an especially low place in every artistic particular, although this opinion can not now be entertained with fairness.

"We often hear that we Germans have invented for our own use, a peculiar style which does not admit of comparison with that of the Italian or the Frenchman. This is a good-natured illusion of people who are wholly ignorant in the matter. The truth is that the genuine vocal instinct is foreign to us, and so are niceties of expression: the only instance to the contrary is the delivery of our songs, a delivery that is a compromise between singing and declamation.

"What we are pleased to call 'our style' is nothing but a naive condition of natural, untrained singing.

"Art is cosmopolitan; true art must please the intelligent in London and Paris, Rome and St. Petersburg, as well as in Vienna and Berlin. That which does not withstand such a test may live on provincial applause, or the applause of a coterie, but it does not deserve the attention of a serious man."

This extract from the same book calls for deep consideration in these days:

"Whoever has voice enough to shout lustily so that the walls rock, and has not sufficient patience or artistic spirit to learn in a decent manner the use of the instrument, will be a 'dramatic singer,' if the voice is a soprano; an 'heroic tenor,' if the voice is tenor."

And what did Gustav Roger, the great tenor, say of German singers?

German singers have subordinated everything to the voice, not in the intelligent variety of timbre, but in the uniform force of emission. "In this country, where philosophy has so often left the earth to lose itself in the clouds, the art of song has stuck to matter.

"The Germans say they worship art. It is possible: but it seems to me that they abandon the god and adore the temple; and this is the fault of the singers, not the fault of the public."

Wagner himself did not condemn beautiful singing, even in the Italian sense, except where it was opposed to dramatic truth.

He regarded the question of nationality in vocal art.

In his "Deber Schauspieler und Saenger" he recognized the fact that the German language is at war with bel canto.

It is not surprising then that he dedicated the volume to the memory of the Schroeder-Devrient, who was, indeed, a "dramatic singer," in Wolzogen's meaning of the phrase.

Neither Berlioz nor Chorley could endure the singing of the Schroeder-Devrient.

Berlioz admitted that she was "dramatic," but he hastened to add that she sang flat whenever she could not force a tone; that her ornaments were in very bad taste; that she interpolated in her song spoken phrases and interjections of execrable effects.

Berlioz compared her to an actor in a Parisian vaudeville: "This way of singing is the most anti-musical and the most trivial that one can point out to beginners to avoid."

Now, Wagner admired the singing of the Schroeder-Devrient.

Surely did Vernon Lee have the German school in mind when she wrote these bitter words, words that are bitter and true:

"Let him or her be effective; act with impetuosity, declaim with vehemence, shriek and yell passionately, if he or she have dramatic instinct; or force upper tones, or bellow lower ones, or gabble off shapeless roulades, if he or she have strong lungs or a flexible throat; he or she have strong lungs or a flexible throat; and any of these means will lead to distinction, and they are qualities, whether dramatic or vocal, which require little tuition and less practice; above all, which entirely dispense with the more knowledge that such a thing as an art of singing has ever existed or can ever exist."

It is possible that the Germans, who look askew at the frivolities of other nations, shudder at the instance of Sempronia, the tool of Cataline to foment the rebellion, who, according to Sallust, was taught to sing more finely than became a virtuous woman.

Their arrogance, however, leads them to prefer their song for its "feeling," for its "intellectuality," and when they are criticised even gently or timidly, they cry out against the ignorance or the childishness of the accusers. How different was the conduct of Anaximander, the philosopher.

It is said that as he was singing the boys used to ridicule him, upon which he only remarked, "We must learn to sing better for their sakes."

PHILIP HALE

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

A great Wagnerian programme was given at the symphony concert of Saturday, and it attracted the largest audience of the season. It began with the Rienzi overture which was magnificently played. This overture is in itself the best refutation of the critics of the Rowbotham stripe who hold that Wagner was incapable of writing a melody, for the prayer of Rienzi, which forms such an important part of the work, is nothing if not melodic. The performance was a worthy one both in reading and execution; the trumpets shaded their long notes in excellent style, the violins (spite of the absence of the concertmeister) played with abundant spirit, and the power of the finale was deafening but appropriate.

To enjoy the prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers" one must be thoroughly familiar with the motives or "guiding-figures" which are used, and it is more than probable that not one tenth of the audience had memorized these figures. Wagner has brought, by the interweaving of such figures, a new intellectuality into music, an intellectuality different from that found in the contrapuntal evolutions of Bach and from the thematic treatment of Beethoven, but none the less definite counterpoise to the emotional side of the art.

Such music speaks a language as definite as French or Italian, and for the average auditor to rhapsodize over it without knowing the purport of its leit-motiven is as if one innocent of all Hellenic knowledge were to descend upon the beauties of a Greek tragedy which he had only heard in the unknown tongue; a few years ago Mme. Wagner inquired of the writer whether Wagner was understood in America or was only "the fashion?"

The question cannot be satisfactorily answered even now. The analysis in the programme-book was carefully prepared, but nothing short of actual lessons can make the average auditor familiar with the language of Wagner's music, or with the suggestions conveyed in almost every measure of such a prelude. The performance was good, the shading delicate, the climaxes well worked up, and that wonderful bit of Mediaevalism, the dance of the apprentices, with its quaint seven-barred phrases, was especially admirable in its spirit.

Far less satisfactory was the opening scene from "Rhinogold," for here the music requires the scenery and action to make it impressive. The unique treatment of the chord of E flat which is reiterated until the rest of the tonal system seems obliterated, is wonderfully graphic when one sees the Rhine flowing and ever flowing, but on the concert platform it is simply monotonous. The singers, one and all were not Wagnerian singers; they just accomplished their task, but this achievement through palpable effort is fatal to Wagnerian effects; a tolerable Wagnerian performance (especially in the vocal parts) is as unbearable as a tolerable egg or a reasonably satisfactory heaven would be. Everything seemed spasmodic, and in the orchestra the ensemble was anything but perfect, while the horn broke in almost every phrase.

The pasticcio from the two last operas of the trilogy, arranged by Hans Richter (the name brings up a sad host of "might-have-been") only seems to prove that Wagner was right in desiring that his works might not be concertized too much, it could not sustain the interest, and it was not well-played into the bargain, many of the figures being drowned out altogether.

What was said above concerning the comprehension of the story that the Wagnerian orchestra has to tell, can be repeated with still greater force in connection with the funeral march of Siegfried. Next Saturday we are to have a funeral march (in the heroic symphony) in which every musical auditor will discern the brooding warriors, the weeping maiden, a work which impressed the poet Coleridge as "a funeral in Purple," and which is, in every measure, as the burial of some mighty Viking; in the present Wagnerian work we have this heroic character and something besides; here we find a life story in tones, all the chief episodes in Siegfried's life are recited by the orchestra, by means of the guiding figures; if ever there was a definite language in orchestral music it is here. The work was finely performed and its interpretation deserved equal recognition with that of the Rienzi overture.

With the finale of the "Goetterdaemmerung" the concert fittingly ended; there probably never has been a finale like this attempted in music; to end the greatest operatic work ever conceived by human mind with a monologue, showed how little hampered by tradition the composer was; there is no attempt to pile Ossa upon Pelion, there is no desire to overwhelm the auditor with a stupendous combination of forces (Berlioz would have done that) there is only the frank presentation of the pathetic end of the story, nothing is to distract the attention from the noble Brunnhilde in her hour of supreme agony; but that sorrowing woman standing alone is grander than all the choruses that the Italians have heaped up in their climaxes. It is, however, necessary that the Brunnhilde should be an artist of overwhelming power, for in the whole realm of operatic work there is nothing which demands such dramatic force as this finale; and Miss Kaschaska was only painstaking, true in intonation (generally), and often loud of voice; how tame these points of merit are in comparison with what Wagner has demanded; technique and effort were to be lost sight of altogether, a presentation of the power of Fate such as the old Greek tragic poets imagined was to be impressed upon the auditor, and here we received only the impression of a conscientious artist using every effort to accomplish a very arduous task, and at the end one was glad that no accident or serious shortcoming had occurred.

The audience applauded everything and seemed to feel obliged to ascribe everything that was unclearly done, or seemed unintelligible, to the depth of the Wagnerian school.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening before an overflowing audience. The programme, made up entirely of Wagner excerpts, was as follows:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Prelude to Act III. Dance of Apprentices.
March of the Mastersingers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold."
(The Rhine-daughters and Alberich.)
Woglinde.....Mrs. Felicia Kaschoska
Wellgunde.....Miss Arthur Nikisch
Floshilde.....Mrs. Louise Leimer
Alberich.....Mr. Heinrich Meyn
Siegfried Passing Through the Fire, from "Siegfried," Act III, Scene 2, and Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Voyage Up the Rhine, from "Götterdämmerung," Prologue.
(Arranged by Hans Richter.)
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III, Scene 2.
Brünnhilde's Dying Speech Over Siegfried's Body, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III, Scene 3.
Brünnhilde, Miss Felicia Kaschoska.

The performance of the Rienzi overture was one of the most brilliant and effective renderings that the orchestra has presented for many a day. It was followed by a storm of applause upon the part of the audience. The selection from "The Mastersingers" was also admirably played and enthusiastically received by the audience.

As regards the other excerpts, much doubt can be expressed concerning their adaptability for concert purposes, for, when deprived of the necessary surroundings of the stage, display the wearisomeness that afflicts the listener when presented under the best advantages, is intensified, and, unless one be an unconquerable Wagnerite, it is a tedious task to sit through such a programme.

The work of the orchestra, generally speaking, was excellent. At times there was a lack of definition and proper balance and overmuch of noise, a violence that Wagner himself would not have tolerated. The vocalists cast to struggle against the tempestuous surging of the orchestra stood up to their work in a commendable manner. Of course they were obliged to yell and shout in order to be heard in their declamatory efforts, and there was little or no opportunity to display any singing ability, if they possessed it.

Miss Kaschoska has a fine voice and a manifest musical intelligence, but she was obliged to force her powers beyond their normal limit. The same can be said of the other singers who intelligently and forcibly accomplished their tasks. Next Saturday will be the last concert of this season's series, and the last appearance in this city of the present incumbent of the conductor's position. The programme will be Symphony No. 1 in D major, Mozart; The Unfinished Symphony, Schubert, and Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

Notes.

This evening at Chickering Hall Miss Adele Lewing will give a concert with the assistance of Mrs. Humphrey Allen, Miss Louise Rollwagen and Mr. Gardner Lamson. Miss Lewing is an artist of ample technique, and is possessed of the finest musical instincts. She will also appear as a composer on this occasion, both instrumental and vocal. With the assistance of the above capable vocalists, whose numbers will be wholly of Miss Lewing's composition, this concert will prove a very attractive affair.

An attractive performance this week will be the first appearance in America of Miss Fanny Richter the pianist. It will take place at Bumstead Hall, Wednesday afternoon, April 26, at 4 o'clock. Miss Richter will have the assistance of a full orchestra, and Mr. B. J. Lang will be the conductor. The programme will contain the Concerto No. 3 of Beethoven and Concerto No. 2 of Liszt, with "Polonaise" op. 53 and Nocturne op. 15, Chopin, also the "Legende" by Liszt. Tickets on sale at Music Hall.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

DEPARTURE OF MR. NIKISCH.

The Traveller stated April 8 that Mr. Nikisch would probably not complete this season's work by going West with the orchestra. It now seems that the Traveller's conclusions were right, for he is to go to Europe immediately, and Mr. Kneisel will assume the baton for the rest of the season that Nikisch has so summarily laid down. Well, the orchestra will be benefited by the change, and it would have been much more to its credit if Mr. Kneisel had been the conductor for the past four seasons. Mr. Higginson is fortunate in possessing such a capable candidate for the position as Mr. Kneisel, and it would not be a thing to be regretted by any means if Mr. Kneisel succeeded to the position of conductor permanently.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was made up wholly of selections from the works of Richard Wagner, and was as follows:

Overture to "Rienzi."
Prelude to Act III, Dance of Apprentices, March of the Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
Prelude and First Scene from "Das Rheingold."
Woglinde: Miss Felicia Kaschoska.
Wellgunde: Mrs. Arthur Nikisch.
Floshilde: Miss Louise Leimer.
Alberich: Mr. Heinrich Meyn.
Siegfried passing through the Fire (from "Siegfried," Act III, Scene 2), Morning Dawn, and Siegfried's Voyage up the Rhine (from "Götterdämmerung," Prologue), arranged for concert performance by Hans Richter.
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III, Scene 2.
Brünnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III, Scene 3.
Brünnhilde: Miss Felicia Kaschoska.

A memorable concert! In the "Rienzi" overture, Mr. Nikisch makes a little change, which, we believe, was first made in this country by Mr. Walter Damrosch in New York a year or two ago, substituting an inverted turn for the direct one in the first measure of the theme of Rienzi's prayer, in the slow introduction. About the authority for this change various stories are told, the best authenticated of which seems to be this: Hans Richter, looking over the score of "Rienzi" one day was struck with a certain resemblance between the beginning of Rienzi's prayer and the first few notes of the motive of "Siegfried and Brünnhilde's wedded love" in the prologue of "Götterdämmerung." The inverted turn is an integral and characteristic factor of the latter; and it occurred to Richter to substitute this inverted turn for the more usual direct one in the Rienzi theme. He accordingly proposed the change to Wagner, who expressed himself as much pleased with it. To us the change seems a not particularly happy one; what the phrase gains thereby in possible distinction it loses in suavity and naturalness. Indeed we think Wagner has seldom been wholly happy in remodelling his earlier works and making them up to date; there is a chasm between his first and third manners that cannot be bridged over, and his earlier works are best as he first conceived them. The performance of the overture was one of those new experiences that Mr. Nikisch gives one from time to time; in brilliancy and vigor of accent it was incomparable. The effect produced at the last return of the "Santo Spirito Cavaliere" theme in the coda was simply overwhelming. And somehow this pushing the frank, outspoken brilliancy of the music to the uttermost pitch, this vigorous playing it for all it is worth, seemed to eliminate much of its coarseness and triviality. For once the overture to "Rienzi" sounded thoroughly inspiring.

The excerpts from the "Meistersinger" are excellently well put together; only we would protest against that unnecessary little tag of somebody else's harmony at the end, which sounds strangely foreign and out of place. There is absolutely no reason why the thing should not end pianissimo, just as the prelude to the third act does. The piece was admirably played.

In his conducting the prelude to "Das Rheingold"—that seemingly endless billowing up and down on the chord of E-flat major—Mr. Nikisch showed how ever-increasing vitality of accent can relieve monotony and make it even exciting. The exquisite first scene between Alberich and the Rhine daughters suffered somewhat by the singing not being invariably in tune, although much of it was beautifully done. The orchestra did its part of the work admirably. What a wonderful scene it is! We know of nothing in this vein in which Wagner has shown himself more full of genius. It was, however, a by no means happy idea to end it, as was done on Saturday evening, with a gratuitous and dramatically inexplicable return to the exultant cry, "Rheingold! Rheingold!" of the three Rhine-daughters. Think of it for a moment: Alberich has run off with the Gold, the Rhine-daughters shriek "Woe! Woe!" in terrific diminished-seventh chords, and then, all of a sudden and with no assignable reason, fall into renewed raptures over the gold, just as if nothing had happened! The musical effect is as senseless as the dramatic incongruity. And it would have been so easy to let the orchestra go on with the transformation music, just as it is in the score, and end off majestically with the Valhalla-motive on the brass, taking the second ending in D-flat major!

A similar impression was made upon us by the ending tagged on by Hans Richter to his selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung." In the original score, the closing selection—the orchestral interlude between the prologue and first act of "Götterdämmerung" ("Siegfried's Rheinfahrt")—gradually changes from the joyous, estatic character of the Rhine daughters' song to deeper and deeper mysteriousness, ending with as complete and well-prepared a closing cadence (on the first B-natural in the strings and kettledrums of the opening scene in the first act) as can be found in all Wagner. At worst, if this sudden appearance of the strings on a single note in unison, after the full chords on the bass trumpet, trombones, and bass tuba that lead up to it, seems a little sudden and unexplained, a full closing chord of B minor might well have been written out for the brass instruments. But, instead of this, Richter has stopped short at the entrance of the dark, mysterious themes in the interlude, and tagged on a few measures of the Valhalla-motive from "Das Rheingold." Now, ending the piece as it ends in the original score would not have displeased a living soul who did not know the music; whereas this interrupting Wagner's thought, and passing on to something utterly irrelevant, merely for the sake of ending off with a blaze, instead of pianissimo, does irritate those listeners who happen to know the music as it stands in the score. The selections were capitably played by the orchestra, the little scherzo on two of Siegfried's themes and Loge's "fire-motive" being given with a clearness and brilliancy that we have not heard before. The great funeral march—why is this movement called a "march," by the way?—was grandly given and made a most profound impression. A little care in expunging certain notes in the contrabass-tuba part, evidently written in for performances where the full force of brass indicated in the score was not available, would have avoided at least one startling tuba effect; but the impressiveness of the performance was such as to make one overlook such details.

The great closing scene in "Götterdämmerung" was given with immense impressiveness, Miss Kaschoska singing the part of Brünnhilde with great dramatic power and sincerity of feeling. We cannot like Mr. Nikisch's holding back the tempo at Brünnhilde's last "Siegfried! Siegfried! Sieh! Selig grüßet dich dein Weib!" We far prefer Mr. Gericke's and Mme. Lilli Lehmann's way of ending with an impetuous rush. But this was the only flaw; singer and orchestra vied with one another in giving the grand music all its tragic majesty. The orchestral peroration on the three united themes—Valhalla-motive, Rhine-daughters' motive, and redemption-motive was played with a clearness and expressive power that left nothing to be desired.

In these selections from the "Nibelungen" dramas the orchestra was almost complete, the only instruments lacking to make up the full quota being a third oboe and clarinet, the eighth horn, and five more harps. The Bay reuth-tubas (of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra owns a set) could not be used, their place being taken by horns, and now and then a trombone or bass-tuba. Might it not be well, though, to keep our horn-players to some extent in practice on these beautiful instruments, to meet such emergencies? It would certainly be less of a task for good horn-players to get to feel at home on them than for a clarinetist to master the saxophone, and their quality of tone in the "Nibelungen" music would be very valuable.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in D major ("Parisian"); Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E flat major ("Eroica").

Wagner Heard at the Symphony.

A programme consisting exclusively of selections from the works of Richard Wagner was played by the Symphony orchestra last evening. The increased attendance at both afternoon rehearsal and evening concert and the cordial applause bestowed showed that the programme was very welcome to Symphony concert patrons.

The selections consisted of the overture to "Rienzi," prelude to act III of the "Master-singers," dance of apprentices, march of master-singers and homage to Hans Sachs from the same opera; prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold," selections from the third act of "Siegfried," and the "Goetterdaemmerung" prologue, arranged by Hans Richter; Siegfried's funeral march from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Brünnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from the same opera.

The full resources of the orchestra were required for the interpretation of this programme, and the admirable manner in which every demand was met was most gratifying to the audience, and offered further evidence of the generally accepted fact that Boston has the finest symphony orchestra in the world.

The varied and highly colored harmonic effects of the brilliant overture were played with splendid spirit and expression, and the weird funeral march was given in a grandly impressive manner. The "Master-singers" numbers were also charmingly played.

Herr Richter's arrangement of the "Siegfried and Goetterdaemmerung" selections is a most interesting and harmonious work, and a more effective interpretation than that given by Director Nikisch could not be readily imagined.

In interpreting the first scene from "Das Rheingold," the orchestra had the assistance of the following vocal soloists: Miss Felicia Kaschoska as Woglinde, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as Wellgunde, Miss Louise Leimer as Flosshilde, Mr. Heinrich Meyn as Alberich.

They all sang with intelligence and good expression, and won hearty plaudits in spite of the fact that their voices were occasionally almost drowned by the tremendous volume of tone from the big orchestra.

Miss Felicia Kaschoska's singing of Brünnhilde's speech made a very favorable impression. The last of this season's symphony concerts will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. The programme will be as follows: Mozart, symphony No. 1, in D major; Schubert, unfinished symphony; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

For the last but one of his concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, Conductor Arthur Nikisch presented a Wagner programme in which the assistance was had of Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, as vocal soloists.

The selections made from the familiar concert repertoire of music drama arrangements were as follows: Overture to "Rienzi," in D major; prelude to act 3, dance of apprentices, march of the master-singers and homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master-singers of Nuremberg"; prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold"; Siegfried passing through the fire, from "Siegfried," act 3, scene 2, and morning dawn, and Siegfried's voyage up the Rhine, from "Goetterdaemmerung," prologue; Siegfried's funeral march, from "Goetterdaemmerung," act 3, scene 2, and Brünnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Goetterdaemmerung," act 3, scene 3.

The work of the orchestra was especially fine in the "Rienzi" overture, the performance of this number arousing the audience to a grand demonstration of its appreciation; and almost equally good results were given the scenes from "The Master-singers."

Few of the excerpts from the music dramas of this composer give so little satisfaction as the scene between the Rhine daughters and Alberich, and, apart from the stage settings, the almost meaningless declamations and outcries of the singers went for little. The thankless task put upon the four singers was duly accomplished with apparently about equal satisfaction both sides the stage line.

Miss Kaschoska was somewhat over-weighted by the vocal demands of the Brünnhilde declamatory number, but her delivery of its trying measure was characterized by excellent musical taste and intelligence.

The season and Mr. Nikisch's engagement ends with next Saturday's concert, when the programme will be made up of Mozart's symphony No. 1 in D major; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

MUSIC. Sarolta

The Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was devoted wholly to Wagner. The programme was: Overture, "Rienzi;" Prelude to Act III of "The Mastersingers;" Prelude and first scene from "The Rheingold;" "Passing through the Fire," from "Siegfried," and "Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Voyage;" Siegfried's Funeral March, and Brünnhilde's Dying Speech, from "The Twilight of the Gods." In the Rheingold scene, the singers were Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. A. Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. H. Meyn. Brünnhilde's Lament was sung by Miss Kaschoska. It was a long and rather monotonous, not to say wearisome, programme. Again was it emphasized that Wagner's music needs the scenic surroundings and the stage action for which it was written, to make it effective in the hearing. The "Rienzi" overture was given with splendid brilliancy and vigor, and in its climax with immense effectiveness. It is in music of this operative nature that the conductor is always at home, and his reading of the overture was one of his genuine successes of the season. Both conductor and orchestra were at their very best through the concert. The singing in "The Rheingold" was not always as tuneful as it might have been, but it was never lacking in energy or clearness. The singers have little else to do than to shout. Style, color and expression were wholly out of the question. That is all in the orchestra, and if the singers make themselves heard, they do nearly all that is required of them. Miss Kaschoska has a large and admirable voice, and she sings with ease and fire. In the Brünnhilde scene she declaimed her music finely. We should like to hear her when she is called upon to do something more than scream, for she made it plain that she is an artist of excellent gifts. The audience was large and enthusiastic, but its warmest and most prolonged applause was called forth by the "Rienzi" overture. For the next and last concert of the season, the programme is: Symphony, No. 1, in D-minor, Mozart; unfinished Symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven.

CYNICISMS.

I have derived much amusement from various communications that have been made to the papers anent Mr. Nikisch's resignation as conductor of the Symphony concerts. These same communications are, as the rule, pervaded by a spirit of bitterness against those critics who have felt it a matter of duty to express themselves unfavorably toward what they considered censurable in the conductor's interpretations of certain great compositions, and who have not fallen into line with those who, through ignorance or amiability, have believed it incumbent on them to admire all that the conductor does. One of the most sapient of the correspondents who have tilted against the critics, has suggested that the concerts shall be conducted by them in rotation, by way of showing how much better or worse than Mr. Nikisch they could wield the baton. The inability of any of the critics to lead an orchestra would not in anywise evidence their incompetence as critics. If my tailor sends me home a coat that is too tight under the arms, that sets awry, and is a bad fit generally, I object to his work, and refuse to accept the coat. If he should turn on me, object to my criticisms, and tell me to make a coat myself, in order to see how much better I can succeed than he had done, I should still remain unconvinced that the garment was satisfactory; should scoff at the test he suggests to me, and should inform him that, although I was not educated as a tailor, I am none the less able to tell whether my coat does or does not fit me properly. If my steak, or my chop, or my omelette is miserably cooked, I do not wish to be challenged by the cook, to whom I complain, to do my own cooking, for the purpose of showing how perfectly I can perform it. I do not feel that when I criticize the coat or the food, that I should be called upon to enter into competition with the tailor or the cook. On similar grounds, I fail to see why, when a critic objects to a misfit reading of Beethoven, or an overcooked version of Mozart, he should be asked ironically to show, baton, in hand, how those composers should be interpreted. Nor does it prove that the critic is not a true and a just critic, because he has not had practical experience as a conductor. Likewise, a conductor is not necessarily a good conductor because he is privileged to direct an orchestra. It is equally true that a critic is not necessarily an able and educated critic for no better reason than the right he enjoys to express his opinions in print. There are degrees in all things, even in the matter of conductors and critics. There are efficient and there are inefficient of both; but no critic can be deemed inefficient merely because he cannot lead an orchestra, any more than a conductor must be deemed efficient because some people think that his experienced censors are in error regarding their estimate of him. In this matter of criticism it appears to be the rule that favorable judgments are always right and unfavorable judgments are as always wrong. The musician, be he conductor or soloist, never questions the accuracy of the criticism that praises him, and always questions the truth and the honesty of the criticism that finds fault. A like order of things prevails with concert-goers in general. What they like is good, because they like it; and all criticism that is in conflict with their own is either prejudiced or incapable. The other day a music lover said to me: "Like X's criticisms. Six times out of ten they coincide with my own. He is rarely wrong." "Ah!" I replied, "he is only wrong four times out of ten; and he is wrong because it is his misfortune to fall in coinciding with you." Now it never occurred to this excellent person that the critic was possibly in the right, for he was experienced in his craft. Much more reasonable was the remark of another person, who said: "I suppose that the critics are correct; but I don't care for that. I go to a concert to be pleased, and if I am pleased it is enough for me. If I find no pleasure in the performances, it matters not to me how excellent they are. If I am gratified, I have no desire to criticize. I leave refinements of judgment to others. I am glad I am not a critic, for I am spared much discomfort, and can enjoy what makes them miserable." This at least is frank; it emphasizes the bliss of ignorance; that bliss, which possessed, makes wisdom a folly. But ignorance has its drawbacks, nevertheless, by comparison.

CHATTERER.

available, would have avoided at least one startling tuba effect; but the impressiveness of the performance was such as to make one overlook such details.

The great closing scene in "Götterdämmerung" was given with immense impressiveness, Miss Kaschoska singing the part of Brünnhilde with great dramatic power and sincerity of feeling. We cannot like Mr. Nikisch's holding back the tempo at Brünnhilde's last "Siegfried! Siegfried! Sieh! Selig grüsst dich dein Weib!" We far prefer Mr. Gericke's and Mme. Lilli Lehmann's way of ending with an impetuous rush. But this was the only flaw; singer and orchestra vied with one another in giving the grand music all its tragic majesty. The orchestral peroration on the three united themes—Valhalla-motive, Rhine-daughters'-motive, and redemption-motive was played with a clearness and expressive power that left nothing to be desired.

In these selections from the "Nibelungen" dramas the orchestra was almost complete, the only instruments lacking to make up the full quota being a third oboe and clarinet, the eighth horn, and five more harps. The Bay reuth-tubas (of which the Boston Symphony Orchestra owns a set) could not be used, their place being taken by horns, and now and then a trombone or bass-tuba. Might it not be well, though, to keep our horn-players to some extent in practice on these beautiful instruments, to meet such emergencies? It would certainly be less of a task for good horn-players to get to feel at home on them than for a clarinetist to master the saxophone, and their quality of tone in the "Nibelungen" music would be very valuable.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in D major ("Parisian"); Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica").

Wagner Heard at the Symphony.

A programme consisting exclusively of selections from the works of Richard Wagner was played by the Symphony orchestra last evening. The increased attendance at both afternoon rehearsal and evening concert and the cordial applause bestowed showed that the programme was very welcome to Symphony concert patrons.

The selections consisted of the overture to "Rienzi," prelude to act III of the "Master-singers," dance of apprentices, march of master singers and homage to Hans Sachs from the same opera; prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold," selections from the third act of "Siegfried," and the "Goetterdaemmerung" prologue, arranged by Hans Richter; Siegfried's funeral march from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Brünnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from the same opera.

The full resources of the orchestra were required for the interpretation of this programme, and the admirable manner in which every demand was met was most gratifying to the audience, and offered further evidence of the generally accepted fact that Boston has the finest symphony orchestra in the world.

The varied and highly colored harmonic effects of the brilliant overture were played with splendid spirit and expression, and the weird funeral march was given in a grandly impressive manner. The "Master-singers" numbers were also charmingly played.

Herr Richter's arrangement of the "Siegfried and Goetterdaemmerung" selections is a most interesting and harmonious work, and a more effective interpretation than that given by Director Nikisch could not be readily imagined.

In interpreting the first scene from "Das Rheingold," the orchestra had the assistance of the following vocal soloists: Miss Felicia Kaschoska as Woglinde, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch as Wellgunde, Miss Louise Leimer as Flosshilde, Mr. Heinrich Meyn as Alberich.

They all sang with intelligence and good expression, and won hearty plaudits in spite of the fact that their voices were occasionally almost drowned by the tremendous volume of tone from the big orchestra. Miss Felicia Kaschoska's singing of Brünnhilde's speech made a very favorable impression.

The last of this season's symphony concerts will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. The programme will be as follows: Mozart, symphony No. 1, in D major; Schubert, unfinished symphony; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

For the last but one of his concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, Conductor Arthur Nikisch presented a Wagner programme in which the assistance was had of Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, as vocal soloists.

The selections made from the familiar concert repertoire of music drama arrangements were as follows: Overture to "Rienzi," in D major; prelude to act 3, dance of apprentices, march of the master singers and homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master-singers of Nuernberg"; prelude and first scene from "Das Rheingold"; Siegfried passing through the fire, from "Siegfried," act 3, scene 2, and morning dawn, and Siegfried's voyage up the Rhine, from "Goetterdaemmerung," prologue; Siegfried's funeral march, from "Goetterdaemmerung," act 3, scene 2, and Brünnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Goetterdaemmerung," act 3, scene 3.

The work of the orchestra was especially fine in the "Rienzi" overture, the performance of this number arousing the audience to a grand demonstration of its appreciation; and almost equally good results were given the scenes from "The Master-singers."

Few of the excerpts from the music dramas of this composer give so little satisfaction as the scene between the Rhine daughters and Alberich, and, apart from the stage settings, the almost meaningless declamations and outcries of the singers went for little. The thankless task put upon the four singers was duly accomplished with apparently about equal satisfaction both sides the stage line.

Miss Kaschoska was somewhat overweighted by the vocal demands of the Brünnhilde declamatory number, but her delivery of its trying measure was characterized by excellent musical taste and intelligence.

The season and Mr. Nikisch's engagement ends with next Saturday's concert, when the programme will be made up of Mozart's symphony No. 1 in D major; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, and Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica."

MUSIC. Sarelle

The Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was devoted wholly to Wagner. The programme was: Overture, "Rienzi;" Prelude to Act III of "The Mastersingers;" Prelude and first scene from "The Rheingold;" "Passing through the Fire," from "Siegfried," and "Morning Dawn and Siegfried's Voyage;" Siegfried's Funeral March, and Brünnhilde's Dying Speech, from "The Twilight of the Gods." In the Rheingold scene, the singers were Miss Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. A. Nickish, Miss Louise Leimer and Mr. H. Meyn. Brünnhilde's Lament was sung by Miss Kaschoska. It was a long and rather monotonous, not to say wearisome, programme. Again was it emphasized that Wagner's music needs the scenic surroundings and the stage action for which it was written, to make it effective in the hearing. The "Rienzi" overture was given with splendid brilliancy and vigor, and in its climax with immense effectiveness. It is in music of this operatic nature that the conductor is always at home, and his reading of the overture was one of his genuine successes of the season. Both conductor and orchestra were at their very best through the concert. The singing in "The Rheingold" was not always as tuneful as it might have been, but it was never lacking in energy or clearness. The singers have little else to do than to shout. Style, color and expression were wholly out of the question. That is all in the orchestra, and if the singers make themselves heard, they do nearly all that is required of them. Miss Kaschoska has a large and admirable voice, and she sings with ease and fire. In the Brünnhilde scene she declaimed her music finely. We should like to hear her when she is called upon to do something more than scream, for she made it plain that she is an artist of excellent gifts. The audience was large and enthusiastic, but its warmest and most prolonged applause was called forth by the "Rienzi" overture. For the next and last concert of the season, the programme is: Symphony, No. 1, in D-minor, Mozart; unfinished Symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven.

CYNICISMS.

I have derived much amusement from various communications that have been made to the papers anent Mr. Nikisch's resignation as conductor of the Symphony concerts. These same communications are, as the rule, pervaded by a spirit of bitterness against those critics who have felt it a matter of duty to express themselves unfavorably toward what they considered censurable in the conductor's interpretations of certain great compositions, and who have not fallen into line with those who, through ignorance or amiability, have believed it incumbent on them to admire all that the conductor does. One of the most sapient of the correspondents who have tilted against the critics, has suggested that the concerts shall be conducted by them in rotation, by way of showing how much better or worse than Mr. Nikisch they could wield the baton. The inability of any of the critics to lead an orchestra would not in anywise evidence their incompetence as critics. If my tailor sends me home a coat that is too tight under the arms, that sets awry, and is a bad fit generally, I object to his work, and refuse to accept the coat. If he should turn on me, object to my criticisms, and tell me to make a coat myself, in order to see how much better I can succeed than he had done, I should still remain unconvinced that the garment was satisfactory; should scoff at the test he suggests to me, and should inform him that, although I was not educated as a tailor, I am none the less able to tell whether my coat does or does not fit me properly. If my steak, or my chop, or my omelette is miserably cooked, I do not wish to be challenged by the cook, to whom I complain, to do my own cooking, for the purpose of showing how perfectly I can perform it. I do not feel that when I criticize the coat or the food, that I should be called upon to enter into competition with the tailor or the cook. On similar grounds, I fail to see why, when a critic objects to a misfit reading of Beethoven, or an overcooked version of Mozart, he should be asked ironically to show, baton in hand, how those composers should be interpreted. Nor does it prove that the critic is not a true and a just critic, because he has not had practical experience as a conductor. Likewise, a conductor is not necessarily a good conductor because he is privileged to direct an orchestra. It is equally true that a critic is not necessarily an able and educated critic for no better reason than the right he enjoys to express his opinions in print. There are degrees in all things, even in the matter of conductors and critics. There are efficient and there are inefficient of both; but no critic can be deemed inefficient merely because he cannot lead an orchestra, any more than a conductor must be deemed efficient because some people think that his experienced censurers are in error regarding their estimate of him. In this matter of criticism it appears to be the rule that favorable judgments are always right and unfavorable judgments are as always wrong. The musician, be he conductor or soloist, never questions the accuracy of the criticism that praises him, and always questions the truth and the honesty of the criticism that finds fault. A like order of things prevails with concert-goers in general. What they like is good, because they like it; and all criticism that is in conflict with their own is either prejudiced or incapable. The other day a music lover said to me: "I like X's criticisms. Six times out of ten they coincide with my own. He is rarely wrong." "Ah!" I replied, "he is only wrong four times out of ten; and he is wrong because it is his misfortune to fall in coinciding with you." Now it never occurred to this excellent person that the critic was possibly in the right, for he was experienced in his craft. Much more reasonable was the remark of another person, who said: "I suppose that the critics are correct; but I don't care for that. I go to a concert to be pleased, and if I am pleased it is enough for me. If I find no pleasure in the performances, it matters not to me how excellent they are, if I am gratified, I have no desire to criticize. I leave refinements of judgment to others. I am glad I am not a critic, for I am spared much discomfort, and can enjoy what makes them miserable." This at least is frank; it emphasizes the bliss of ignorance; that bliss, which possessed, makes wisdom a folly. But ignorance has its drawbacks, nevertheless, by comparison.

CHATTERER.

NIKISCH'S SUCCESSOR.

Efforts Still Being Made to Secure the Release of Hans Richter.

A story current that Mr. Higginson of the Symphony Orchestra had sent a special envoy to Vienna to use his influence in obtaining Richter's release from the Emperor has but slender foundation. No person has been delegated for this special purpose, and the story no doubt arose from the fact that every time one of Mr. Higginson's personal friends leaves the country for a season abroad he has, and will from this time on, urge upon all such the necessity of making every effort, through Gericke and Jaher, in a sense rivals of Richter, to induce the royal favor to recognize Richter's desire to come to Boston.

Besides any advantage that might accrue to Gericke, in the event of Richter's being finally enabled to come here, there is no doubt that the warm spot he cherishes for Mr. Higginson and the orchestra would make him more than usually zealous in using his influence.

As for anybody's being sent from here on any special mission, that is not true any further than that all Mr. Higginson's friends, and he has an especially large and valuable acquaintance in Vienna, are making every effort possible to bring about the result desired.

More than one straw indicates that Mr. Nikisch and his late patron have parted on none of the best terms, and the story of the inside of the conductor's resignation, followed by his blank refusal to go upon the Western tour, may be traced more or less directly to Nikisch's intention of squeezing Mr. Higginson more than the latter would stand for the ex-conductor's services.

The orchestra is obliged to make some considerable sacrifices on account of the ex-conductor's sudden determination not to undertake the Western trip. The members were to start last evening for Canada on their way to the West, but it has been determined to have two rehearsals under Franz Kneisel, who will conduct on the Western tour, before leaving. Accordingly two dates have been cancelled in Canada.

The orchestra will play practically the same programme at all the cities on the coming tour. So that the sacrifices are twofold, pecuniary and artistic, though as to the latter it has been thought better for the reputation of the orchestra to confine itself to a limited programme rather than undertake anything that with inadequate preparation might prove disastrous.

CYNICISMS.

Mr. Otto Floersheim will be remembered in musical circles here, as a person who succeeded in having some compositions, to which he appended his name as composer and arranger, performed at our Symphony Concerts. Mr. Floersheim was formerly one of the editors of the Musical Courier of New York. For some reason or other, he ceased to occupy that position, and took up his permanent abode in Berlin, whence he writes letters to that periodical. In these letters he makes severe remarks about the music critics of this city. It is evident that he cherishes a deep-founded animosity toward them. It is not easy to blame him for that. It can hardly be expected that a man shall untate the dog, and lick the hand that chastises it. Mr. Floersheim has not yet forgotten the dreadful flaying to which the Boston critics subjected him when they exposed the hollowness of his claims to be considered a composer; when they showed, on convincing evidence, that even the instrumentation of his alleged compositions was not his own. In fact, the phenomenally pachydermatous hide of the soi-disant musician, thick as it is, was not proof against the stings of the lashings it received, and he has not yet ceased to rub his back in order to sooth the pain of his Boston castigation. A professional humbug, in common with a professional disciple of Ananias, has a very difficult road to travel; and even at the height of his success, his feeling of triumph must always be tempered by the constantly present fear that he may be found out; hence, he becomes to some extent an object of sympathy. When he is found out, he will, if he be wise, retire from the public eye; or, at least, refrain from showing that he is piqued by his unmasking. To snarl at those who have exposed him may be a very good way of manifesting his resentment; but it is no evidence of the falsehood of the charges that have been brought against him. If, instead of making faces from across the Atlantic at his Boston censors, Mr. Floersheim were to give them convincing testimony that he is the composer he pretends to be; that he is under no necessity to call on other musicians to arrange for the orchestra, what still other musicians have written or licked into shape for him, he would go far toward removing the doubts that exist here regarding his musical capacity, and would deal a far heavier blow at his detractors than he is likely to give by misrepresenting them. In his latest communication from Berlin he accuses the Boston critics of driving Mr. Gericke away. Now, it is thoroughly well known that Mr. Gericke went away because of ill-health caused by nervous prostration. He needed rest, and if he could have made an arrangement to return after the lapse of a year, he would have done so. The music critics of this city made it impossible for any more of Mr. Floersheim's alleged compositions to be performed here, but they had nothing whatever to do with Mr. Gericke's departure at the close of his five years' contract. Mr. Floersheim also charges that Mr. Nikisch has been driven from Boston by these same critics; whereas, the truth is, that if Mr. N. could have made another engagement for five years, he would have remained, willingly. On his own statement, he was never troubled by the censures of his critics here, because he never read them; and though it is but natural that Mr. Floersheim should be deeply grateful that music, to which he appended his name as composer, was performed by Mr. Nikisch, that is no reason for persistently reiterating falsehoods, or for placing a higher value on the talents of Mr. Nikisch than they are worth.

CHATTERER.

WHO WILL LEAD?

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Will He Be Weingartner, Mottl or Another?

Notes and Gossip Concerning Three Celebrities.

The question, "Who will be the successor of Mr. Nikisch?" seems to be still unanswered.

Mr. Richter must obey his Emperor. It is hard to believe the report that "Richter is a painfully lazy man, with no interest whatever in what is going on in the musical world."

It is possible, however, that he dreads the travel to which the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is subjected by his contract.

Even Mr. Nikisch, a young and presumably spry man, shudders at the thought of another visit to Chicago, and, therefore, does not hesitate to leave his employer in the lurch.

Or, perhaps, Mr. Nikisch is pricked by keen desire to touch once more the soil of his loved fatherland; and he cannot endure the thought of patriotism checked by a mere commercial detail.

PAUL FELIX WEINGARTNER.

There is natural public curiosity concerning the successor.

In certain quarters this curiosity is condemned.

It is said, and by those high in authority, that the whole affair is a private enterprise, and therefore the curiosity of the public is impertinent.

Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not an institution of eleemosynary relief.

It is true that one man had the courage and the financial resources to found the institution.

At present these concerts are supported in great part by the people who bid eagerly for seats at the yearly auction sale.

Speculators in tickets have shown a praiseworthy desire to put music on a higher plane.

Lovers of music who cannot spare the money for a seat are nevertheless admitted to Music Hall.

They are allowed a certain amount of standing room, and the softer sex is given the use of platform steps.

Surely is public curiosity legitimate when it revolves about a public thing.

If this orchestra were retained solely for the purpose of enlivening conversation in a private house—and such concerts were given this season in certain parlors in New York—then public curiosity might be regarded with reason as out of place.

Now that the arrival of Mr. Richter seems unlikely other names are mentioned, and there are rumors of offers made, digested, refused, or accepted.

The name of Weingartner, for instance, has been urged on the public attention.

And who is Weingartner?

Paul Felix Weingartner was born June 2, 1863, in Zara, Dalmatia. His father died when he was young, and the family then moved to Graz. Felix entered the gymnasium, studied music with his mother, and then became a pupil of Wilhelm Meyer. He wrote piano pieces, which were published in 1880 by Schuberth of Hamburg. Aided with a city scholarship, Weingartner, in 1881, entered the Leipsic Conservatory. He also studied philosophy at the university. In 1882 he met Liszt, who became warmly interested in him. He left Leipsic in 1883 with the "Mozart prize," and then wrote the text and music of an opera, "Sakuntala," which was first produced March 20, 1884, at Weimar, under Lassen's direction. In 1884 Weingartner appeared as an orchestral conductor in Königsberg; he then went to Dantzig, where he finished the text and music of an opera, "Malawika," produced under his direction at Munich, June 2, 1886. He was conductor at the Hamburg Stadt Theatre in 1887; in 1889 he was called to Mannheim; he was at the Frankfurt Opera House from June until September, 1890. In 1891 he was called to the opera house at Berlin and began there May 22. The performances, under his direction, of "Lohengrin," "Barber of Seville," "Carmen," "Don Giovanni," "Figaro" and "Fidelio" were highly praised, and as conductor at the Symphony concerts he won distinction by his reading of the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz, Mozart's G minor symphony and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

But his popularity was suddenly destroyed, at least for a time, by his extraordinary conduct after the failure of his opera "Genesis," first produced at Berlin, Nov. 15, 1892. The criticisms were severe. The opera was withdrawn after the second performance, which was given to an almost empty house. Mr. Weingartner then appeared in print with a letter "To whom it may concern." In it he called the public of Berlin frivolous and unable to judge of such an earnest work as "Genesis." Weingartner in his letter said that at the repetition of his opera "an empty house yawned

LOZE-HENGRIEN AT THE OPERA.
Caricature by Blass in the Pilori, Sept. 27, 1891.

at him;" whereupon the Boersen Courier remarked "Weingartner was in luck, for if the house had been well filled, a full house would have yawned at him." It was rumored that Weingartner asked Count Hochberg to relieve him of his contract as conductor. The position of first conductor at the Frankfurt Opera House was offered to him, but after a vacation trip to Italy he again appeared in Berlin, clothed and apparently in his right mind.

There are conflicting rumors now concerning Weingartner's plans. A new orchestral society at Glasgow is said to have tempted him. Weingartner has a three-year contract with the Berlin Opera House, and the Intendant made him lately a flattering offer for a life-long engagement. It was generally understood that Weingartner accepted this last offer, but Mr. Otto Floersheim, in a letter (April 4) from Berlin to the Musical Courier, makes the following statement:

"To-day the telegraph, to the great consternation of everybody, brings the news that Weingartner has signed with the Munich Royal Opera House, of which Possart now is the intendant, and that from April 1, 1896, when his Berlin contract will expire, he is to become the successor to General Director Hermann Levi, who by that time will probably retire from active service. Whether or not this officially published telegram tells the truth I cannot at this moment verify, but I hardly doubt its authenticity."

Mr. Floersheim writes as follows concerning the possibility of Weingartner's appearance here:

"Meanwhile, I learn that Col. Higginson has also been after that much sought after young man, and that very tempting financial offers have been made him if he wants to be the immediate successor to Arthur Nikisch, Esq. Of this, however, there could be as little question as of the acceptance of the Glasgow engagement, as Weingartner is still bound for three years by contract to the Royal Opera House. I do not think that Col. Higginson is exactly the man to be a party to a breach of contract, even if Weingartner for the sake of the almighty dollar had been willing to break his Berlin engagement, a fact which I very much doubt, however."

There is no doubt, however, of this: that Weingartner has regained his popularity in Berlin, so far as the public at large is concerned, although there are excellent musicians who protest against the occasional musical eccentricities of this restless, nervous man. Weingartner was married Nov. 5, 1891, to Miss Juillerat-Chasseur, a woman of French Switzerland, whom he met in Mannheim. He has written the operas above mentioned, songs and a suite, dedicated to von Buelow, for string orchestra.

Felix Mottl has been named as the possible successor of Mr. Nikisch, and it is now stated that he has received a definite offer.

Mottl enjoys fame as a conductor of opera, and as an authority on the subject of Wagner he is known throughout Europe.

But he is not considered a great or distinguished leader of symphony concerts.

His appearance in Berlin as a temporary conductor of the Philharmonic concert was a distinct and acknowledged failure.

He directed the sixth subscription concert the ninth of last January, and such was his reception by public and press that he was reluc-

THE NEW SIEGE OF PARIS IN 1891.
(An unpublished sketch by Moloch.)

tant to appear at the ninth concert; he conducted, however, but he did not redeem himself, if the reports of that performance are worthy of belief.

It is possible that his physical condition had much to do with this fiasco. There was a report not long ago that overwork had affected his mind, and that he only found relief by a sojourn in an asylum.

He was able to marry, however, and Dec. 17, 1891, he wedded Henriette Standhartner, an opera singer. The wedding was at Vienna; the witnesses were Hans Richter and the baritone, Reichmann; Siegfried Wagner is said to have been present.

There was talk at the time of Richter's retirement from the Vienna Opera House and Mottl's succession. It was only talk, and Mottl returned to Carlsruhe.

Mottl is at least a man of catholic taste, and he has offered the hospitality of his opera house to such French composers as Berlioz and Chabrier.

It is a singular commentary on the condition of music in Boston that the name of Lamoureux, one of the most distinguished conductors in Europe, has not been seriously considered.

Charles Lamoureux was born at Bordeaux, September 28, 1834. He entered the Paris Conservatory in 1850 and studied the violin under Girard. In 1854 he took the first prize for violin playing. He studied composition with Tolbecque, Leborne and Chauvet. He then taught, and he founded a string quartette. A member of the Conservatory orchestra, he became its second conductor. Having traveled extensively in Germany and England, Lamoureux became acquainted with choral works of great proportions, and in 1873, unaided, and at his own expense, he founded a society called the "Harmonie Sacrée." Under his direction "The Messiah" was given for the first time in France, Dec. 19, 1873. Other works given were Bach's "Passion according to Matthew; Handel's "Judas Maccabeus;" Gounod's "Gallia" and Massenet's "Eve."

Here Lamoureux first showed the qualities that distinguished his leadership: "Scrupulously careful in detail; patient in the preparation; knowledge and musical feeling combined, and to a rare degree; precision and authority joined to enthusiasm; control over men and the ability to communicate personal emotion to others."

In 1875 Lamoureux was conductor of the great Festival at Rouen in honor of Boieldieu. In 1876 Carvalho made him conductor at the Opera Comique. In 1877 he succeeded Deldevez as first conductor at the Paris Opera. He resigned this position Dec. 21, 1879, on account of a dispute with Vaucorbeil, the director, concerning the tempo of a movement in "Don Giovanni." He founded, Oct. 23, 1881, the Nouveaux Concerts, which under his leadership are a musical feature not only of Paris, but of Europe. He was the first to introduce Brahms's sextets into France. At the head of the Wagnerian movement in France he gave the first performance of "Lohengrin" in France May 3, 1887, at the Eden Theatre. He also was conductor at the performance of "Lohengrin" in September, 1891, at the Paris Opera.

The programmes of the concerts given by Lamoureux this season included works by Brahms, Wagner, Bruch, Dvorak, Grieg, Tchaikovsky, Schumann, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber, Liszt, Rubinstein, Ewstafield, Berlioz, Massenet, Bizet, Saint-Saens, Boelmann, Vincent d'Indy, Chabrier, Charpentier and Chevillard.

It is true that the names of Boelman and Chevillard are unknown outside of France.

It is also true that Lamoureux passed over the compositions of Humperdink, Riemschneider and P. Scharwenka.

PHILIP HALE.

WHY NIKISCH GOES.

The Director Himself Tells One Story and Rumor Tells Another.

It has been currently reported that the resignation of Director Nikisch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a hasty act, and that he repents having accepted the offer of the Opera House in Buda Pesth. The story is thus told:

When Mr. Nikisch received the offer from Buda Pesth he went to see Mr. Higginson, the patron of the symphony concerts. He told him of the offer, and said that if a five years' contract were given him he would remain here. Incidentally it may be remarked that Mr. Nikisch is said to get a salary of $9000 a season here, while the Buda Pesth position is worth about $4500. The low cost of living, however, and the many professional advantages easily consume the difference. Mr. Higginson said that he would consider the matter, whereupon Mr. Nikisch acted as if he were insulted, expressing his opinions not mildly, and, to cap it all, he immediately cabled his acceptance to the Hungarian house. It is this action which, it is said, he repents. Subsequently, when the arrangements for the Western trip were being made, he requested extra remuneration. It was refused him, and this, rumor has it, is why the director of the Symphony Orchestra will not accompany it to Chicago.

A Journal reporter interviewed Mr. Nikisch yesterday afternoon, and the director said: "The only reason why I am not going West with the orchestra is that my health is not good. I am completely exhausted. That is really the reason. I intend to go abroad in a week or two. I will go first to Buda Pesth, and then take a rest at some place in the mountains."

FRANZ KNEISEL.

A Worthy Successor to Conductor Nikisch—Ambitious, Able and a Boston Favorite.

Franz Kneisel as Nikisch's successor. That is what musical Boston is talking about today. The Chicago trip was, to some extent at least, a test, and he has been successful.

He has shown ability to direct, and that was all that was needed, as his qualifications in all other ways are well known. He is a thorough musician, young, ambitious and painstaking in his work.

One by one the foreign conductors of note have been considered and, for one reason or another, have been given up. Now Mr. Higginson begins to look around at home, and the first man his eyes light upon is the ambitious and able young first violinist of the orchestra.

Prof. Louis C. Elson said yesterday regarding the appointment of Mr. Kneisel:—

"While Mr. Kneisel may not sail on the same level with the great European conductors like Richter, he is nevertheless a safe man for the position and would at least keep the orchestra from deteriorating. If the suitable man in Europe cannot be obtained, Mr. Kneisel is the person here to look to."

"As it is, the great conductors abroad are few in number and some of them are not available."

"Mr. Kneisel has had more experience in leading the Symphony Orchestra than people usually give him credit for. Under Mr. Gericke he very frequently had it in neighboring towns, and now has more preparation for the task than Mr. Henschel had when he took charge of it."

"Mr. Kneisel would be a very conservative conductor. His study has been largely in the classical vein, but his half a dozen seasons' experience with two conductors of different ideas of music has given him a varied knowledge."

"But his programmes would probably be after the Gericke pattern."

"I think that Mr. Kneisel would be a careful drill-master. His solo work on the violin may be taken as a type of what his orchestral work would be; that is, without a flaw or a blemish, but, on the whole, not more exciting than that of Mr. Gericke. Under Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler could readily become the concert master of the orchestra."

WHY NOT KNEISEL?

The decision of Hans Richter that he cannot leave Vienna to assume the directorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is greatly regretted by all lovers of music. It seems to be a final refusal, however, and there seems to be nothing for the management to do but choose somebody else.

A keen-witted Massachusetts editor remarked the other day that it seemed a pity if a conductor could not be found at home. It is stated this morning that the position has been offered to Felix Weingartner, the leading opera and concert conductor of Berlin. The Richter incident, however, indicates that another disappointment may result, for Berlin may be as selfish as Vienna. The suggestion that we look at home is therefore a sensible one.

Looking at home is equivalent to looking at one man. That man is Franz Kneisel, already a member of the orchestra and its concert-master. Every attendant at the Symphony concerts is acquainted with his extraordinary attainments as a musician. The Kneisel Quartet is a splendid evidence of his genius in the field of chamber music. Those who have seen him act as a substitute conductor at the Symphony are loud in their praise of his work. It is stated that the playing of the orchestra under his baton instantly recalls performances when directed by Gericke.

We believe the suggestion of Kneisel's name will be sufficient to secure its advocacy by many cultured musicians. Boston has produced many great artists, why should she not be the field of a great musical conductor's initial triumphs?

Journal MUSICAL MATTERS. Apr 28 93
Mr. Arthur Nikisch's Abrupt Resignation—The Opera.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch will appear as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the last time tomorrow evening, although the season covered by his contract with Mr. Higginson does not end until May 20. It was understood that Mr. Nikisch would accompany the orchestra on its western tour beginning next Monday, and he had made the programmes to be given in the different cities.

By the terms of his contract Mr. Nikisch had the right, under certain conditions, to terminate his engagement at any time. Within a few days he gave notice that he would not make the western tour, giving as his reason fear of sickness. He made a proposition, however, that under certain conditions he would finish the season. These conditions were inadmissible and were declined.

It is probable that the remaining concerts will be conducted by Concertmaster Kneisel.

ARTHUR NIKISCH.

He Chats About His Life in This Country.

His Opinions About Boston's Musical Tastes—American Development in the Arts—Independent Judgment a National Trait—His Acquaintances Have Been Most Enjoyable.

To obtain an interview with a busy man like Arthur Nikisch, and to do this in the last week of the famous capelmeister's presence in Boston, demanded no small amount of strategy; yet a HERALD man proved equal to the occasion, and was rewarded for his persistence with a delightful conversation, in the course of which Mr. Nikisch talked freely of his musical and social experiences in the United States. Since coming to this country, nearly four years ago, he has acquired remarkable fluency in the use of English, and his occasional interjection of a German word when he wishes to be unusually precise serves but to increase one's surprise at his proficiency in what is to him a wholly foreign language. To say that the interview was quite offhand, with no fore-knowledge of the questions that were to be put to him, is only doing justice to the conductor.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH.

Mr. Nikisch, having been caught at Music Hall in a pause between rehearsals, was first led to speak of his musical experiences in this country, and to compare them with his recollections of Europe. "It is usually supposed," said he, "that the European public, through familiarity with concerts of all kinds for more than a century, possess a higher critical faculty than is possible to Americans, however sympathetic. But this idea is not at all borne out by my own observations in musical countries like Germany and Austria. It is true that Americans have not enjoyed the same musical opportunities as Europeans, but if I were to be asked to award the palm for genuine power of appreciation and critical judgment I should not hesitate—notwithstanding the drawback to which I have referred—to share it equally with the people of this country and of Europe. It is sometimes said that the European cities have more concerts provided for them than cities of like size in the United States, but

This Again Is an Error.

Take the case of Vienna, which, with its suburbs, is a city of over a million and a half of inhabitants. Well, that important centre has only eight symphony concerts and six or eight choral concerts in the course of a year. That is very small, indeed, when you compare it with Boston, a city which, though it has only 500,000 inhabitants, is able to support annually not only 48 symphony concerts, but many miscellaneous concerts beside. This shows that, in American cities like Boston, a musical need exists which must be supplied. Of course there are people who will tell you that people go to your concerts because they want to be in the fashion—because they want to be seen where Mr. So-and-So and Mrs. So-and-So are in the habit of appearing. But this is a very superficial explanation of the big concert audiences. That the people like the music they go to hear is self-evident, and I tell you as a musician that listening to and following classical music is no child's play. It is the last material in the world which anybody would choose pour passer le temps. You can't get people to sit it through merely that they may elbow some local leader of fashion and be counted 'in the swim.' It requires not only an educated ear, but the most sustained attention; and the way these audiences behave during a concert shows that they are following the music with critical intelligence and sympathy. A few may indeed go without either desire or capacity to appreciate what is provided for them, but these are in such a small minority, as compared with the great bulk of the audiences, that they may be left out of account. The very eagerness of the people to get tickets—shown by the way in which they will wait for hours, if need be, for the privilege of purchasing a ticket—is itself sufficient to prove that mental appetite for good music, if it may be so called, lies at the bottom of the popular rush to these great musical entertainments.

"It is said again," said Mr. Nikisch, "that the Americans brought their musical tastes with them from the other side of the Atlantic, and that a large proportion of concertgoers are in fact music loving foreigners. I dispute both these positions. It is true that native Americans brought a good many things over with them when they founded this republic, but they could not bring a musical taste, which had not then been developed. All the great except those of Vienna and Leipzig, are not more than from 15 to 20 years old. Even the Vienna conservatory, the oldest of the number, has this year celebrated its 50th anniversary. So that musical development in Europe is a very recent affair, and people who emigrated to this country more than 50 or 60 years ago could not have brought with them any of the musical culture and capacity which they have since displayed. We must, therefore, treat America, in musical matters, as a young community which has educated itself in a large measure independently of Europe."

Conservatories of Europe.

Here Mr. Nikisch was asked as to the relative capacity of Europeans and Americans for appreciating the musical structure of difficult compositions, and the question opened up a phase of the subject in which he has always been deeply interested. "It struck me as something remarkable," said he, "that compositions which are not very easy to grasp, by reason of their complexity, were always appreciated more quickly here than on the other side of the water. I have observed this especially in the case of the symphonies of Brahms. They are compositions of complex character, and I made it an especial point to bring them out with the utmost clearness, so that it might be easy to understand them. They were quickly grasped and followed with delight by your American audiences. A few years ago, while summering in Europe, I met Brahms and told him what an immense success with the public his first symphony had had in Boston. He was quite surprised to hear it—pleased as well as surprised—and remarked: 'I regard what you tell me as marvellous, for last year the same symphony was played here in Vienna, where I have so many personal friends, and where I have lived so many years; yet there were not more than a score of people in the hall. Of course,' he added, 'the performance was not very good.'

"Another thing," said the speaker, "which confirms me in the high estimate I place upon musical taste here, is the way in which Boston judges for itself in musical matters. Some time ago a company of artists or singers came over here with quite a European reputation. They were heralded loudly and advertised in the most lavish manner, yet when they got here they had no success at all."

The Boston People

simply found out that they were not what they had been announced to be. That showed critical taste and power of independent judgment. In addition to this, the Boston people, and Americans generally, as I have noticed in my tour through the country, are remarkably wide in their musical tastes. I have seen the same audiences on one night applaud the modern music of Wagner and Liszt, and on the next enjoy just as heartily the compositions of Mozart, Haydn, Schubert and Beethoven. I noted during my journeys in the United States that in the smaller centres of population modern music, like that of Wagner, always makes the greatest hit. There is a reason for this. When people, after being absorbed in business cares all the day, go rather late in the evening to a concert, the exciting and intense music of Wagner stirs them up, while the older classical music needs a more contemplative frame of mind to do it justice. At the same time these smaller towns and cities which like Wagner so well are also capable of the greatest enthusiasm for the performances of the classical school. I cannot say that there was any marked difference in the attitude of my audiences in various parts of the country. In some places there was a little less enthusiasm, in others a little more. But altogether my trip was very pleasant and gratifying. During the last four years I and Mrs. Nikisch have met a great many very pleasant and very kind people, and we shall always look back with the greatest pleasure upon our experiences while in America. Mrs. Nikisch herself never supposed that in so short a time she could come into such delightful, friendly relationships with so many charming people. Our experiences have proved to us that Americans are a most hospitable people. We were treated everywhere with the greatest courtesy, and with a heartiness which captivated us. Our own people at home, the Austrians and Hungarians, are also very hospitable and kind-hearted, but we lived some time in northern Germany, where the manners of the people cold and stiff, and after our experiences with them, our reception in America was to us most surprising and pleasing in its character. Boston is, perhaps, a shade cooler than New York or Philadelphia, but when you get accustomed to this you feel how hearty, enthusiastic and appreciative the people are. In a city like Boston you know that you are playing for a musical people, and a little more or less handclapping makes no difference so far as encouragement is concerned. It has been enough for me to see the crowd at the doors eager to get in to know that the public liked it. If they hadn't liked it they wouldn't have come." The next subject broached bore on Mr. Nikisch's

296

Observations, as a European.
regarding American customs and social life generally in the United States. The conductor does not at all assent to the idea that the American has no time for anything except making money. He has noticed that, instead of being wholly absorbed in business, Americans give a remarkably large part of their leisure to art, science, music and educational work, much of it altogether unremunerative. "One thing," said he, "struck me especially and it is that rich people here do not end their lives in laziness. In the old country when a man has acquired a competence he goes out of his business and lives a life of leisure for the rest of his days. Here men do not cease work when they become millionaires; they consider it a duty to continue active until physically incapacitated. When a Frenchman, for example, has saved £20,000, or thereabouts, he goes out of business and takes it easy; when an American gets rich, he regards it as a duty to go on working just as long as he remains strong and healthy. I regard this as a great virtue, and not at all as a thing to be condemned. People who leave off active life in the European manner become weakened in both their physical and mental powers."

"I have noticed another fact of your social condition," Mr. Nikisch went on to say, "and that is that there is much less poverty among you than there is in Europe. This strikes a foreigner the moment he reaches your shores, and it is particularly evident in your large cities. Your institutions in the new world seem to rest on a much more solid foundation than do ours in the old. The average people of this country are much better off than the common people of Europe. I was much surprised at the number of people in this country who possess property. This state of well being, which prevails all through the United States, as I have had occasion to observe, is an element of great importance in the creation and maintenance of musical taste. All moderately well to do people in this country can afford to attend concerts and thus encourage musical enterprise. On the other side, the cultivation and satisfaction of musical tastes is enormously expensive. In the Leipzig Gewandhaus, for example, it costs 3 marks to get even standing room at a concert, while the lowest price for a seat is 5 marks. Now when you bear in mind that 3 marks is practically $3 of American money, and that a Leipzig laborer earns on an average no more than 50 marks a month, you will understand how impossible it is for the working people of Germany to attend these expensive concerts."

Here Mr. Nikisch spoke of the comparative position of women in American and in European society. "On the average," said he, "I have found

More Cultivated Women in the United States than in Europe. I mean by 'cultivated' those women with whom it is easier to talk on serious subjects. Of course, there are exceptions. There are undoubtedly many highly cultivated women who pursue serious studies in all the principal countries of Europe, but, as an observer, I should say that the women whom you meet in society here have in general a more scientific education than women on the other side of the water. I have not been in England, but in the countries I know they do not seem to care much for scientific education in women. The German, Austrian and Hungarian women are much better housekeepers. The American women, as a rule, do not possess this capacity, and Americans do not seem to care for it in their women. But in Germany and Austria education is largely directed to giving women a capacity for housekeeping, so that a married man need never come home and find his cook gone and his wife unable at a pinch to prepare his dinner. Under that system the children are wonderfully well cared for, and everything in the house is kept in perfect order. In the old countries they try to make each woman, whatever else it may be her destiny to learn, a perfect housekeeper—a good mother for her children, a good wife for her husband. And, of course," added Herr Nikisch, with a merry twinkle in his eye, "that is very convenient for the husband. What I mean is that the women over there are not so entertaining in society as are American women, and the reason is that they have been educated more to shine in the home. In music the European women take about the same interest as do the women here. The last topic touched on by Mr. Nikisch was the newspapers. "On the average," said he, "they have treated me very well. Some of them did not like my manner of playing. Whether it was artistic or personal antagonism, I did not allow it to trouble me. I got the impression that in this respect American newspapers are very much like the newspapers in Europe. We are all of us human beings; we all of us have our personal feelings, and to do a man full justice is not easy. But I was never disturbed by anything written against me. I went my own way and Tried to Do My Best.

But in another respect the European journals are very slow compared with the newspapers in America. I have taken great interest in American politics, especially in the last presidential election, as well as in some local contests, and I have had plenty of opportunities for observing how enterprising your newspapers are, and how quickly the news is reported. Everybody can find in an American paper something to interest him, and gets an account of events in a few minutes, or at most a few hours, after they have happened." Here Mr. Nikisch told a story to illustrate his point. There is a Leipzig lady whose father lives at New Britain, Ct., and when Nobili shot at the Emperor Wilhelm in Berlin, one afternoon, the news of the attempt was received by the American citizen at New Britain half a day earlier than it reached Leipzig, which is only 2½ hours' railway ride from Berlin. And this failure of the German press, Mr. Nikisch explained, with gusto, was due, not to any press censorship forbidding the publication of the news, but simply to the laziness of the Leipzig journalists, who were too sleepy-headed to get out a special edition, and did not report the occurrence till the next morning. In contrast with this kind of journalism the speaker pointed to the enterprise of the Boston HERALD, which enabled him, on the occasion of the recent great fire, to read a report of it only a few minutes after he had seen the engines on their way to quench the flames.

Mr. Nikisch finally spoke of his forthcoming journey to Buda-Pesth, the scene of his future labors, and through the HERALD man gave a regretful farewell to his large circle of friends and well wishers in Boston. He leaves this city tomorrow, and on May 11 sails for Europe on the Columbia of the Hamburg line.

WHY RICHTER WON'T COME

Boston's Symphony Must Wait a Few Years Yet.

Enthusiastic Austrians Won't Hear of Leader's Departure.

Disappointed, as He Wants to Make America His Home of Adoption.

A despatch from Vienna, giving the reasons why Herr Richter cannot come to Boston as conductor of the Symphony orchestra, says:

The affair has been attended by long and intricate negotiations. Repeated efforts have been made during some years past to induce Herr Richter to permanently leave Austria. On credible information it can be stated that, among other invitations, he has had a standing offer from the Boston Symphony orchestra ever since Mr. Higginson brought that superb organization into existence.

Finally, Herr Richter yielded to the inducements held out to him, and thought he saw his way clear to the acceptance of a transatlantic engagement. But when the news of his desire to go to Boston leaked out in Vienna last week, there was great consternation among the Austrian public. The authorities were intensely annoyed, and there is good reason to believe that the Emperor himself offered strenuous objections to Herr Richter's proposed departure from his post.

Jealousy, both professional and national, had long been operative to Herr Richter's discomfort. On the one hand were those who, for personal reasons, resented the deserved honors everywhere heaped upon the greatest orchestral conductor of the times, and who were not averse to employing court means to prevent him from acquiring fortune and further fame.

When the news got abroad that he actually had decided to go to Boston, and to leave Vienna this spring, the forces of personal jealousy and national pride combined to discourage his design and to turn him back. Every sort of pressure was put upon the directors of the Imperial Opera to induce them to insist absolutely on the letter of the contract, which still has four years to run.

The matter was the topic of the day in Vienna, and was discussed with all the eagerness of a political crisis. Richter's house was besieged by journalists, but to none of them would he grant an audience. His refusals were due not only to his well-known natural shyness, but also to the fact that he feared lest an utterance on his part would prejudice the directors of the Opera, intensify public feeling and offend the Emperor.

The present complications irritate him and he feels keenly disappointed. He had set his heart on going to America.

On Saturday of last week, when the Vienna public really thought he would go to Boston, they crowded the great hall where it was supposed he was making his last appearance at the Philharmonic concerts in the city. He conducted Beethoven's ninth symphony. The emotions of the moment overmastered the excited thousands and they gave him a superb ovation. The huge audience stood and cheered the great leader. They were wild with enthusiasm. They piled the stage high with flowers.

He is forced to remain, and Vienna again turns out to greet him. Nevertheless, Vienna has been hard upon him. He has in charge the music of the Emperor's chapel concerts, the Philharmonic society's concerts, and the direction of the orchestra of the Imperial Opera. These exacting duties, all combined, yield him a yearly income of less than six months' direction of the Boston Symphony concerts alone would bring to him.

It may surprise many to learn that from the Imperial Austrian Opera this eminent man only receives $2000 a year, though of course his other labors at least double this income. Richter gives occasional concerts in London and elsewhere, but these make too heavy a demand upon him when added to his regular labors.

But the fact is that Richter's ambition is to abandon all work except the conducting of a grand symphony orchestra. In this his forte lies, and the Boston position would be supremely congenial to his tastes and talents. Under his control the Boston orchestra would unquestionably become the finest in the world.

It is still Richter's hope to lead that orchestra some day. It is his settled intention to live in America and become an American. He makes no concealment of this deep-seated wish. When he is free to go he will be in the prime of his strength.

MUSIC HALL AWAITS A PURCHASER.

Colonel Higginson Thinks that the Stockholders Will Not Refuse any Reasonable Offer. Mar 20/93

Music Hall may practically be considered as on the market, and it is said by the owners that any reasonable offer is not likely to be rejected. The hall is not all that it should be in many respects, but its central location and retirement from noisy thoroughfares are features greatly in its favor. Should the proposed cross-town street from north to south be run through it would carry Music Hall into oblivion, and with such a possible fate pending the owners are not anxious to continue much longer a piece of property which they assert is not a paying investment. Even with the prospect of increased business for the remainder of this season and perhaps next, owing to the burning of Tremont Temple, which leaves Music Hall the monopoly, the owners are none the less anxious to dispose of their interests in the property. Colonel Henry L. Higginson, who represents the owners, said today that although he had not broached the subject of sale to the other stockholders directly, yet he did not doubt that a fair offer would be accepted. The subject of a site for another hall, should the old one be sold, has always been a perplexing one, and Colonel Higginson says that he is no nearer a solution of the problem today than he was when it was first propounded.

NIKISCH'S FINAL WORD.

He Denies That There Has Been a Breach of Contract—His Rights.

Considering the proverbial taciturnity of Mr. Henry L. Higginson and the domestic inclinations of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, the current stories touching the conversation, actions and general behavior of the patron of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the ex-conductor of the same during the last few moments which they officially spent together are plentiful. The latest ran thus:

In the contract which Mr. Nikisch signed four years ago was a clause which read that a sum of money (the exact amount was variously stated) should be forfeited if he should break it, i. e., if he should terminate his engagement unexpectedly. According to the chief narrators of this story, Mr. Higginson considered the undue haste and short notice of Mr. Nikisch equivalent to a breach of contract, and gave notice of a desire to receive the forfeited sum. He even went further. He said that if the sum was not paid freely he would sue the director for $5000.

The peculiar interest about this report—which has a truthful mist about it—is that it enables the Journal to settle all discussion. A reporter related the foregoing story to Mr. Nikisch Monday afternoon, and in answer was made this statement: "I have broken no contract. There was no such thing as a sum forfeit in the contract. The provisions of the contract gave me the right to terminate my engagement at any time, but on a condition that I should pay a certain sum. I never have nor never will break a contract."

Then the reporter spoke of the rumored intention of Mr. Higginson to sue him. In answer, Mr. Nikisch took from his pocket a large sheet of paper, on which was neatly typewritten an acknowledgment of the receipt of $5000, and also of the honorable termination of the engagement according to the contract of December, 1888. It was signed by Henry L. Higginson, and bore the date of April 29.

"That settles it, does it not?" remarked the conductor. "I paid that sum last Saturday, as you see, and did it to save my health and my life. That is all." So be it.

Mr. Nikisch has exhibited to a reporter a typewritten acknowledgment of the receipt from him by Colonel Henry L. Higginson of $5000, and also of the honorable termination of the engagement according to the contract of December, 1888. It was signed by Henry L. Higginson, and bore the date of April 30. "That settles it, does it not?" remarked the conductor to the reporter. "I paid that sum last Saturday, as you see, and did it to save my health and my life. That is all." Mr. Nikisch also remarked: "I have broken no contract. There was no such thing as a sum forfeit in the contract. The provisions of the contract gave me the right to terminate my engagement at any time, but on a condition that I should pay a certain sum. I never have nor never will break a contract." Whatever it may be called, this sacrifice of $5000 is to be added to the loss of $1000 in salary that would have accrued in the remaining three weeks of the orchestra's season, and the $2000 bonus that Colonel Higginson has always given his conductors at the close of each year's work.

THE WONDERFULLY FAR SEEING newspaper correspondent at Vienna who stated so positively that Hans Richter was coming to Boston, sure, no matter what his superiors at the Imperial Opera might say, now sends word that the great conductor talks in this fashion: "I am filled with the deepest regret at my inability to accept the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but I see no way out of the difficulty. I must stay in Vienna four years longer, as the emperor himself has said that I shall not be released. I cannot go to Boston as one who broke his contract." The correspondent has learned what was known by several persons here and what should be taken for granted by any intelligent man living in Vienna and knowing aught of the discipline that pervades every institution in which the Austrian Government has a hand, that the Boston contract had a clause stipulating that it would not be valid unless Richter obtained his release from the Vienna engagement. More grievous, however, than the discomfiture of the enterprising journalist, is the hard fact that Mr. Richter cannot come. The symphony concerts will go on, just the same, and the public may feel unbounded confidence that an efficient captain will control the band. But it would have been a great satisfaction and a powerful impetus as well to have Hans Richter in command of the Symphony Orchestra.

WHO WILL LEAD

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Now That Nikisch is to Go Back to Europe?

Other Musical Matters of Interest.

Now that Mr. Nikisch's departure is assured, there is an impatient desire on the part of the musical public to know who will succeed to the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is no means, however, of satisfying this desire, for, if there is a man in the world able to keep his own counsel, that man is Mr. Henry L. Higginson.

I often wonder if the musical public really appreciates the privileges it enjoys nowadays, and correspondingly realizes that this enjoyment arises largely through the generosity and nobility of purpose on Mr. Higginson's part, and that, in the organizing and supporting of the now famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, it owes a debt of gratitude for the opportunities his munificence has offered.

Apropos of this liberality upon Mr. Higginson's part let me remark that the opinion, generally, of the public interested, is that the orchestra, which at first was a matter of outgo and the cause of a handsome loss each season, is now a paying institution. This opinion rests upon the impression that the large premiums paid at the auction sales of the Boston series render a handsome profit over the expense incurred in carrying through the 24 rehearsals and concerts. But these Boston concerts are only a part of the work of the orchestra, which performs in many other cities at intervals throughout the season, and goes on an extended tour through the West each spring, at the close of the Boston series of concerts.

The question naturally arises "Why does Mr. Higginson send his orchestra abroad if it is done at a loss?" There are two reasons: first, Mr. Higginson desires that other communities shall have the benefit of his beneficence; and secondly, if this great body of players is to be kept together, it must be employed.

In order that the musicians shall realize a suitable income the season is still further prolonged in their behalf in the giving of the Promenade concerts or "Pops" at the Music Hall during June and a part of July, when, regardless of the refreshments sold, there is still a loss of no small amount. When the generous spirit of Mr. Higginson's enterprise is considered one heartily wishes that this opinion entertained by the public were true, and it would be gratifying to know that the orchestra is now self-supporting. But when one looks the facts in the face and carefully counts the cost, it is easy to find that each season a sum of not less than $0,000 is required over and above all receipts to pay the loss incurred. I should say that it would be more, rather than less, that amount. In the earlier seasons the loss must have been double the above amount each year. Now these concerts have been in existence nine seasons at the completion of the present one, and it is the writer's opinion that during this time the loss complete will figure up to nearly $250,000, a large expense for one individual to assume. If it is taken into consideration that with each succeeding season there must always exist a loss of $10,000 or more, the reader will then realize the liberality of Mr. Higginson's generous and courageous impulses, and must regard him as a noble benefactor to the musical public and the cause of art, for his undertaking has no parallel in the world, it being always remembered that it is not a government, a rich institution, a syndicate of wealthy gentlemen, but on the contrary the generosity of one individual that assumes this great and expensive responsibility. When the above facts are realized the inquiry naturally arises, "Will Mr. Higginson continue to carry this burden?"

Without possessing any knowledge of Mr. Higginson's future intentions, but by drawing conclusions from what he has already shown in this direction, we unhesitatingly answer, "Yes, he will continue to bear the loss, and with a noble and generous spirit, also, for he did not put his hand to the plough to look back." A man of Mr. Higginson's large business capacity can approximate the cost of such an undertaking as these concerts, and quite closely, also; he decides that he can afford to indulge his generosity to this extent, and he resolutely carries out his intentions. There will be no wavering, either, upon his part, and should the hand of fate remove him from an earthly existence (long may he live to enjoy his means), it would probably be found that sufficient provision has been made in his will for a perpetual existence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I base my opinion wholly on my faith in the nobleness of Mr. Higginson's purpose, the integrity of his intention and his financial ability to sustain his magnanimous impulses.

Concerning the successor of Mr. Nikisch we repeat that as yet no one has been able to ascertain who has been selected. Undoubtedly some one has been approached to accept the position. It is generally understood that Mr. Nikisch's intention to resign was of comparatively recent date, and coming upon Mr. Higginson suddenly he has been left somewhat in the lurch, so to speak, especially if, as the impression prevails, that Mr. Nikisch's term of contract would not expire until the end of next season. It has also been rumored that Mr. Nikisch wished to be re-engaged for a term of five years, but that Mr. Higginson would not entertain the proposition, so Seidl having refused the offer from Buda-Pesth and the position being then tendered Nikisch, the latter accepted it at once and resigned his position in Boston. It is also rumored that Nikisch will go immediately the Boston concerts are finished, and not remain to complete the season by come on the Western tour with the orchestra.

300

Of course we know nothing of the truth of these rumors, but if the latter one is true, it would seem at first thought to be hardly fair towards his employer. Upon second thought, however, it would matter little, for it is the orchestra, and not the conductor, that has gained precedence in the West. Mr. Gericke established the reputation of the orchestra years ago. Now, if necessary, Mr. Kneisel can assume the baton at a moment's notice and, in my opinion, show better results at once than have been gained during Nikisch's connection with the orchestra. So, should Nikisch deem it advisable to go abroad before the season is over, the reputation of the orchestra will not suffer in the least thereby, but on the contrary something in artistic excellence would be gained under Kneisel's conducting.

But the question is, who is coming next season? Well, when Mr. Higginson has settled the matter he will frankly give the public the desired information, and not until then. Let us hope that it will be Wilhelm Gericke. In such a case it will not be an experimental conductor that will preside over the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. WARREN DAVENPORT.

Nikisch's Successor.

Boston, Mass., April 4.—Special Telegram—The stories that were given to the public in Boston and New York yesterday, that Hans Richter, director of the opera at Vienna, had been engaged to succeed Arthur Nikisch as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are stamped by Colonel Higginson as false. He says that no contract has yet been entered into with any one. There is only one man who has anything to do with procuring a leader for this orchestra, and that is Colonel Higginson, and when he has found the right man for the place, and the agreements are signed then the name of the new leader will be announced.

In the meantime the Boston public may rest assured that Mr. Nikisch's successor will be an able man whoever he may be. It is argued that inasmuch as Mr. Richter has recently refused an offer for a tour in this city with a guarantee of $1000 a night, he is not likely to accept any position commanding a salary of from $5000 to $8000 per annum. Then, again, the hard-and-fast rules of the Vienna opera would only allow Mr. Richter four weeks to fill his engagement at the Chicago Exposition and return to his duties in Austria. Should he retire from the opera now he would lose his pension to which two more years of service would entitle him, so it is hardly probable that Mr. Richter will be the man to lead the symphonies next season.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.

SYMPHONY No. 31, in D major. "Parisian."

- I. Adagio. D major. Allegro. D major.
- II. Andante. G major.
- III. Finale: Presto. D major.

SCHUBERT.

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor.

- I. Allegro moderato. B minor.
- II. Andante con moto. E major.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major. "Eroica." op. 55.

- I. Allegro con brio. E flat major.
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. C minor.
- III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. E flat major.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto. E flat major.

300
going on the Western tour with the orchestra.

Of course we know nothing of the truth of these rumors, but if the latter one is true, it would seem at first thought to be hardly fair towards his employer. Upon second thought, however, it would matter little, for it is the orchestra, and not the conductor, that has gained precedence in the West. Mr. Gericke established the reputation of the orchestra years ago. Now, if necessary, Mr. Kneisel can assume the baton at a moment's notice and, in my opinion, show better results at once than have been gained during Nikisch's connection with the orchestra. So, should Nikisch deem it advisable to go abroad before the season is over, the reputation of the orchestra will not suffer in the least thereby, but on the contrary something in artistic excellence would be gained under Kneisel's conducting.

But the question is, who is coming next season? Well, when Mr. Higginson has settled the matter he will frankly give the public the desired information, and not until then. Let us hope that it will be Wilhelm Gericke. In such a case it will not be an experimental conductor that will preside over the affairs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. WARREN DAVENPORT.

Nikisch's Successor.

BOSTON, Mass., April 4.—Special Telegram—The stories that were given to the public in Boston and New York yesterday, that Hans Richter, director of the opera at Vienna, had been engaged to succeed Arthur Nikisch as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are stamped by Colonel Higginson as false. He says that no contract has yet been entered into with any one. There is only one man who has anything to do with procuring a leader for this orchestra, and that is Colonel Higginson, and when he has found the right man for the place, and the agreements are signed then the name of the new leader will be announced.

In the meantime the Boston public may rest assured that Mr. Nikisch's successor will be an able man whoever he may be. It is argued that inasmuch as Mr. Richter has recently refused an offer for a tour in this city with a guarantee of $1,000 a night, he is not likely to accept any position commanding a salary of from $3,000 to $8,000 per annum. Then, again, the hard-and-fast rules of the Vienna opera would only allow Mr. Richter four weeks to fill his engagement at the Chicago Exposition and return to his duties in Austria. Should he retire from the opera now he would lose his pension to which two more years of service would entitle him, so it is hardly probable that Mr. Richter will be the man to lead the symphonies next season.

321
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1892-93.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, AT 8 P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.

SYMPHONY No. 31, in D major. "Parisian."
I. Adagio. D major. Allegro. D major.
II. Andante. G major.
III. Finale: Presto. D major.

SCHUBERT.

UNFINISHED SYMPHONY in B minor.
I. Allegro moderato. B minor.
II. Andante con moto. E major.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major. "Eroica." op. 55.
I. Allegro con brio. E flat major.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. C minor.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. E flat major.
Trio: The same tempo. E flat major.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto. E flat major.

302

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-fourth and last symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony No. 31 (Breitkopf & Härtel Ed. No. 1) in D major ("Parisian.") Schubert: Symphony in B minor (unfinished.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), Opus 55.

A noble programme to wind up a season and celebrate the last appearance here of our conductor. If anyone in the audience habitually inclined to be scared at the thought of "three symphonies" did not find his fears futile, and that there was as much variety in these three by Mozart, Schubert and Beethoven as in an ordinary programme, ostensibly more varied, we suspect that individual of forming his opinions more from title-pages than from the music itself.

It is always good to hear a Mozart symphony; especially good to hear one that falls outside that narrow, if glorious, circle of the "Jupiter," the G minor, and the E-flat major. This "Parisian" symphony, written for the Concert Spirituel in Paris, is a masterwork, if ever there was one. Mozart was young when he wrote it, and yet what marked individuality the work shows! One does not find so fully formed a "personal" style in Beethoven's earlier works; they show not a little of the one and only Beethoven, it is true, but they are full of suggestions of Haydn, not only of his style and methods, but of his mental attitude and cast of musical thought. But in this symphony of Mozart's one finds little to recall Haydn; the character of the themes, the manner of treatment, the whole musical essence of the work, even to the instrumentation, are Mozart's and his alone. That Mozart was putting his best foot well foremost in this symphony, and girding himself up to do his very best, might be suspected from the mere fact of his intending it especially for the great Paris orchestra; but there is also quite sufficient internal evidence to show that he meant to do something hors ligne; he has written all three movements in that elaborate and highly organized "sonata-form" which composers, especially in his day, generally cared to apply only to the first movement of symphonies; and his omission of the customary minuet is to be regarded less as a willingness on his part to stunt the symphony of one of its regular members and make it a "small" symphony, than as a desire to have nothing in it that should fall short of the dignity of the largest symphonic form—a form that could not possibly be applied to the minuet.

The style of the work is at once more elaborate, bolder and more subtle than one finds in most of even the longer symphonies by Haydn; the composer makes light of and plays with difficulties such as only the most expert contrapuntist could face without betraying some sense of effort. Then the beauty, richness and individuality of the instrumentation, the variety of orchestral effects produced by simple means, by invariably treating every instrument according to its own essential nature! Surely no man, either before or since, has ever succeeded in making horns and trumpets sound just as Mozart does. Not even the Wagnerian panoply of brass can surpass Mozart's two horns and two trumpets in brilliancy.

303

The symphony was admirably played, with all due grace, sentiment, and buoyancy of phrasing, yet with a constant regard for the true classic measure in expression and classic consistency in tempo. In clearness, smoothness, and vitality of accent the performance left nothing to be desired. It was a rare delight all through.

Similar fine traits were noteworthy in the playing of the Schubert unfinished symphony. Here, as was not unnatural, Mr. Nikisch allowed himself more freedom in the matter of tempo—the work calls for it; it is more modern in feeling, more dramatic than the Mozart piece. And be it said that Mr. Nikisch's modifications of tempo were all slight, and, to our mind, all singularly felicitous; one was new to us: taking the first theme, both at its first announcement and afterwards in the working-out, a little faster than the next following subsidiary. Many conductors have been too inclined to try for dramatic impressiveness by dragging out this first theme, making the beginning of the working-out in especial a very Desert of Sahara for dreariness; Mr. Nikisch takes it just right. The Andante con moto, not the most inspiring movement in the world, if the truth be told, was beautifully given, and in a way to reduce its tedium to a minimum.

The ever great "Eroica" was a triumph! That glorious first movement that set all criticism by the ears when it first came out, and now stands by common consent on the very pinnacle of orchestral composition, was grandly given. There was not an overdone accent, not a phrase but was allowed to retain its own native grandeur, untarnished by any strutting grandiosity; and yet, with what fire, with what immense effectiveness the whole was played! Only one point we should have liked to hear go otherwise; in that much-discussed entry of the horn on the tonic against a dominant accompaniment, Mr. Nikisch takes a rather timid middle course; he does not audaciously "correct" the passage, by letting the second violins fall from A-flat to G, nor has he the boldness to let the A-flat in the violins grate audibly against the G in the horn; he simply tones down the violins to such an extent that you really do not hear the dissonance at all. Now, the passage, as it stands in the score, may be a piece of sheer fantastic, mad-cap humor, if you will; on this head we have nothing to say; but, if Beethoven wrote that grating dissonance and, what is more, insisted upon its being "all right" when rehearsing the symphony, one naturally concludes that he meant it to be heard.

Mr. Nikisch took the Funeral March at a less portentously dragging pace than when he first conducted the symphony here. For this all thanks! the movement gains much thereby in dignity. The performance was admirable in majestic impressiveness.

Both the scherzo and finale were splendidly played. At the close of the concert, the applause being of the heartiest, Mr. Nikisch stepped forward to the front of the platform and spoke a few regretful words of farewell to the audience and the orchestra.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

De mortuis nil nisi bonum! Mr. Nikisch has departed with unexpected suddenness, and the reviewer may omit cavil at the strange make-up of the final programme, the omission of Beethoven repeats, and the melancholy speech which culminated the proceedings and which was scarcely a Tennysonian "Passing of Arthur." That the speech was called for may well be doubted, as well as the propriety of the introduction of an Apologia pro vita sua into such a concert.

Mr. Nikisch has shown great strength in some directions, great weakness in others; the theatrical instincts which made a Weber or a Liszt work glitter and glow gave to Beethoven and Schumann a strange smell of the footlights. The operatic bent of the conductor's mind often showed at its best in the orchestral work of concertos, in which his elasticity of treatment and his close following of the solo artist were commendable. His pictures were generally painted with a large brush; he cared far more for the general effect than for any details whatever, and thus a "Tannhaeuser" overture would become intensely exciting even if its subthemes were altogether lost; it was in music very much what the impressionist school has been in painting.

While such a school was sure to have its moments of greatness, it cannot be contended that it was an unmixed blessing for us, since it led the orchestra to care more for a brilliant tone than for a careful shading, and it led the audiences to yearn for constantly increased quantities of pepper. Thus the public taste has become tinged with a craving for sensations. Any modern orchestral concoction, without a single idea, has been accepted if only the element of unrest was in it, and if it gave plenty of cymbal, drum or tambourine clashes, trombone growls, piccolo shrieks, and a symmetrical, clear or conservative work runs a decided risk of being counted "slow." "The evil that men do lives after them." It is very possible that a less radical conductor will seem tame to Bostonians for some time to come.

The faults of the system were not present in the performance of Saturday; indeed, it seemed as if there were an intention to keep within the strictest limits of the letter of the law in the matter of readings, and an unwonted air of conservatism seemed to hang over the entire programme. The "Parisian" symphony by Mozart is not comparable with the Jupiter or the G minor by the same composer, and one could have wished the latter to represent Mozart in a programme in which all was symphonic. There was, however, a certain unity in the order of the works, and a lesson to be drawn from the contrasts presented, for the Parisian symphony represented the lightness and grace and symmetry of Mozart, the "Unfinished Symphony" the melodic contrasts of Schubert, and the Heroic the power and grandeur of Beethoven. Each symphony had its own points, which caused it to differ from its congeners. There could have been a greater accentuation of the differences of style to advantage.

In the Parisian symphony Mozart was so careful not to become prolix that he sometimes became too light, as the finale proved, but the omission, by the composer, of a minuet, and the reduction of the work to three movements, was not a disadvantage. It was a lesson in finales to compare the ending of this work with that of the Heroic symphony. Mozart's finales have the old jig spirit in them (the gigue was the finale of the suite, which might be called the mother of the symphony) so have Haydn's, and so had the finale of Beethoven's first symphony. But when Beethoven, in his second symphony, replaced the minuet with the scherzo, he led the way to a reform of the finale, for the rollicking spirit was transferred to the third movement, and the finale became more dignified and powerful.

Schubert's unfinished symphony is the most wonderful example in the world of what can be done with melody alone; all of Schubert's instrumental works seem but songs arranged in a new setting, and the unfinished symphony is sure to win every audience by its melodic grace; it is not what the symphonic form was intended to be, and it essentially differs from all other symphonies, but no one dare say that it is weaker because its charm is wholly different. Its performance was a creditable one.

The Heroic ended the concert and the season. It was played with an evident care for the composer's markings, with the exception of the funeral march which was taken somewhat rapidly. This is a very odd fault to chronicle, and it certainly leans to virtue's side; it was as if the conductor, determined not to sentimentalize, had allowed the pendulum to swing too far in the other direction. Coleridge once called this "a funeral procession in purple," but on this occasion it had a shade of scarlet in it, particularly in the major theme, in which the oboe did some excellent work.

In the trio of the scherzo the three horns did excellent work, not a suspicion of a break being audible. This may be called the first actual scherzo of the symphonic repertoire, for the scherzo of the second symphony is more of a minuet than the minuet of the first. And the finale is the first example of the achievement of a proper counterpoise to the inherent strength of the sonata-movement form, the first introduction of grand variations into the symphony as a climax. It was proper that Beethoven should break a fetter in ending the symphony dedicated to the memory of a hero. It is strange to read how little Beethoven's contemporaries appreciated the master's power in variations; one of the critics said of him: "Mr. Beethoven does not and cannot properly vary a theme," and another urges him to study the variations of Haydn. Brahms is the only true successor to Beethoven in this particular field, a combination of development with elaboration, and the critics are at present repeating history in attacking his work in this form.

The variations were finely played, and, although the concert was longer than usual, few auditors left until its conclusion. The programme for next October has a significant blank where the conductor's name is wont to be, but the character of the personnel of the orchestra, and the earnestness of its founder, are sufficient guarantees of a brilliant future. LOUIS C. ELSON.

LAST CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S SEASON. Conner

The twelfth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed with the twenty-fourth concert of the series in Music Hall, last evening. During this season eighty-nine compositions, for the most part strictly orchestral, have been performed. Forty-four composers have been represented by these compositions as follows: D'Albert, 1; Bach, 2; Beethoven, 9; Berlioz, 3; Bizet, 1; Brahms, 4; Bruch, 1; Busoni, 1; Davidhoff, 1; Dvorak, 4; Ernst, 1; Foote, 1; Gade, 1; Gilson, 1; Goldmark, 2; Gounod, 1; Grieg, 1; Haydn, 2; Humperdink, 1; Lalo, 1; Lang, 1; Liszt, 4; MacDowell, 3; Mendelssohn, 2; Moszkowski, 1; Mozart, 2; Nicolai, 1; Paderewski, 1; Paine, 1; Raff, 2; Reinecker, 1; Riemenschneider, 1; Rubinstein, 1; Saint-Saens, 4; Scharwenka, 1; Schubert, 3; Schumann, 4; Sphor, 1; Svendsen, 1; Thieriot, 1; Tschalkowski, 2; Vieuxtemps, 1; Volkmann, 1; Wagner, 10; Weber, 3.

N. B. Ten compositions by Richard Wagner in this series and only two by Mozart; only four American composers granted a hearing; not a Cherubini overture in the entire list.

Such is the record. The programme for last evening's concert contained three symphonies;—Mozart's No. 31, in D major ("Parisian"); Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major "Eroica."

The venerable age of the Mozart symphony "Parisian" should not have detracted a whit from the admiration that more than ever seemed its due, though not all of it was performed in either the right spirit or time, nor with any such fervency, neither taste, as the reverential listener to anything by Mozart might reasonably have demanded for it. Technically the orchestral delivery was often marred by a characteristic lack of unanimity in the response to the baton. The shortcoming, however, confined itself to the more rapid passages of the allegro movements, and was at no time so conspicuous as absolutely to offend. In any event, it is pleasant to think that at least one Mozart symphony was granted a performance. It is not easy to estimate Mozart's value to the world, but the claim in his behalf is at least plausible—that he not only created many great works, but that he inspired many more. Were we to extract from modern music, indeed, all that it owes to Bach and Mozart, there would remain a fragmentary mass that would barely hint at its former glory.

True, Mozart modeled the architecture of his art upon the foundation that had been laid by Haydn, but he did more than this. He refined the form of the symphony. By the power of his genius he immeasurably extended its power of musical expression. That this expression was idealized by Beethoven and possibly carried to even a greater height seems largely due to Beethoven's developing the technique of the orchestra. Mozart first realized a charm of euphony that had hitherto been quite unknown to German composers. Richard Wagner in his music of the future freely acknowledges this and adds that Mozart "while giving to Italian opera the richer development of instrumental composition, he also imparted the sweetness of Italian singing to orchestral melody."

Nevertheless the all conspicuous melodist of the concert was Schubert, the only composer the world has known who could rely upon his genius for melody alone (for no other genius had he) to place him in the foremost rank. Poor Schubert! In his saddest hours only would the muse enrich his art. His eighth symphony (unfinished) sprang from greatest pain. It speaks to us of one whose life was one long dark, dreary day; but as Jean Paul Richter truly says, "We shroud the cages of birds when we would teach them to sing." And so it was with Schubert. His life was enshrouded and its dreariness long spun out was only occasionally relieved by transient gleams of light.

Why Schubert never completed it is not definitely known, but that he actually intended to do so is certain, as nine bars of a scherzo for it, he began, which are written on the autographic score. For forty-five years this eighth symphony lapsed into oblivion, and then as it were it suddenly awoke to find itself famous. Many features of the performance last evening were worthy of praise. The impressive lead of the strings in the first of the allegro having all the charm of mystery in attendance upon it was exquisitely played; and the beautiful changes of orchestral color towards the close of this movement were delicately reproduced. In the second movement, where the horns and bassoons, heard in conjunction with the basses, pizzicato, in a phrase that frequently puts in its appearance somewhat parenthetically in its relation to the melody proper, the playing was excellent.

The Beethoven symphony, to be brief, was admirably played. At its conclusion the conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was persistently recalled, not by the audience en masse but by a very considerable portion of it. Mr. Nikisch finally responded by appearing at the conductor's desk and addressing the audience, substantially as follows: He thanked all present for the very hearty ovation that he had received. Perhaps Mr. Nikisch was unmindful that there were many in his presence who could not conscientiously participate in the ovation. He thanked the orchestra. This was very appropriate, for the very much inflated reputation that Mr. Nikisch enjoys as a conductor has been created for him by Mr. H. L. Higginson and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is here well to bear in mind that Mr. Nikisch prior to his coming to this country but was the assistant conductor at Leipzig opera house. Finally Mr. Nikisch regretted (?) that on account of ill health (?) it would be impossible for him to accompany his faithful orchestra to Chicago and participate in the concerts to be given at the World's Fair. Just at this point in his remarks it should be stated, Mr. Nikisch was pitifully insincere. It is generally understood that he declined to go to Chicago with the orchestra because the ungentlemanly, the charlatanic and insulting inducements he held out to Mr. Higginson were politely but firmly declined. Good riddance to this man Nikisch. His coming to this country was a mistake and the artistic reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has as a result been seriously imperiled. His most praiseworthy achievement in this country is in the altogether discreditable manner of his taking leave of it.

THE REPORT that Richter is to be the new director of the Symphony Concerts has not yet been either denied or verified at headquarters here, and hence it would be premature to congratulate ourselves on the fact that we are to have one of the world's most famous conductors at the head of Mr. Higginson's splendid orchestra. At first view it hardly seems probable that Richter would give up the honors and the pension that await him at home in order to come hither for a temporary stay, unless indeed, he were engaged on such munificent terms as would enrich him, and make any possible pension unworthy consideration. It is to be wished that the story may be true, for it will, for the first time, place at the head of our orchestra a conductor who is recognized all over Europe as a thorough master of his art, and one who, if he be really the disciplinarian he is said to be, would carry the organization to a higher state of efficiency than it has ever before attained. A verification of the rumor would give the greatest satisfaction to the whole musical community; but as that is still lacking, there is nothing to do but to wait and hope.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

De mortuis nil nisi bonum! Mr. Nikisch has departed with unexpected suddenness, and the reviewer may omit cavil at the strange make-up of the final programme, the omission of Beethoven repeats, and the melancholy speech which culminated the proceedings and which was scarcely a Tennysonian "Passing of Arthur." That the speech was called for may well be doubted, as well as the propriety of the introduction of an Apologia pro vita sua into such a concert.

Mr. Nikisch has shown great strength in some directions, great weakness in others; the theatrical instincts which made a Weber or a Liszt work glitter and glow gave to Beethoven and Schumann a strange smell of the footlights. The operatic bent of the conductor's mind often showed at its best in the orchestral work of concertos, in which his elasticity of treatment and his close following of the solo artist were commendable. His pictures were generally painted with a large brush; he cared far more for the general effect than for any details whatever, and thus a "Tannhaeuser" overture would become intensely exciting even if its subthemes were altogether lost; it was in music very much what the impressionist school has been in painting.

While such a school was sure to have its moments of greatness, it cannot be contended that it was an unmixed blessing for us, since it led the orchestra to care more for a brilliant tone than for a careful shading, and it led the audiences to yearn for constantly increased quantities of pepper. Thus the public taste has become tinged with a craving for sensations. Any modern orchestral concoction, without a single idea, has been accepted if only the element of unrest was in it, and if it gave plenty of cymbal, drum or tambourine clashes, trombone growls, piccolo shrieks, and a symmetrical, clear or conservative work runs a decided risk of being counted "slow." "The evil that men do lives after them." It is very possible that a less radical conductor will seem tame to Bostonians for some time to come.

The faults of the system were not present in the performance of Saturday; indeed, it seemed as if there were an intention to keep within the strictest limits of the letter of the law in the matter of readings, and an unwonted air of conservatism seemed to hang over the entire programme. The "Parisian" symphony by Mozart is not comparable with the Jupiter or the G minor by the same composer, and one could have wished the latter to represent Mozart in a programme in which all was symphonic. There was, however, a certain unity in the order of the works, and a lesson to be drawn from the contrasts presented, for the Parisian symphony represented the lightness and grace and symmetry of Mozart, the "Unfinished Symphony" the melodic contrasts of Schubert, and the Heroic the power and grandeur of Beethoven. Each symphony had its own points, which caused it to differ from its congeners. There could have been a greater accentuation of the differences of style to advantage.

In the Parisian symphony Mozart was so careful not to become prolix that he sometimes became too light, as the finale proved, but the omission, by the composer, of a minuet, and the reduction of the work to three movements, was not a disadvantage. It was a lesson in finales to compare the ending of this work with that of the Heroic symphony. Mozart's finales have the old jig spirit in them (the gigue was the finale of the suite, which might be called the mother of the symphony) so have Haydn's, and so had the finale of Beethoven's first symphony. But when Beethoven, in his second symphony, replaced the minuet with the scherzo, he led the way to a reform of the finale, for the rollicking spirit was transferred to the third movement, and the finale became more dignified and powerful.

Schubert's unfinished symphony is the most wonderful example in the world of what can be done with melody alone; all of Schubert's instrumental works seem but songs arranged in a new setting, and the unfinished symphony is sure to win every audience by its melodic grace; it is not what the symphonic form was intended to be, and it essentially differs from all other symphonies, but no one dare say that it is weaker because its charm is wholly different. Its performance was a creditable one.

The Heroic ended the concert and the season. It was played with an evident care for the composer's markings, with the exception of the funeral march which was taken somewhat rapidly. This is a very odd fault to chronicle, and it certainly leans to virtue's side; it was as if the conductor, determined not to sentimentalize, had allowed the pendulum to swing too far in the other direction. Coleridge once called this "a funeral procession in purple," but on this occasion it had a shade of scarlet in it, particularly in the major theme, in which the oboe did some excellent work.

In the trio of the scherzo the three horns did excellent work, not a suspicion of a break being audible. This may be called the first actual scherzo of the symphonic repertoire, for the scherzo of the second symphony is more of a minuet than the minuet of the first. And the finale is the first example of the achievement of a proper counterpoise to the inherent strength of the sonata-movement form, the first introduction of grand variations into the symphony as a climax. It was proper that Beethoven should break a fetter in ending the symphony dedicated to the memory of a hero. It is strange to read how little Beethoven's contemporaries appreciated the master's power in variations; one of the critics said of him: "Mr. Beethoven does not and cannot properly vary a theme," and another urges him to study the variations of Haydn. Brahms is the only true successor to Beethoven in this particular field, a combination of development with elaboration, and the critics are at present repeating history in attacking his work in this form.

The variations were finely played, and, although the concert was longer than usual, few auditors left until its conclusion. The programme for next October has

TIGHT BINDING

A significant blank where the conductor's name is wont to be, but the character of the personnel of the orchestra, and the earnestness of its founder, are sufficient guarantee of a brilliant future. LOUIS C. ELSON.

LAST CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S SEASON.

The twelfth season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra closed with the twenty-fourth concert of the series in Music Hall, last evening. During this season eighty-nine compositions, for the most part strictly orchestral, have been performed. Forty-four composers have been represented by these compositions as follows: D'Albert, 1; Bach, 2; Beethoven, 9; Berlioz, 3; Bizet, 1; Brahms, 4; Bruch, 1; Busoni, 1; Davidhoff, 1; Dvorak, 4; Ernst, 1; Foote, 1; Gade, 1; Gilson, 1; Goldmark, 2; Gounod, 1; Grieg, 1; Haydn, 2; Humperdink, 1; Lalo, 1; Lang, 1; Liszt, 4; MacDowell, 3; Mendelssohn, 2; Moszkowski, 1; Mozart, 2; Nicolai, 1; Paderewski, 1; Paine, 1; Raff, 2; Reinecker, 1; Riemenschneider, 1; Rubinstein, 1; Saint-Saens, 4; Scharwenka, 1; Schubert, 3; Schumann, 4; Spohr, 1; Svendsen, 1; Thieriot, 1; Tschalkowski, 2; Vieuxtemps, 1; Volkmann, 1; Wagner, 10; Weber, 3.

N. B. Ten compositions by Richard Wagner in this series and only two by Mozart; only four American composers granted a hearing; not a Cherubini overture in the entire list.

Such is the record. The programme for last evening's concert contained three symphonies;—Mozart's No. 31, in D major ("Parisian"); Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor; and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E flat major "Eroica."

The venerable age of the Mozart symphony "Parisian" should not have detracted a whit from the admiration that more than ever seemed its due, though not all of it was performed in either the right spirit or time, nor with any such fervency, neither taste, as the reverential listener to anything by Mozart might reasonably have demanded for it. Technically the orchestral delivery was often marred by a characteristic lack of unanimity in the response to the baton. The shortcoming, however, confined itself to the more rapid passages of the allegro movements, and was at no time so conspicuous as absolutely to offend. In any event, it is pleasant to think that at least one Mozart symphony was granted a performance. It is not easy to estimate Mozart's value to the world, but the claim in his behalf is at least plausible—that he not only created many great works, but that he inspired many more. Were we to extract from modern music, indeed, all that it owes to Bach and Mozart, there would remain a fragmentary mass that would barely hint at its former glory.

True, Mozart modeled the architecture of his art upon the foundation that had been laid by Haydn, but he did more than this. He refined the form of the symphony. By the power of his genius he immeasurably extended its power of musical expression. That this expression was idealized by Beethoven and possibly carried to even a greater height seems largely due to Beethoven's developing the technique of the orchestra. Mozart first realized a charm of euphony that had hitherto been quite unknown to German composers. Richard Wagner in his music of the future freely acknowledges this and adds that Mozart "while giving to Italian opera the richer development of instrumental composition, he also imparted the sweetness of Italian singing to orchestral melody."

Nevertheless the all conspicuous melodist of the concert was Schubert, the only composer the world has known who could rely upon his genius for melody alone (for no other genius had he) to place him in the foremost rank. Poor Schubert! In his saddest hours only would the muse enrich his art. His eighth symphony (unfinished) sprang from greatest pain. It speaks to us of one whose life was one long dark, dreary day; but as Jean Paul Richter truly says, "We shroud the cages of birds when we would teach them to sing." And so it was with Schubert. His life was enshrouded and its dreariness long spun out was only occasionally relieved by transient gleams of light.

Why Schubert never completed it is not definitely known, but that he actually intended to do so is certain, as nine bars of a scherzo for it, he began, which are written on the autographic score. For forty-five years this eighth symphony lapsed into oblivion, and then as it were it suddenly awoke to find itself famous. Many features of the performance last evening were worthy of praise. The impressive lead of the strings in the first of the allegro having all the charm of mystery in attendance upon it was exquisitely played; and the beautiful changes of orchestral color towards the close of this movement were delicately reproduced. In the second movement, where the horns and bassoons, heard in conjunction with the basses, pizzicato, in a phrase that frequently puts in its appearance somewhat parenthetically in its relation to the melody proper, the playing was excellent.

The Beethoven symphony, to be brief, was admirably played. At its conclusion the conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was persistently recalled, not by the audience en masse but by a very considerable portion of it. Mr. Nikisch finally responded by appearing at the conductor's desk and addressing the audience, substantially as follows: He thanked all present for the very hearty ovation that he had received. Perhaps Mr. Nikisch was unmindful that there were many in his presence who could not conscientiously participate in the ovation. He thanked the orchestra. This was very appropriate, for the very much inflated reputation that Mr. Nikisch enjoys as a conductor has been created for him by Mr. H. L. Higginson and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is here well to bear in mind that Mr. Nikisch prior to his coming to this country but was the assistant conductor at Leipzig opera house. Finally Mr. Nikisch regretted (?) that on account of ill health (?) it would be impossible for him to accompany his faithful orchestra to Chicago and participate in the concerts to be given at the World's Fair. Just at this point in his remarks it should be stated, Mr. Nikisch was pitifully insincere. It is generally understood that he declined to go to Chicago with the orchestra because the ungentlemanly, the charlatanic and insulting inducements he held out to Mr. Higginson were politely but firmly declined. Good riddance to this man Nikisch. His coming to this country was a mistake, and the artistic reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has as a result been seriously imperiled. His most praiseworthy achievement in this country is in the altogether discreditable manner of his taking leave of it.

THE REPORT that Richter is to be the new director of the Symphony Concerts has not yet been either denied or verified at headquarters here, and hence it would be premature to congratulate ourselves on the fact that we are to have one of the world's most famous conductors at the head of Mr. Higginson's splendid orchestra. At first view it hardly seems probable that Richter would give up the honors and the pension that await him at home in order to come hither for a temporary stay, unless indeed, he were engaged on such munificent terms as would enrich him, and make any possible pension unworthy consideration. It is to be wished that the story may be true, for it will, for the first time, place at the head of our orchestra a conductor who is recognized all over Europe as a thorough master of his art, and one who, if he be really the disciplinarian he is said to be, would carry the organization to a higher state of efficiency than it has ever before attained. A verification of the rumor would give the greatest satisfaction to the whole musical community; but as that is still lacking, there is nothing to do but to wait and hope.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Farewell to Mr. Nikisch.

The 24th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the last of this season's series, took place at Music Hall Saturday evening.

The following was the programme: Symphony in D, Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The playing of the orchestra was in most respects excellent. It was entirely above that orchestral patois that has so generally marked its efforts since Gericke departed. In fact, for the last three or four concerts there has been a great improvement in this direction.

The peculiarities that have characterized the readings of the classics during the past four seasons were observable on this occasion.

The concert was very tedious and over-long.

The audience was large and a little more demonstrative than usual for this concert ended the connection with the Symphony Orchestra of Nikisch, the incumbent of the conductor's position for the past four seasons. It is a long time now since any but the most meagre demonstration, like the scattering applause of a few friends, has marked the conductor's entrance at the beginning of the concerts. So when on this occasion the audience indulged in an extra amount of applause it left its real significance in doubt.

At the end of the performance the usual sentimentalities were indulged to the extent that Nikisch was recalled and made a speech in which he boasted of the triumphs of himself and the orchestra wherever they had been, the latter "supporting him always like true soldiers on the bloody battlefield." He also apologized to the audience for deserting his companions-in-arms on the coming Western tour because of indisposition upon his part, he fearing that his health would not permit his finishing the season's work. But he did not mention the "considerations" that rumor says he presented, and that Mr. Higginson refused to accept, that would have restored his physical condition sufficiently for him to have undertaken the task.

Well, it has been fortunate for him that these valiant soldiers of bloodless battles were so well disciplined and perfected in the art of musical warfare by his eminent predecessor, Wilhelm Gericke, else his triumphs might have been defeats.

After having thanked every one but the critics he departed, the last spasm of this sentimental ending that I observed coming from a lady (who had burst her gloves applauding him), ejaculating as he disappeared from sight, "Oh, dear, we shall never see those lovely white hands again!"

In the meantime the judicious rejoice and wait patiently to ascertain who will be the next incumbent of the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The opening concert of the next, the 13th season, will take place Oct. 14, 1893.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

NO SUCCESSOR TO NIKISCH YET.

Colonel Higginson Denies the Story About the Engagement of Hans Richter.

The stories that were given to the public in Boston and New York Monday that Hans Richter, director of the opera at Vienna, had been engaged to succeed Arthur Nikisch as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are stamped by Colonel Higginson as false. He says that no contract has yet been entered into with anyone. There is only one man who has anything to do with procuring a leader for this orchestra, and that is Colonel Higginson, and when he has found the right man for the place, and the agreements are signed, then the name of the new leader will be announced. In the mean time the Boston public may rest assured that Mr. Nikisch's successor will be an able man, whoever he may be. It is argued that, inasmuch as Mr. Richter has recently refused an offer for a tour in this country with a guarantee of $1000 a night, he is not likely to accept any position commanding a salary of from six to eight thousand dollars per annum. Then again, the hard and fast rules of the Vienna Opera, would only allow Mr. Richter just four weeks to fill his engagement at the Chicago Exposition and return to his duties in Austria. Should he retire from the opera now, he would lose his pension, to which two more years of service would entitle him; so it is hardly probable that Mr. Richter will be the man to lead the symphonies next season.

MR. NIKISCH SPEAKS.

When Mr. Nikisch came before the public Saturday evening he was applauded heartily. He found the stand and the desk decorated with flowers, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the Heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and he then made a speech in English. The speech in substance was as follows: He expressed his appreciation of the kindness shown him here and in other towns of the United States; he praised the orchestra, and he declared that he himself had always given his best endeavor to the gratification of the musical taste of the public; and he expressed great regret, unbounded regret, that he would be unable on account of sickness to oblige his generous patron by completing the season's work in the West. He, however, declared that his "dear friend Kneisel," as conductor on the tour, would maintain the reputation of the orchestra.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for the last concert of this season was a queer one—Mozart's thirty-first or "Parisian" symphony, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica." If one must have three symphonies all at once, perhaps those would do as well as any that could be chosen—the brilliancy of Mozart, the sympathetic melody of Schubert and the grandeur of Beethoven. But for the close of a season—and especially for the close of a four years' course of seasons—it would have been better had Mr. Nikisch made a choice of music which would have satisfied more than the one journal which apparently has been enraptured with everything which Mr. Nikisch has done, except when everybody else was pleased. This combination appeared much as if its maker were at the end of his interest or of his wits and arranged this as safe and standard. It made the evening very long, and as the hall was unusually close and hot, listening was not easy. The playing was exceedingly good and in the difficult and catchy passages the men were evidently alert and anxious to make no slip. The readings were reasonable and right, exception made of the funeral march in the "Eroica," which moved somewhat too lightly and trippingly for full dignity and impressiveness.

At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch, who had been complimented with laurel wreaths and flowers, was several times recalled, until at last he made a few remarks to the waiting people. Possibly it would have been more discreet in him to say nothing, considering the manner of his withdrawal, but as the audience practically compelled him to speak, he should not be blamed for saying what was on his mind. There is no question but he spoke frankly and truly in saying that he had tried to do his best. That has never been doubted, even by his severest critics; the strongest point maintained against him being that he was not in his proper place, being a dramatic conductor in a concert-conductor's desk. All will wish him well in his new sphere, and will expect to hear fine and honorable reports of him.

According to the tabulation in the programme ninety-two numbers, instrumental and vocal, have been presented during the season. Of these fourteen are credited as novelties, and six were taken from American composers. France had a fair showing and Scandinavia was recognized, as also was Italy; but the vast proportion of the music was German. Of the novelties not all were worth their places, and some—such as the Humperdinck and Riemenschneider works—had best have been left untouched. The solo list was creditable, with an exception or two, and the choral experiment was barely a succès d'estime. Altogether the season cannot be conceded to have raised the standard of excellence or repute either in art or performance, although it must be set down as much better than any other city could have furnished and only to be excepted to by those who have been educated and accustomed to constantly increasing merit.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch Makes His Last Appearance.

Music Hall Packed to the Doors—Director Nikisch Given a Grand Ovation—He Returns Thanks and Regrets His Enforced Retirement in a Short Speech.

The last concert of the 12th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening, was an event of unusual interest, as it somewhat unexpectedly terminated the engagement of Mr. Arthur Nikisch as its conductor. It was evident that the patrons of the concerts had come to the hall with an anticipation of participating in some happening other than is usual at these concerts and there was a general air of expectation upon the incoming crowds that could not be mistaken.

Mr. Nikisch came to Boston four years ago well nigh a complete stranger to the patrons of these concerts, and having a name that was hardly known outside the limited circle of those who had met him in Europe. He goes back to his former line of musical life across the water with a record of a most remarkable character for, whatever his abilities as a conductor may be, and whatever may be said in regard to his programmes, he has seen the orchestral scheme so nobly founded and sustained by Mr. Higginson become a self-supporting enterprise, not only at home, but in every city which it visits periodically.

In so doing he has changed this undertaking from a private effort in the interest of good music to a service of concerts supported liberally by a public which has shown a disposition to accept whatever was provided for them with a spirit of humility and gratitude at once surprising and amusing.

It is to be regretted, whatever estimate is put upon the artistic results of Mr. Nikisch's career here, that it should be terminated so abruptly, and the kindly parting with the conductor of the orchestra for four seasons was a courteous recognition of what he has done, which reflected credit upon the patrons of these concerts.

The programme of the evening consisted of Mozart's "Parisian" symphony, No. 31, in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony, in B minor, and Beethoven's "Eroica." There is little need to comment at length upon the performance of such a programme after the work of this conductor during his occupancy of his present position.

His ideas of the symphonic works of the composers represented in the evening's list are well known, and his readings were in conformity with his earlier programmes of a like order. He was made to know the satisfaction of the immense audience at the close of each movement, and at the end of the unfinished symphony he was presented with two immense laurel wreaths, each tied with elaborate bows of his nation's colors.

The entrance of Mr. Nikisch was attended by an ovation which any man

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Farewell to Mr. Nikisch.

The 24th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the last of this season's series, took place at Music Hall Saturday evening.

The following was the programme: Symphony in D, Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The playing of the orchestra was in most respects excellent. It was entirely above that orchestral patois that has so generally marked its efforts since Gericke departed. In fact, for the last three or four concerts there has been a great improvement in this direction.

The peculiarities that have characterized the readings of the classics during the past four seasons were observable on this occasion.

The concert was very tedious and over-long.

The audience was large and a little more demonstrative than usual for this concert ended the connection with the Symphony Orchestra of Nikisch, the incumbent of the conductor's position for the past four seasons. It is a long time now since any but the most meagre demonstration, like the scattering applause of a few friends, has marked the conductor's entrance at the beginning of the concerts. So when on this occasion the audience indulged in an extra amount of applause it left its real significance in doubt.

At the end of the performance the usual sentimentalities were indulged to the extent that Nikisch was recalled and made a speech in which he boasted of the triumphs of himself and the orchestra wherever they had been, the latter "supporting him always like true soldiers on the bloody battlefield." He also apologized to the audience for deserting his companions-in-arms on the coming Western tour because of indisposition upon his part, he fearing that his health would not permit his finishing the season's work. But he did not mention the "considerations" that rumor says he presented, and that Mr. Higginson refused to accept, that would have restored his physical condition sufficiently for him to have undertaken the task.

Well, it has been fortunate for him that these valiant soldiers of bloodless battles were so well disciplined and perfected in the art of musical warfare by his eminent predecessor, Wilhelm Gericke, else his triumphs might have been defeats.

After having thanked every one but the critics he departed, the last spasm of this sentimental ending that I observed coming from a lady (who had burst her gloves applauding him), ejaculating as he disappeared from sight, "Oh, dear, we shall never see those lovely white hands again!"

In the meantime the judicious rejoice and wait patiently to ascertain who will be the next incumbent of the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The opening concert of the next, the 13th season, will take place Oct. 14, 1893.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

NO SUCCESSOR TO NIKISCH YET.

Colonel Higginson Denies the Story About the Engagement of Hans Richter.

The stories that were given to the public in Boston and New York Monday that Hans Richter, director of the opera at Vienna, had been engaged to succeed Arthur Nikisch as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are stamped by Colonel Higginson as false. He says that no contract has yet been entered into with anyone. There is only one man who has anything to do with procuring a leader for this orchestra, and that is Colonel Higginson, and when he has found the right man for the place, and the agreements are signed, then the name of the new leader will be announced. In the mean time the Boston public may rest assured that Mr. Nikisch's successor will be an able man, whoever he may be. It is argued that, inasmuch as Mr. Richter has recently refused an offer for a tour in this country with a guarantee of $1000 a night, he is not likely to accept any position commanding a salary of from six to eight thousand dollars per annum. Then again, the hard and fast rules of the Vienna Opera, would only allow Mr. Richter just four weeks to fill his engagement at the Chicago Exposition and return to his duties in Austria. Should he retire from the opera now, he would lose his pension, to which two more years of service would entitle him; so it is hardly probable that Mr. Richter will be the man to lead the symphonies next season.

MR. NIKISCH SPEAKS.

When Mr. Nikisch came before the public Saturday evening he was applauded heartily. He found the stand and the desk decorated with flowers, and during the concert he was presented with wreaths. After the finale of the heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and heroic Symphony he was twice recalled, and he then made a speech in English. The speech in substance was as follows: He expressed his appreciation of the kindness shown him here and in other towns of the United States; he praised the orchestra, and he declared that he himself had always given his best endeavor to the gratification of the musical taste of the public; and he expressed great regret, unbounded regret, that he would be unable on account of sickness to oblige his generous patron by completing the season's work in the West. He, however, declared that his "dear friend Kneisel," as conductor on the tour, would maintain the reputation of the orchestra.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The programme for the last concert of this season was a queer one—Mozart's thirty-first or "Parisian" symphony, Schubert's unfinished symphony and Beethoven's "Eroica." If one must have three symphonies all at once, perhaps those would do as well as any that could be chosen—the brilliancy of Mozart, the sympathetic melody of Schubert and the grandeur of Beethoven. But for the close of a season—and especially for the close of a four years' course of seasons—it would have been better had Mr. Nikisch made a choice of music which would have satisfied more than the one journal which apparently has been enraptured with everything which Mr. Nikisch has done, except when everybody else was pleased. This combination appeared much as if its maker were at the end of his interest or of his wits and arranged this as safe and standard. It made the evening very long, and as the hall was unusually close and hot, listening was not easy. The playing was exceedingly good and in the difficult and catchy passages the men were evidently alert and anxious to make no slip. The readings were reasonable and right, exception made of the funeral march in the "Eroica," which moved somewhat too lightly and trippingly for full dignity and impressiveness.

At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch, who had been complimented with laurel wreaths and flowers, was several times recalled, until at last he made a few remarks to the waiting people. Possibly it would have been more discreet in him to say nothing, considering the manner of his withdrawal, but as the audience practically compelled him to speak, he should not be blamed for saying what was on his mind. There is no question but he spoke frankly and truly in saying that he had tried to do his best. That has never been doubted, even by his severest critics; the strongest point maintained against him being that he was not in his proper place, being a dramatic conductor in a concert-conductor's desk. All will wish him well in his new sphere, and will expect to hear fine and honorable reports of him.

According to the tabulation in the programme ninety-two numbers, instrumental and vocal, have been presented during the season. Of these fourteen are credited as novelties, and six were taken from American composers. France had a fair showing and Scandinavia was recognized, as also was Italy; but the vast proportion of the music was German. Of the novelties not all were worth their places, and some—such as the Humperdinck and Riemenschneider works—had best have been left untouched. The solo list was creditable, with an exception or two, and the choral experiment was barely a succès d'estime. Altogether the season cannot be conceded to have raised the standard of excellence or repute either in art or performance, although it must be set down as much better than any other city could have furnished and only to be excepted to by those who have been educated and accustomed to constantly increasing merit.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch Makes His Last Appearance.

Music Hall Packed to the Doors—Director Nikisch Given a Grand Ovation—He Returns Thanks and Regrets His Enforced Retirement in a Short Speech.

The last concert of the 12th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening, was an event of unusual interest, as it somewhat unexpectedly terminated the engagement of Mr. Arthur Nikisch as its conductor. It was evident that the patrons of the concerts had come to the hall with an anticipation of participating in some happening other than is usual at these concerts and there was a general air of expectation upon the incoming crowds that could not be mistaken.

Mr. Nikisch came to Boston four years ago well nigh a complete stranger to the patrons of these concerts, and having a name that was hardly known outside the limited circle of those who had met him in Europe. He goes back to his former line of musical life across the water with a record of a most remarkable character for, whatever his abilities as a conductor may be, and whatever may be said in regard to his programmes, he has seen the orchestral scheme so nobly founded and sustained by Mr. Higginson becomes a self-supporting enterprise, not only at home, but in every city which it visits periodically.

In so doing he has changed this undertaking from a private effort in the interest of good music to a service of concerts supported liberally by a public which has shown a disposition to accept whatever was provided for them with a spirit of humility and gratitude at once surprising and amusing.

It is to be regretted, whatever estimate is put upon the artistic results of Mr. Nikisch's career here, that it should be terminated so abruptly, and the kindly parting with the conductor of the orchestra for four seasons was a courteous recognition of what he has done, which reflected credit upon the patrons of these concerts.

The programme of the evening consisted of Mozart's "Parisian" symphony, No. 31, in D major, Schubert's unfinished symphony, in B minor, and Beethoven's "Eroica." There is little need to comment at length upon the performance of such a programme after the work of this conductor during his occupancy of his present position.

His ideas of the symphonic works of the composers represented in the evening's list are well known, and his readings were in conformity with his earlier programmes of a like order. He was made to know the satisfaction of the immense audience at the close of each movement, and at the end of the unfinished symphony he was presented with two immense laurel wreaths, each tied with elaborate bows of his nation's colors.

The entrance of Mr. Nikisch was attended by an ovation which any man might take pride in gaining from a Boston audience, and as he stood beside the flower-bedecked desk preparatory to mounting the high stand he has used so often the orchestra and audience joined their applause and continued it for some minutes.

At the conclusion of the "Eroica" the conductor was applauded and repeated recalls followed his retirement, the demands in this way finally leading him to follow the American fashion and make a farewell speech. In these final words Mr. Nikisch expressed his high appreciation of the kindness shown him in Boston and in all the American cities he had visited. He then paid his respects to the members of the orchestra, speaking of them in the warmest terms and commending them as soldiers whose loyalty he had always felt assured of and with whom he had always found a victory possible. He closed by expressing great regret that his generous patron had been put to so much trouble by his physical inability to complete the season's work on the tour, and said that with his dear friend Kneisel in his place he had full confidence in the continued success of the orchestra.

The opening concert of the 13th season will be given on the evening of Oct. 14 next, and the name of Mr. Nikisch's successor will be officially made public on that or an earlier date.

MUSIC. Travel

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 24th and last Symphony concert of the series of '92-'93 was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then made his last appearance as conductor of this orchestra.

The programme was as follows: Symphony, D major (Parisian), Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The air of the hall was hot and foul, so that the concert seemed of interminable length. The programme was one of dignity, and the music might have been more fully enjoyed if the attending atmospheric circumstances had been more congenial. But even bad air could not vitiate the tender melancholy and the unearthly beauty of Schubert's fragment.

It is not necessary, now that Mr. Nikisch is no longer in authority, to write at length concerning the merits or faults of the performance of Saturday evening. The orchestra played as though the members appreciated the dignity of the occasion, and, if unfavorable criticism were to be made, it would chiefly concern itself with the ultra-modern ideas of Mr. Nikisch in regard to the proper pace of a movement. The first movement, for instance, of the Heroic Symphony showed the characteristics of the man. There were occasional great effects, and, on the other hand, the frank simplicity of the composer was turned often into the sentimental affectation of the conductor.

Mr. Nikisch will soon be engaged in a congenial task. He is by nature an operatic conductor; he, a Hungarian, is fully equipped for the duty of conducting opera in a Hungarian town to the delight of a Hungarian audience. Surely there is no one here that will not wish him success in the achievement of this task.

May his life, then, be one prolonged Hungarian rhapsody!

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC. Saville

The Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the current season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place in Music Hall, last night. The programme was: Symphony No. 31, in D, Mozart; unfinished symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven. A very large audience was in attendance. Three symphonies made a somewhat exacting programme to listen to. To review the performances in detail would be only to repeat what we have so often written of the conductor's revised and amended versions of great classical works. The programme afforded him ample opportunities to give a final display of his many faults and his few virtues as a leader. He was warmly received on his first appearance, and was well applauded at different stages of the concert. At the close, curiously enough, there was no demonstration from the public until the orchestra, taking advantage of their last opportunity of the season to applaud, did so heartily, and the audience joining in, continued until Mr. Nikisch was recalled several times. On the last occasion he made a speech, thanking everybody for everything; explained that his ill health prevented him from going to Chicago, and expressed his belief that his dear friend Mr. Kneisel would replace him on the trip, very satisfactorily. The orchestra and the audience applauded again, the season was over, and Mr. Nikisch ceased to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. In our next issue we shall give a review of the Symphony Orchestra season.

Saville

MUSIC. May 29

The Symphony Season.

In summing up the season's work, we think that we do not exaggerate when we affirm that the series of concerts just ended were the most uninteresting that the organization has ever given. The programmes were arranged without judgment. A great deal of music that should not have had a hearing at such concerts was performed, notably the d'Albert Symphony, the Davidoff 'cello concerto, the Humperdink "Humoresque," the Riemenschneider "Dance of Death," P. Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen," and the Busoni Symphonie "Tone-Poem." In fact, with the exception of Mr. Foote's cantata, "The Skeleton in Armor," Gilson's "La Mer," Miss Lang's Dramatic Overture, Mr. Paine's Columbus March and Hymn, Svensden's "Zorshayda," and Tchaikowsky's E-minor Symphony, these included all the new works that were given. Wagner was represented by ten compositions, Beethoven by nine; Schumann, Liszt, Brahms, Dvorak and Saint-Saëns, by four each; Bach, Haydn and Mozart by two each; and Goldmark, Mendelssohn, Raff and Tchaikowsky by the same number respectively. Weber, Berlioz and MacDowell were heard in three works each. D'Albert, Bizet, Bruch, Busoni, Davidoff, Ernst, Foote, Gade, Gilson, Gounod, Grieg, Lalo, Miss Lang, Moszkowski, Nicolai, Paderewski, Paine, Reinecke, Riemenschneider, Humperdink, Rubinstein, Scharwenka, Spohr, Svensden, Thierolt, Vieuxtemps and Volkmann, had one hearing each. As will be seen, in point of number, Wagner stands at the head of the list, a somewhat queer showing for a symphony concert season. The soloists were: Pianists, Paderewski, F. B. Busoni, George M. Nowell, Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, Carl Stasny; the vocalists were, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Basta-Tavary, Max Heinrich, Priscilla White, Louisa Leimer, Felicia Kaschoska, Mrs. Nikisch, Heinrich Meyn, W. J. Wijnch, and Mr. A. Foote's church choir; the violinists were Henri Marteau and the usual soloists of the orchestra. The symphony chorus, of which so much was promised, and from which so much was expected, was a disastrous failure, and assisted in one of the most bungling and inadequate performances of Beethoven's choral symphony ever heard in this city, after which it fortunately disappeared, to all practical intents and purposes, from view. The playing of the orchestra was, on the whole, of a lower standard of excellence than has characterized it since its earliest years, and its chief successes were achieved in those compositions in which noise predominated. Fortunately the conductor, under whose sway the orchestra has so steadily degenerated, is to control it no longer; and whatever may be the cause that induced him to cancel his engagement, there is every reason to rejoice that it is cancelled; that is, if it be desirable that the orchestra shall be restored to the efficiency that distinguished it when it was placed under the control of its late conductor. Independent of the fact that he was not fitted by experience nor by temperament to lead a symphony orchestra, and independent of the other fact that at the end of his fourth year he was no better fitted for the duty than he was at the beginning of his first, he seemed to be less influenced by devotion to art for art's sake than he was by devotion to self-glorification; hence great composers were trifled with in order that the conductor might become prominent. It seemed as if the orchestra was only considered as a potent means of advertising its conductor. It was as if nothing was to be omitted that might cause the conductor to be talked about. This was, doubtless excellent business tactics, but it was also art insincerity. Some thoughtless or mistakenly-indulgent people admired it; but the judicious grieved. However, it is over now, and it is to be hoped that the next conductor may not be another experiment, but will be chosen from the ranks of those who have won deserved repute. Weingartner and Mottl have been named; but the former is already under a contract that has three years to run, and the latter, though an excellent opera conductor, has failed as a leader of symphony concerts. Then, too, he is a valetudinarian. However, these are not the only conductors in the world who have attained to eminence; and, moreover, while it is perhaps, not unnatural to look in the direction of Germany for a new conductor, there are able and famous conductors elsewhere, even in France. However, it would seem that a drill-master, able to bring the orchestra into proper condition again, will be most needed at the outset. The new conductor will find almost as much to undo as he will find to do.

CYNICISMS.

I HEAR that Walter Damrosch feels very badly that the hundred dollar subscribers to the Nikisch Concerts overlooked his band and talents and went to Boston for something different. Certainly the music at these concerts has been nothing beyond old, well-known selections; but, perhaps, at the third meeting at Mrs. W. C. Whitney's Mr. Nikisch may be inspired by a more attentive audience.

I am surprised that the interest manifested by the press regarding the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, should meet with such disfavor at headquarters. It is a matter in which the public feels great curiosity, and it is but natural that the newspapers should show a desire to gratify it. However, if report is to be believed, every effort made by representatives of the various journals to obtain information on the subject, have been rebuffed without ceremony, and sometimes with a discourtesy that is inexplicable. As I understand it, the press is considered to have no right to ask questions anent the probable conductor of the concerts, on the ground, that it is a private business matter, about which it is an impertinence to inquire. Why private, I cannot imagine. The concerts of the orchestra are publicly advertised season tickets for them are sold at public auction, and tickets that are left over are announced for sale in the public prints. Speculators purchase tickets and sell them at advanced prices, and anybody can go to the box office of Music Hall and purchase an admission ticket for a stipulated price. Under these circumstances, it would seem that these concerts are no more to be viewed in the light of a private enterprise than are the concerts of Gilmore's Band, those of the Spanish Students or of the Hampton Colored Singers. If the public patronage were withdrawn wholly from these concerts, this "private" business could not possibly be carried on save at a tremendous loss of money. I cannot see, therefore, how public concerts can be in any way a private matter. It is true that if the expenditures of the season should exceed the receipts, Mr. Higginson pays the difference out of his own pocket; but even here the course pursued is by no means singular. If the outlay at the Globe Theatre should exceed the money taken during the season, Mr. Stetson meets the loss and pays it, and in this respect Mr. Higginson does no more than does Mr. Stetson or any other proprietor and manager of a public entertainment. When a Prince Esterhazy organizes and supports an orchestra for his own pleasure and that of his friends, and does not call on the public to pay for admission to the concerts, the privacy of the undertaking is unquestionable. Neither the press nor the community at large has any right to busy itself about the matter; but it is otherwise with concerts which, to a certain extent, take on a business aspect. It is true that Mr. Higginson does not make of the Symphony concerts an enterprise by which he hopes to profit pecuniarily; and it is also true that the musical public is under great obligations to him for having established the splendid orchestra over whose destinies he presides. But for his public spirit we should not be able to boast of one of the finest orchestras in the world. Nevertheless, this does not make the concerts private. The public pays liberally for them, to the tune of many thousand dollars, paid mostly in advance; so liberally, in fact, that Mr. Higginson has found the necessity to make up any deficiency, diminish year after year. It is therefore by no might take pride in gaining from a Boston audience, and as he stood beside the flower-bedecked desk preparatory to mounting the high stand he has used so often the orchestra and audience joined their applause and continued it for some minutes.

At the conclusion of the "Eroica" the conductor was applauded and repeated recalls followed his retirement, the demands in this way finally leading him to follow the American fashion and make a farewell speech. In these final words Mr. Nikisch expressed his high appreciation of the kindness shown him in Boston and in all the American cities he had visited. He then paid his respects to the members of the orchestra, speaking of them in the warmest terms and commending them as soldiers whose loyalty he had always felt assured of and with whom he had always found a victory possible. He closed by expressing great regret that his generous patron had been put to so much trouble by his physical inability to complete the season's work on the tour, and said that with his dear friend Kneisel in his place he had full confidence in the continued success of the orchestra.

The opening concert of the 13th season will be given on the evening of Oct. 14 next, and the name of Mr. Nikisch's successor will be officially made public on that or an earlier date.

MUSIC.

The Twenty-Fourth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The 24th and last Symphony concert of the series of '92-'93 was given Saturday evening in Music Hall. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then made his last appearance as conductor of this orchestra.

The programme was as follows: Symphony, D major (Parisian), Mozart; Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schubert; Symphony No. 3, Beethoven.

The air of the hall was hot and foul, so that the concert seemed of interminable length. The programme was one of dignity, and the music might have been more fully enjoyed if the attending atmospheric circumstances had been more congenial. But even bad air could not vitiate the tender melancholy and the unearthly beauty of Schubert's fragment.

It is not necessary, now that Mr. Nikisch is no longer in authority, to write at length concerning the merits or faults of the performance of Saturday evening. The orchestra played as though the members appreciated the dignity of the occasion, and, if unfavorable criticism were to be made, it would chiefly concern itself with the ultra-modern ideas of Mr. Nikisch in regard to the proper pace of a movement. The first movement, for instance, of the Heroic Symphony showed the characteristics of the man. There were occasional great effects, and, on the other hand, the frank simplicity of the composer was turned often into the sentimental affectation of the conductor.

Mr. Nikisch will soon be engaged in a congenial task. He is by nature an operatic conductor; he, a Hungarian, is fully equipped for the duty of conducting opera in a Hungarian town to the delight of a Hungarian audience. Surely there is no one here that will not wish him success in the achievement of this task. May his life, then, be one prolonged Hungarian rhapsody!

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the current season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place in Music Hall, last night. The programme was: Symphony No. 31, in D, Mozart; unfinished symphony, Schubert; "Eroica" Symphony, Beethoven. A very large audience was in attendance. Three symphonies made a somewhat exacting programme to listen to. To review the performances in detail would be only to repeat what we have so often written of the conductor's revised and amended versions of great classical works. The programme afforded him ample opportunities to give a final display of his many faults and his few virtues as a leader. He was warmly received on his first appearance, and was well applauded at different stages of the concert. At the close, curiously enough, there was no demonstration from the public until the orchestra, taking advantage of their last opportunity of the season to applaud, did so heartily, and the audience joining in, continued until Mr. Nikisch was recalled several times. On the last occasion he made a speech, thanking everybody for everything; explained that his ill health prevented him from going to Chicago, and expressed his belief that his dear friend Mr. Kneisel would replace him on the trip, very satisfactorily. The orchestra and the audience applauded again, the season was over, and Mr. Nikisch ceased to be the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. In our next issue we shall give a review of the Symphony Orchestra season.

Gardner

MUSIC.

The Symphony Season.

In summing up the season's work, we think that we do not exaggerate when we affirm that the series of concerts just ended were the most uninteresting that the organization has ever given. The programmes were arranged without judgment. A great deal of music that should not have had a hearing at such concerts was performed, notably the d'Albert Symphony, the Davidoff cello concerto, the Humperdink "Humoresque," the Riemenschneider "Dance of Death," P. Scharwenka's "Frühlingswogen," and the Busoni Symphony "Tone-Poem." In fact, with the exception of Mr. Foote's cantata, "The Skeleton in Armor," Gilson's "La Mer," Miss Lang's Dramatic Overture, Mr. Paine's Columbus March and Hymn, Svensden's "Zorshayda," and Tchaikowsky's E-minor Symphony, these included all the new works that were given. Wagner was represented by ten compositions, Beethoven by nine; Schumann, Liszt, Brahms, Dvorak and Saint-Saëns, by four each; Bach, Haydn and Mozart by two each; and Goldmark, Mendelssohn, Raff and Tchaikowsky by the same number respectively. Weber, Berlioz and MacDowell were heard in three works each. D'Albert, Bizet, Bruch, Busoni, Davidoff, Ernst, Foote, Gade, Gilson, Gounod, Grieg, Lalo, Miss Lang, Moszkowski, Nicolai, Paderewski, Paine, Reinecke, Riemenschneider, Humperdink, Rubinstein, Scharwenka, Spohr, Svensden, Thieroit, Vieuxtemps and Volkmann, had one hearing each. As will be seen, in point of number, Wagner stands at the head of the list, a somewhat queer showing for a symphony concert season. The soloists were: Pianists, Paderewski, F. B. Busoni, George M. Nowell, Fanny Bloomfield-Zelsler, Carl Stasny; the vocalists were, Miss Emma Juch, Mme. Basta-Tavary, Max Heinrich, Priscilla White, Louisa Leimer, Felicia Kaschaska, Mrs. Nikisch, Heinrich Meyn, W. J. Wijnch, and Mr. A. Foote's church choir; the violinists were Henri Marteau and the usual soloists of the orchestra. The symphony chorus, of which so much was promised, and from which so much was expected, was a disastrous failure, and assisted in one of the most bungling and inadequate performances of Beethoven's choral symphony ever heard in this city, after which it fortunately disappeared, to all practical intents and purposes, from view. The playing of the orchestra was, on the whole, of a lower standard of excellence than has characterized it since its earliest years, and its chief successes were achieved in those compositions in which noise predominated. Fortunately the conductor, under whose sway the orchestra has so steadily degenerated, is to control it no longer; and whatever may be the cause that induced him to cancel his engagement, there is every reason to rejoice that it is cancelled; that is, if it be desirable that the orchestra shall be restored to the efficiency that distinguished it when it was placed under the control of its late conductor. Independent of the fact that he was not fitted by experience nor by temperament to lead a symphony orchestra, and independent of the other fact that at the end of his fourth year he was no better fitted for the duty than he was at the beginning of his first, he seemed to be less influenced by devotion to art for art's sake than he was by devotion to self-glorification; hence great composers were trifled with in order that the conductor might become prominent. It seemed as if the orchestra was only considered as a potent means of advertising its conductor. It was as if nothing was to be omitted that might cause the conductor to be talked about. This was, doubtless excellent business tactics, but it was also art insincerity. Some thoughtless or mistakenly-indulgent people admired it; but the judicious grieved. However, it is over now, and it is to be hoped that the next conductor may not be another experiment, but will be chosen from the ranks of those who have won deserved repute. Weingartner and Mottl have been named; but the former is already under a contract that has three years to run, and the latter, though an excellent opera conductor, has failed as a leader of symphony concerts. Then, too, he is a valetudinarian. However, these are not the only conductors in the world who have attained to eminence; and, moreover, while it is perhaps, not unnatural to look in the direction of Germany for a new conductor, there are able and famous conductors elsewhere, even in France. However, it would seem that a drill-master, able to bring the orchestra into proper condition again, will be most needed at the outset. The new conductor will find almost as much to undo as he will find to do.

I HEAR that Walter Damrosch feels very badly that the hundred dollar subscribers to the Nikisch Concerts overlooked his band and talents and went to Boston for something different. Certainly the music at these concerts has been nothing beyond old, well-known selections; but, perhaps, at the third meeting at Mrs. W. C. Whitney's Mr. Nikisch may be inspired by a more attentive audience.

CYNICISMS.

I am surprised that the interest manifested by the press regarding the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, should meet with such disfavor at headquarters. It is a matter in which the public feels great curiosity, and it is but natural that the newspapers should show a desire to gratify it. However, if report is to be believed, every effort made by representatives of the various journals to obtain information on the subject, have been rebuffed without ceremony, and sometimes with a discourtesy that is inexplicable. As I understand it, the press is considered to have no right to ask questions anent the probable conductor of the concerts, on the ground, that it is a private business matter, about which it is an impertinence to inquire. Why private, I cannot imagine. The concerts of the orchestra are publicly advertised season tickets for them are sold at public auction, and tickets that are left over are announced for sale in the public prints. Speculators purchase tickets and sell them at advanced prices, and anybody can go to the box office of Music Hall and purchase an admission ticket for a stipulated price. Under these circumstances, it would seem that these concerts are no more to be viewed in the light of a private enterprise than are the concerts of Gilmore's Band, those of the Spanish Students or of the Hampton Colored Singers. If the public patronage were withdrawn wholly from these concerts, this "private" business could not possibly be carried on save at a tremendous loss of money. I cannot see, therefore, how public concerts can be in any way a private matter. It is true that if the expenditures of the season should exceed the receipts, Mr. Higginson pays the difference out of his own pocket; but even here the course pursued is by no means singular. If the outlay at the Globe Theatre should exceed the money taken during the season, Mr. Stetson meets the loss and pays it, and in this respect Mr. Higginson does no more than does Mr. Stetson or any other proprietor and manager of a public entertainment. When a Prince Esterhazy organizes and supports an orchestra for his own pleasure and that of his friends, and does not call on the public to pay for admission to the concerts, the privacy of the undertaking is unquestionable. Neither the press nor the community at large has any right to busy itself about the matter; but it is otherwise with concerts which, to a certain extent, take on a business aspect. It is true that Mr. Higginson does not make of the Symphony concerts an enterprise by which he hopes to profit pecuniarily; and it is also true that the musical public is under great obligations to him for having established the splendid orchestra over whose destinies he presides. But for his public spirit we should not be able to boast of one of the finest orchestras in the world. Nevertheless, this does not make the concerts private. The public pays liberally for them, to the tune of many thousand dollars, paid mostly in advance; so liberally, in fact, that Mr. Higginson has found the necessity to make up any deficiency, diminish year after year. It is therefore by no means presumptuous in the public to feel an interest in the new conductor of an orchestra to whose support it contributes so bountifully; and it is not impertinent in the press to attempt to obtain information on the subject for its readers. Managers of our various places of amusement, theatrical or musical, are generally well pleased to give the newspapers intelligence regarding their future plans. If they do not think it wise to make them known at once, they do not treat with rudeness the members of the press who go to them in order to obtain information. They do not indulge in the angry use of obfurgatory participial adjectives, and claim that the entertainments which are open to any one of the public who is willing to expend the sum charged for a ticket that entitles him to admission to them, are a private matter with which nobody has any concern except the manager. As a mere matter of fact, the management of the Symphony Orchestra is in nowise different from the management of the Damrosch Orchestra or the Seidl Orchestra, or of the Boston Theatre, or any other management that appeals to the public for pecuniary patronage. The projectors of such entertainments take private risks, and the chances of private losses, but their concerts, their opera performances and their theatrical amusements are unmistakably public. Of course, we shall all know, in due season, who the new conductor is to be. In the interim, and while we burst in ignorance, let us take comfort that there are many other almost equally important things in the world that are quite as well worth the knowing.

CHATTERER.

ANENT CONDUCTORS.

As it appears to us, there is a strong tendency to over-estimate the orchestral conductor in regard to his standing, musically considered. Time was, when the conductor was eminent for more than his capacity to discipline an orchestra; when, in fact, he was generally a composer as well, as may be instanced by Spohr, Mendelssohn, Hiller, Berlioz, Wagner, Rubinstein, Ries, Weber, Lachner, and others; but now the rule is the conductor who is not distinguished as a composer, and whose chief claim to consideration is the skill with which he obtains precision from the players under his control, and the judgment with which he interprets the works that he causes to be performed. That he should receive and enjoy all the credit for the efficiency with which he acquits himself in his position, is beyond question; but that does not include foisting him into an importance wholly out of proportion to any possible deserving on his part. Primarily, he is little more than a metronome, moved by intelligence instead of clockwork. After he has established the technique of his orchestra on a satisfactory basis, the highest point that is open to him to achieve, is to interpret music in harmony with the directions marked by the composer in his score. Some conductors are more capable than others; some conductors are more intelligent; some conductors are more conscientious; some are more conservative, and some are more innovating; but no heed to which of these classes the conductor belongs, he is only a conductor, more or less skilled in his business. Hence, it seems somewhat absurd when we see him made a fetish before whom the public bows in superstitious worship.

It is a sign of musical degeneracy when more stress is laid on the conductor than on the music he interprets; when the office is held in higher consideration than is what it does or, at least, should represent. There is too much of the conductor interposing himself between the public and the music that it assembles to hear; in other words, there is a maximum of conductor and a minimum of composer, to the glorification of the former at the expense of art; whereas a true artistic conscience would inspire an exactly contrary state of affairs, and keep the intelligent metronome in his proper place. It matters not whether it be Richter or Lamoureux, or Damrosch, or Nikisch, the public are inclined to pay more regard to the individual than to what he is called on to do, and to measure his value to the art he represents by their personal feelings toward him. While it is true that one conductor may be more able than another, and is entitled to be appreciated accordingly, that is no reason for overrating him in respect to the place he fills in the ranks of art, which is by no means as splendid and as abstractly authoritative as it is generally considered to be. When a Rubinstein, or a Wagner, or a Berlioz, or a Mendelssohn takes the baton in hand, the genius of the great creative musician imparts a certain weight and interest to his reading of a fine masterpiece, and commands for him respectful consideration; and it would be easy to understand an enthusiastic tribute to the famed composer who also conducts; to appreciate the sentiment that cannot separate the musician from the time-beater; but it is otherwise with the conductor who only conducts. Be this, however, as it may, it has become the fashion to value the conductor much above his highest deserving, and the easy road to fame that is made for him, as well as the excess of appreciation in which he is ignorantly held, simply because he is a conductor, are to be viewed rather in the light of an idle worship of manufactured heroes, than of a very profound love for the art of which he, with the assistance of his orchestra, is an interpreter.

MR. NIKISCH'S CONDUCTING.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has now completed his fourth season, and with it his career, in Boston and given abundant opportunity for judging of his strength as an orchestral conductor. His career here has been in some sense a peculiar one. A musician of thoroughly modern tendencies, he came to us immediately after a period of conducting grand opera in Leipzig, the last stronghold of musical classicism in Germany. He had been a great favorite in Leipzig, where his conspicuous talent for orchestral and operatic conducting was warmly appreciated; indeed, he grew to be familiarly known there as "unser Nikisch," as one of the resident musical powers of whom the city was justly proud. Still one can fancy that his position in Leipzig was not without its drawbacks; he was a modern man, a musical come-outer, one of the new lights, and, as such, somewhat apart from the musical spirit that ruled at the Gewandhaus—and the Gewandhaus has ever been a most potent factor in forming and leading musical opinion in the Saxon city. With all his popularity with the general opera-going public, he must have felt at times that he could not count on perfect sympathy at the musical headquarters of the town, and that there was an unavoidable element of militancy in his general artistic attitude there.

When he severed his connection with the Leipzig Opera and came here to assume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he could feel that that dark background of lukewarm sympathy, or even tacit opposition, no longer existed; he was not only free—that he had always been—but free without having to assert his freedom against a powerful opposing party. If he heard that, in Boston, public musical opinion and taste were pretty evenly divided between classicism and the new ideas, without the adherents of either having anything like an official, or quasi-official, backing, he only heard what was essentially true. His position here bade fair to be of the pleasantest; he had no traditional, ready-made opposition to combat; he was placed in command over a large orchestra which was not only made up of admirable material, but had been left in truly magnificent condition by his predecessor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. He was practically generalissimo, responsible to no one but himself. The outlook seemed the fairest imaginable.

But there were really clouds on his horizon which he probably did not see, which indeed there was little possibility of his seeing. Although there was no official standard of musical opinion here, our public still had its long-formed musical habits and tastes; some of us even had carefully formed opinions and principles. The modern school of musical interpretation, virtually based on Wagner's "Ueber das Dirigieren," was unfamiliar to us, especially in the matter of orchestral performance; we had heard no music at the hands of a conductor of the ultra-modern German school. We had heard visiting pianists of greater or less renown take all sorts of liberties (as we called it) with classic and romantic compositions, but we had not yet heard similar things done on the orchestra. What little eccentricities Mr. Theodore Thomas, for instance, had allowed himself in years gone by, were, on the whole, slight, and had been generally pretty sharply criticised. In the matter of rhythmic freedom, we were still inclined to look upon orchestral performance as standing essentially apart from solo performance.

Now, to these ideas and habits of ours Mr. Nikisch brought a direct slap in the face at the very outset. With no more Gewandhaus frowns to be conscious of, if not to consider, imagining that all weight of opposing opinion was taken off from his shoulders, Mr. Nikisch began outright by throwing the reins upon the neck of his modern-romantic fancy with a vengeance. The effect of his first performance of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan" was that of a sudden and unlooked-for douche of ice-water: we all rubbed our eyes, we could hardly believe our ears. Was it meant seriously, or was it some humorous mystification? We had heard of conducting of the "interpreting" sort, but we had had no notion that it went so far as all that came to. It both surprised and shocked us. That the new conductor should come in for some pretty scathing criticism was no more than natural. Speaking personally, we have now no doubt whatever that Mr. Nikisch's style of performance during his first two years here far overstepped the limits contemplated by Wagner himself when he wrote his "Ueber das Dirigieren."

Soon also another phase of Mr. Nikisch's ultra-modern tendencies came more and more to light. It was not so conspicuous at first, but none the less contrary to our habits, to those of the orchestra, after their five years' experience under Mr. Gericke, and by no means always happy in its results at first. This was that Mr. Nikisch's chief aim at rehearsals was, or seemed to be, not so much to drill the orchestra to play certain compositions in a definitely predetermined and firmly established way, as gradually to transform the orchestra into a great living instrument on which he, the conductor, should be able to play at will, as he would on the key-board of a pianoforte. Ah! that is the ideal! We had heard von Bülow say that, when he conducted at the Hofoper in Munich, he had brought the orchestra to such a pitch of perfection that he "could take utterly different tempi at every performance of 'Tristan,' and the orchestra could follow him as the keys of a pianoforte would obey his fingers;" and now we, too, were to have a conductor who would sway an orchestra as he did, who should not feel himself bound to anything done or said at rehearsal, but should be free at a public performance, and in the very face of an audience, to obey the sudden inspiration of the passing moment. But, somehow, it did not work; at least, not at first. Mr. Nikisch played on the orchestra, but the orchestra would not always respond readily to his touch; the great "pianoforte" seemed at times to have a rather sticky and recalcitrant action. Worst of all,

Mr. Nikisch, feeling the desired effect hang fire, would at times try to get it quand même, by piling on the agonies and exaggerating it. He could not bring himself to do what every actor, singer, or other performer should be able to do when necessary: stand by calmly and see an effect miss fire, without trying to save it by botching. In truth, it takes an enormous amount of drilling to get an orchestra into such form that the conductor can play on it at will; and, during the first two years or so, the Symphony Orchestra was not sufficiently in touch with Mr. Nikisch for him to be able to try such experiments with perfect safety. We all hoped the time would come; but hope deferred began to make the heart grow sick. Not a little of the adverse criticism that was showered upon Mr. Nikisch was traceable to this; it became evident that the orchestra, for the time being at least, was playing with less accuracy of ensemble than formerly.

But, in spite of these drawbacks, the man very soon showed unmistakable signs of something not far removed from genius; certain performances of his were utterly, and well-nigh unprecedentedly, superb. His personal magnetism was enormous, and he knew well how to impart his enthusiasm to the orchestra. Few listeners will ever forget the positively tremendous effect he produced in the finale of Beethoven's C minor symphony by making the horns launch forth as he did upon the second theme; it was overwhelming. In the overture to "Tannhäuser," and afterwards in that to "Rienzi," he did equally splendid things. It was noticeable, too, that he gave certain passages in cantilena with a grace and buoyancy of phrasing quite new here. It could only be urged that this peculiar grace was obtained at the expense of a slackening of the tempo which was open to objection.

Among his great performances, too, were to be numbered certain works in which mere vigor in working up a climax, and an occasional bit of gracefully-phrased cantilena, were by no means enough in themselves to fill the bill; works the adequate performance of which demands far higher and rarer artistic qualities, great sustained power, intellectual force, and a noble totality of conception. Among compositions of this sort Brahms's C minor symphony stands conspicuous; Mr. Nikisch's performance of this stupendous work passed the limits of ordinary, or even extraordinary, excellence; it deserved to be called truly great.

As time wore on, too, it was noticeable that Mr. Nikisch's "modern-romantic" style of interpreting compositions—especially the works of classic masters—became less excessive; his modifications of tempo and rhythm were better graded and less exaggerated than before. He, to be sure, still held fast by certain fads of the new school, such as very slow, or else extraordinarily fast, allegros; but his tempi, as a rule, showed greater stability and were less erratic. To our mind, the "slow llegro" is nothing more than a modern fashion, brought about by a revulsion of feeling against the rather perfunctory-sounding tempo giusto, dear to the hearts of conductors of the old school. All sorts of influences may have determined the growth of this fashion. Pianists found that many a classic movement could well be taken a little slower on the full-toned modern piano-fortes than the tempo marked by the composers, who had the thinner-toned, older instruments in view; this was not without its reaction upon orchestral conductors, who began to take certain quick movements a shade slower than of yore. The general and ever increasing desire for an expressive style of performance also had much to do with it; it is far easier to produce expressive effects of phrasing and shading when you are not too hurried; it takes the most consummate virtuosity to do things rapidly and expressively at the same time. Again, the more moderate Wagnerians, those whose profound admiration for the Bayreuth master and his ideas did not lessen their faith in the glories of classic music, may (or must?) often have felt an instinctive desire to prove to their more extreme and thoroughgoing modern brethren that there was still young life in the older things, by doing their best to "cut off the pig-tail" from Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, and make their works sound as modern as possible. Indeed, it is not a little curious how the whole "modern" question in music (Wagnerian or otherwise) has made Beethoven the very central figure in the discussion; as Riehl said, everyone insists upon setting up his own Beethoven. The advocates of every possible school seem to think that they have found a knock-down argument to floor their opponents withal, if they can only succeed in proving that they have Beethoven on their side; so they set to work forthwith to cook up their Beethoven to suit themselves. To extend the process to Mozart and Haydn, or even to old Handel and Bach, is easy; and profitable in so far as it helps to show that these masters were not so very far behind Beethoven, after all. And it may truly be said that, artistically unfortunate as this dressing up the old masters in modern trappings is, the only deception practised in the matter is, after all, but a self-deception. The true artist trusts his own feelings more than he does tradition; at all events, let him have the grace to study tradition as he will, his own artistic instincts are the court of final appeal, the decision of which he is bound to carry out. So, if his instincts are inveterately modern, the feeling that "Beethoven must have intended" this or that becomes unconquerable.

Indeed we think, now that we can look back calmly upon Mr. Nikisch's career in Boston, that his tendency to exaggerate, distort and generally modernize the musical expression of the classic masters, together with that of Mendelssohn and Schumann, should by no means be regarded as a purely individual matter; in his interpretations he showed himself an adherent of a large, influential and respectable school—if numbers, sincerity of aim, and undoubted artistic force can give respectability. Personally, we abhor the tendency; the very fact that it is a characteristic factor of the general musical spirit of the present day seems to us almost enough, in itself, to prove that it is essentially discrepant with the reigning musical spirit of bygone times. Had the older composers been actuated and inspired by the same spirit that we are now, they would have written just such music as we do. The style of performance and the style of composition of any given epoch invariably and inevitably go hand in hand.

Mr. Nikisch's way of interpreting music of all schools has been called "operatic." It takes some courage for a critic to apply this term to the doings of a man who is perfectly well and generally known to have conducted opera, and little, if anything, else, for several years before he came out here; for any fool might reply, "You only call him operatic because you know he has conducted opera"—and some other fool might believe him. Still, the term seems to us particularly felicitous; it fits Mr. Nikisch to a T. His characteristic bent is distinctly operatic. Dramatic would perhaps have been a pleasanter word, but as opera is the best and most universally recognized form of dramatic music, we prefer operatic. In his whole mental attitude, in the finest and surest effects he produced, in the class of effects of which he was most fond, Mr. Nikisch seemed to bring with him a reflection from the foot-lights; he had the sweeping breadth of stroke, the uncompromising directness of appeal, the fondness for sharp contrasts and flamboyant coloring that belongs to the lyric stage. He was not a man for half-tints and innuendoes; he seemed happiest when doing something tremendous. He would often keep this instinct in abeyance; but ever and anon it would crop out and show itself. Perhaps the most striking instance of his giving it full vent was his conducting of Schumann's D minor symphony; the effect he produced with this work was simply astounding—and, to us, not entirely fine. Yet, with and in spite of all this, we say heartily that he has given some of the finest, if not the very finest, performances here of certain things that we have ever heard anywhere. The man had the true artist fire in him, and that, too, in no mean degree; nothing but genuine temperamental force and vigor could accomplish the great things he did. When at his best, he was simply glorious.

MR. NIKISCH'S LAST CONCERT.

Not to Accompany the Symphony Orchestra On its Tour.

Mr. Nikisch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided to wield the baton over that organization for the last time next Saturday evening. This is the end of the Boston series of symphony concerts, but not of the year's work embraced in his contract with Col. Higginson, as three weeks of travel, including two important concerts at the world's fair, remain.

Mr. Nikisch has had the right to sunder his connection at any time, and at the beginning of this week gave Col. Higginson notice of his decision not to accompany the orchestra on its tour, assigning as his reason an apprehension of ill health. It appears, however, that the director offered on certain conditions to fill out his season—which conditions Mr. Higginson found totally inadmissible—and which, moreover, of course could offer no guarantee that Mr. Nikisch's health would be such that he could travel to the West.

The question as to who will conduct the orchestra on its tour remains open for the present, but probably the task will devolve naturally on Mr. Kneisel, the leader of the violins.

ELEVATION OF KNEISEL.

Shall He Be Symphony Conductor?

Musicians Discuss Our Suggestion.

He Is Competent, But Might Not Like It.

At present musical Boston is in a turmoil of surmises over the conductor who must be chosen for the Symphony Orchestra before another season.

There is a homely proverb which inculcates the impropriety of too much curiosity concerning a gift, and some genial members of our musical fraternity seem inclined to refer to it on the sly. The grounds for this is that, as the public fails to entirely pay the expenses of the Symphony, and Colonel Higginson generously supplies the $15,000 per year which is lacking, the subject might be left entirely to him without comment. A distinguished artist so expresses himself.

But as it is the public which listens to the music, and would probably be willing to pay higher prices for the privilege, it judges that the matter does concern it, and so persists in discussing it.

The names of several distinguished European conductors have been mentioned. The leading one, after it was learned that Hans Richter could not leave Vienna, has seemed to be that of Felix Weingartner, the principal opera and concert conductor of Berlin.

The Traveller has, however, been informed on good authority that Weingartner has engaged to go to Munich in '94. It is evident that then, if not before, Levi, who is now in Munich, will leave, as he would not take any other place in that city, and therefore may be available for Boston. If Weingartner should not go to Munich possibly he would come to America.

34

Among other available names are Sucher, who has been at Hamburg and Edmannsdorfer, recently at Moscow, who have not been mentioned before.

Felix Mottl, now conducting at Karlsruhe, is the last one reported to have received an offer from the Symphony Orchestra management, but he has been so earnestly urged to remain that it is thought he may decline.

The list of available European conductors has by no means been exhausted yet, but musical sentiment and attainment have risen so high in America that some are beginning to look about at home.

The Traveller in a recent editorial, was the first to point out the brilliant possibilities involved in the recognition of our own home talent, and the first to name Franz Kneisel in this connection.

Something About Kneisel.

Franz Kneisel was born in Bucharest, Roumania, 28 years ago. He studied in Vienna and was concert master there of the Royal Burg Theatre until he removed to Berlin where he was concert master of the Bilse Orchestra until he was brought to Boston by Gericke to take Listemann's vacant place some seven years ago.

Since then his violin playing has been a chief attraction to the frequenters of the Symphony, and he stands as probably the finest violin soloist in the country.

The Kneisel Quartet, which he has organized and conducted during the most of this time, has won a distinguished place in the favor of the people, and the enthusiastic praise of the most critical and refined musicians. To succeed in chamber music is a delicate task. In this enterprise Mr. Kneisel has demonstrated the delicacy and refinement of his artistic tastes and his ability to choose judiciously from both modern and classical works.

Mr. Kneisel as a musician is universally praised, but Mr. Kneisel as a conductor is a different thing.

Not only is the proposition a surprise to the musical fraternity, but the opportunity to judge of his qualifications for conducting has been very limited, and aside from the merits of the question, every one is reluctant to speak where they know it will not affect results.

Nevertheless, it is only a work of justice for the public to consider the possibilities of real talent among us, even though the trumpets have not been started by the arts of puffing, fortunate circumstances, or the exhausting toil of a lifetime.

What Musicians Say.

The Traveller representative has seen many of Boston's musical leaders, and has gathered quite a clear consensus of opinion.

George L. Osgood expresses himself as delighted with the great violinist's management of the Kneisel Quartet. Arthur Foote says he has shown first-rate ability. Otto Roth is enthusiastic in praise of him as a musician, but says he would himself probably prefer the freedom of a soloist to any conductorship. More than one spoke of his conducting when Nikisch was sick as recalling the finish of Gericke's work. A noted composer considered that it showed the ability to enforce obedience as well as executive qualities.

Mr. Kneisel has had other experience in directing in this country. For six weeks he led the promenade concerts at Music Hall, and also led at the Worcester festivals under Carl Zerrahn. But it is maintained that these circumstances and brief extent of these occasions furnish no data by which to judge of his ability to direct an orchestra for a whole season. Indeed, some dissatisfaction with the coolness of his style has been expressed, but it is only to be expected that there would be a difference of tastes.

The idea has been expressed that the Symphony Orchestra would not be pleased to have one of their own number elevated above them, but on the other hand it might be assumed that they would be proud to see such possibilities before their ranks, and would be glad to loyally build up the reputation of one from their ranks. "His success in handling the orchestra would depend entirely on the spirit and ability he might bring to the task," says one musician.

Only One Way.

After all, the only way to discover a director is to give some one a chance to try, and the Boston public might well afford to take the creating of a musical reputation into its own hands, rather than to continue to accept them ready-made from abroad. They must be made somewhere.

Meanwhile, no one knows what the probabilities of the situation are, and the outcome is awaited with intense interest.

The orchestra will make quite a tour under Mr. Kneisel's direction, reaching Chicago between two and three weeks from now, when it will play in the series of fair concerts. This is a grand opportunity for both orchestra and leader, and if they make a good impression, Boston may find itself a little late in creating a reputation.

That Mr. Higginson has great confidence in Kneisel is evidenced by the latest intelligence concerning him. It is understood that as Mr. Nikisch has declined to conduct the symphony orchestra after this evening, Mr. Kneisel will conduct in its Western tour. This, of course, includes its appearance at the Chicago Fair.

35

FRANZ KNEISEL.

SOLOIST:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

THE LATE SYMPHONY SEASON.

To the Editor of the Transcript: After waiting a reasonable length of time, since the departure of Herr Nikisch, for the calming doom of prejudice for or against, permit me, as a representative of a large following, to offer a few words about the criticisms on this our last conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It might well be said, at the outset, that, owing to the peculiar way in which Boston obtains the advantage of hearing this orchestra, criticisms are, in a measure, out of place. We should take the good the gods provide, pay for it and be thankful. But as some adverse criticisms offered by some ancient and honorable parties have appeared on the eve of Mr. Nikisch's departure, it is in order for laymen to make a few remarks. I speak for the great mass of people who have been the mainstay and support of this enterprise, when I say that the administration just ended has, on the whole, been one of great satisfaction. To one who has been a constant attendant upon this series of concerts this fact stands out clear and beyond dispute. The comfort and enjoyment of Music Hall crowds has been too apparent to deny this. I leave out the rehearsal performances which are said to have been attended by those who went because it was the proper thing to do. I venture to say that the thought in the minds of the Saturday night audiences was not whether this or that portion of the programme should have been first or last; whether this or that piece should not have been in the group of composers for that particular evening; whether this or that movement should have been taken at a little faster or a little slower tempo because some moss-covered bigwig performed it that way forty or fifty years ago. It was beyond all question not a part of the troubles of those audiences. I never witnessed more thoroughly satisfied people in my life, and my experience dates back forty years.

When such one-sided partisan expressions, therefore, as have been lately printed regarding these concerts appear, one is constrained to ask if these critics really believe the great public looks up to them as superior beings, or cares at all for their learned inflictions. No, the great, loving heart of the public gives the true verdict on the power of music to reach the soul, and the great public has unmistakably indorsed what has been given to it the past season, and such indorsed notes are good.

It is not my purpose to enter into any hair-splitting discussion of minor matters. Our retiring conductor may have made some errors—few there be who never have—but I venture the prediction that in later years the administration of Mr. Nikisch will be quoted as one of the most pleasing, dignified and satisfactory of all that have preceded him. His graceful personality, his quiet, gentlemanly movements when at his place before the orchestra, his restfulness, his every motion a picture—these will linger long in the memory of those who attended the concerts given under his baton. These remarks have not been inspired by any personal regard. I never had the pleasure of meeting Mr.

Nikisch, but I have attended the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra since the beginning, when Mr. Higginson so nobly inaugurated a series of entertainments that forever links his name with good and uplifting deeds, and by which Boston, aye, and the whole country, is rendered his debtor for all time.

One word in evidence of my statements and I have done. After three seasons of Mr. Nikisch, giving ample opportunity to study him and his methods, the sale of seats for his last season, as it proved to be, was as strong an endorsement of the man and his abilities as any shrewd financier could wish. Fortunate Boston, if she secures another as satisfactory!

WARREN.

WILL IT BE MOTTL.

Reported Now That the Famous Karlsruhe Conductor Has Been Called to Succeed Nikisch.

And now it is said that Felix Mottl, the famous musical conductor of Karlsruhe, has received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra management to take the place made vacant by the resignation of Arthur Nikisch. But it is added that so many appeals have been made to Mottl to induce him to remain in Karlsruhe that it is thought he may decline the offer to go to America.

Mottl was born Aug. 29, 1856, at Unter-St. Veit, near Vienna. He was a pupil of the Vienna Conservatory. In 1881 he was called to Karlsruhe to take charge of the opera orchestra. In 1886 he refused a call to Berlin. In the same year he directed at Baireuth with great success. Of late his health has been poor, and he has directed at rare intervals in different German cities. Mottl has written an opera, "Agnes Bernauer," performed at Weimar, 1880.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Franz Kneisel, starts on its seventh annual spring trip Tuesday evening.

The party will number 78, and will travel in three special Wagner sleeping cars. The first concert will be given in Rochester on Wednesday evening, the second in Buffalo the following evening, and two concerts with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg on Friday and Saturday, will close the first week.

The second week will include concerts in Cleveland, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati, the latter in charge of the Ladies' Musical Club, and closes with two concerts in Louisville. The orchestra arrives in Chicago on Sunday morning, May 14, and will give, by special invitation of the music committee of the World's fair two matinee concerts on Monday and Tuesday, May 15 and 16.

From Chicago the tour includes Grand Rapids, a concert with the Arion Society in Milwaukee, then the great musical event of the season at Ann Arbor University, with an audience of nearly 3000, and the trip closes on Saturday evening, May 20, in Detroit, the concert being under the auspices of the Detroit Musical Society. The orchestra will arrive in Boston on Monday morning, May 22.

All arrangements for the trip have been made by Manager Charles A. Ellis, and his assistant, Fred R. Comee, accompanies the party throughout the tour. Former experiences warrant confidence in the complete success of the coming tour.

Comment upon the final concert of the Boston season, at Music Hall last evening, will be found in another column.

NIKISCH'S FORFEIT.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH closed his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and in consequence his American career, on Saturday night last at Music Hall, Boston, where he directed the last concert of that organization. The end came rather abruptly, as it was originally proposed to round up Mr. Nikisch's engagement with a Western tournee, including the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on the Exposition grounds at Chicago on May 15 and 16, but Mr. Nikisch's state of health did not warrant any extension of his work beyond last Saturday night. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master, will in all probability conduct the concerts in the West, although there may be some difficulty in the proper adjustment of these performances, as it was no doubt understood that Mr. Nikisch was to be the conductor.

The latter gentleman forfeits $5,000 in ending the contract as he does, but it is best to let him speak as he did to THE MUSICAL COURIER on Friday afternoon:

"My contract with Mr. Higginson, unlike European contracts, contains no exemption clause covering the possibility of illness," said Mr. Nikisch, "and I was to have received $3,000 for the Western tour, and as a forfeit of $5,000 is stipulated in case the contract is broken by me, and as I have agreed to and will pay to the representative of Mr. Higginson the $5,000 to-morrow, my loss through my inability to continue these labors amounts to $8,000. Feeling as I do, and finding that there is no such exemption clause in the contract, I could not risk the tedious tour and suddenly find myself incapacitated and thereby compelled to lose this sum anyhow. Had the Western tour disabled me I should have had the fatiguing work and travel without any compensation."

"Mrs. Nikisch and I shall therefore leave for Europe in a week or two. I find no fault whatever with Mr. Higginson and his decision to insist upon the fulfillment of the terms of the contract, and I never paid money more willingly than I do this $5,000, although it leaves me in the same financial condition as if I had not succeeded in accumulating anything here; that is to say, my four years' work was from that point of view fruitless.

"Who my successor will be? Oh, I do not know and have no means of ascertaining."

There are many glittering appearances surrounding the place occupied by Mr. Nikisch, but considering the demands made upon a cultured musician and gentleman, such as Mr. Nikisch is, and his social en-

THE LATE SYMPHONY SEASON.

To the Editor of the Transcript: After waiting a reasonable length of time, since the departure of Herr Nikisch, for the calming doom of prejudice for or against, permit me, as a representative of a large following, to offer a few words about the criticisms on this our last conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It might well be said, at the outset, that, owing to the peculiar way in which Boston obtains the advantage of hearing this orchestra, criticisms are, in a measure, out of place. We should take the good the gods provide, pay for it and be thankful. But as some adverse criticisms offered by some ancient and honorable parties have appeared on the eve of Mr. Nikisch's departure, it is in order for laymen to make a few remarks. I speak for the great mass of people who have been the mainstay and support of this enterprise, when I say that the administration just ended has, on the whole, been one of great satisfaction. To one who has been a constant attendant upon this series of concerts this fact stands out clear and beyond dispute. The comfort and enjoyment of Music Hall crowds has been too apparent to deny this. I leave out the rehearsal performances which are said to have been attended by those who went because it was the proper thing to do. I venture to say that the thought in the minds of the Saturday night audiences was not whether this or that portion of the programme should have been first or last; whether this or that piece should not have been in the group of composers for that particular evening; whether this or that movement should have been taken at a little faster or a little slower tempo because some moss-covered bigwig performed it that way forty or fifty years ago. It was beyond all question not a part of the troubles of those audiences. I never witnessed more thoroughly satisfied people in my life, and my experience dates back forty years.

When such one-sided partisan expressions, therefore, as have been lately printed regarding these concerts appear, one is constrained to ask if these critics really believe the great public looks up to them as superior beings, or cares at all for their learned inflictions. No, the great, loving heart of the public gives the true verdict on the power of music to reach the soul, and the great public has unmistakably indorsed what has been given to it the past season, and such indorsed notes are good.

It is not my purpose to enter into any hair-splitting discussion of minor matters. Our retiring conductor may have made some errors—few there be who never have—but I venture the prediction that in later years the administration of Mr. Nikisch will be quoted as one of the most pleasing, dignified and satisfactory of all that have preceded him. His graceful personality, his quiet, gentlemanly movements when at his place before the orchestra, his restfulness, his every motion a picture—these will linger long in the memory of those who attended the concerts given under his baton. These remarks have not been inspired by any personal regard. I never had the pleasure of meeting Mr.

Nikisch, but I have attended the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra since the beginning, when Mr. Higginson so nobly inaugurated a series of entertainments that forever links his name with good and uplifting deeds, and by which Boston, aye, and the whole country, is rendered his debtor for all time.

One word in evidence of my statements and I have done. After three seasons of Mr. Nikisch, giving ample opportunity to study him and his methods, the sale of seats for his last season, as it proved to be, was as strong an endorsement of the man and his abilities as any shrewd financier could wish. Fortunate Boston, if she secures another as satisfactory!

WARREN.

WILL IT BE MOTTL.

Reported Now That the Famous Karlsruhe Conductor Has Been Called to Succeed Nikisch.

And now it is said that Felix Mottl, the famous musical conductor of Karlsruhe, has received an offer from the Boston Symphony Orchestra management to take the place made vacant by the resignation of Arthur Nikisch. But it is added that so many appeals have been made to Mottl to induce him to remain in Karlsruhe that it is thought he may decline the offer to go to America.

Mottl was born Aug. 29, 1856, at Unter-St. Veit, near Vienna. He was a pupil of the Vienna Conservatory. In 1881 he was called to Karlsruhe to take charge of the opera orchestra. In 1886 he refused a call to Berlin. In the same year he directed at Baireuth with great success. Of late his health has been poor, and he has directed at rare intervals in different German cities. Mottl has written an opera, "Agnes Bernauer," performed at Weimar, 1880.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Franz Kneisel, starts on its seventh annual spring trip Tuesday evening.

The party will number 78, and will travel in three special Wagner sleeping cars. The first concert will be given in Rochester on Wednesday evening, the second in Buffalo the following evening, and two concerts with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg on Friday and Saturday, will close the first week.

The second week will include concerts in Cleveland, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati, the latter in charge of the Ladies' Musical Club, and closes with two concerts in Louisville. The orchestra arrives in Chicago on Sunday morning, May 14, and will give, by special invitation of the music committee of the World's fair two matinee concerts on Monday and Tuesday, May 15 and 16.

From Chicago the tour includes Grand Rapids, a concert with the Arion Society in Milwaukee, then the great musical event of the season at Ann Arbor University, with an audience of nearly 3000, and the trip closes on Saturday evening, May 20, in Detroit, the concert being under the auspices of the Detroit Musical Society. The orchestra will arrive in Boston on Monday morning, May 22.

All arrangements for the trip have been made by Manager Charles A. Ellis, and his assistant, Fred R. Comee, accompanies the party throughout the tour. Former experiences warrant confidence in the complete success of the coming tour.

Comment upon the final concert of the Boston season, at Music Hall last evening, will be found in another column.

NIKISCH'S FORFEIT.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH closed his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and in consequence his American career, on Saturday night last at Music Hall, Boston, where he directed the last concert of that organization. The end came rather abruptly, as it was originally proposed to round up Mr. Nikisch's engagement with a Western tournee, including the two concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall on the Exposition grounds at Chicago on May 15 and 16, but Mr. Nikisch's state of health did not warrant any extension of his work beyond last Saturday night. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the concert master, will in all probability conduct the concerts in the West, although there may be some difficulty in the proper adjustment of these performances, as it was no doubt understood that Mr. Nikisch was to be the conductor.

The latter gentleman forfeits $5,000 in ending the contract as he does, but it is best to let him speak as he did to THE MUSICAL COURIER on Friday afternoon:

"My contract with Mr. Higginson, unlike European contracts, contains no exemption clause covering the possibility of illness," said Mr. Nikisch, "and I was to have received $3,000 for the Western tour, and as a forfeit of $5,000 is stipulated in case the contract is broken by me, and as I have agreed to and will pay to the representative of Mr. Higginson the $5,000 to-morrow, my loss through my inability to continue these labors amounts to $8,000. Feeling as I do, and finding that there is no such exemption clause in the contract, I could not risk the tedious tour and suddenly find myself incapacitated and thereby compelled to lose this sum anyhow. Had the Western tour disabled me I should have had the fatiguing work and travel without any compensation."

"Mrs. Nikisch and I shall therefore leave for Europe in a week or two. I find no fault whatever with Mr. Higginson and his decision to insist upon the fulfillment of the terms of the contract, and I never paid money more willingly than I do this $5,000, although it leaves me in the same financial condition as if I had not succeeded in accumulating anything here; that is to say, my four years' work was from that point of view fruitless."

"Who my successor will be? Oh, I do not know and have no means of ascertaining."

There are many glittering appearances surrounding the place occupied by Mr. Nikisch, but considering the demands made upon a cultured musician and gentleman, such as Mr. Nikisch is, and his social environment in Boston, the pecuniary net results are not exactly encouraging. There is virtually no cessation to the work of a conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its many Public Rehearsals and Concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, other New England cities, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and the annual Western tour. The private rehearsals necessary to keep the repertory in condition take up a considerable portion of every week, and add to this the public performances, and it will be found that the work is, as we say, incessant.

318

It may have been possible that Mr. Higginson retreated from the literal interpretation of his contract with Mr. Nikisch; but this is somewhat doubtful. The payment of that sum consequently signified that Mr. Nikisch had returned to the owner of the Boston Symphony Orchestra all of his earthly possessions and all that he had saved as the result of his four years of work—surely not an encouraging aspect of affairs for those who have the ambition to succeed Mr. Nikisch.

Foreign conductors who come here under the tempting influences of what appears as a great emolument frequently forget the relatively high cost of living as compared with the expenses of a family in such a continental city as Buda-Pesth, which will be Mr. Nikisch's home. To meet the exigencies imposed by Boston's social functions compels an outlay that diminishes the salary of a symphony conductor to a mere cipher. Mr. Nikisch did of course not know this nor can his inexperienced successor be aware of it. The $5,000 supposed to have been paid by Mr. Nikisch to Mr. Higginson on Saturday might be properly applied as an emergency fund for symphony conductors who are unacquainted with the style and cost of living in large American cities.

Was it not queer that the orchestra as a whole did not stay to hear the farewell speech of Conductor Nikisch Saturday evening? When, addressing the audience, he paid a compliment to the efforts of the orchestra and turned to bow his acknowledgments, lo! the orchestra had vanished for the most part, only a little handful of the musicians remaining, and not one of them manifesting any emotion or enthusiasm.

Nikisch kept on with his little speech just the same, and brought it to a close with a little dramatic flourish as he laid his hand on his breast and thanked the audience "with all his heart."

THERE MUST BE PROMPTNESS.

Colonel Higginson Again Gives the Reasons for the Need of Immediate Subscriptions to the Music Hall Fund.

Colonel Henry L. Higginson today makes another statement of the imperative reasons for prompt subscriptions to the fund for the new music hall. Unless public-spirited citizens at once accept the burden of responsibility for the erection of the proposed great building, there will be no more Symphony concerts. Colonel Higginson writes:

Boston, June 20.

To the Editor of the Transcript: In order to avoid any mistake in the minds of the public as to the new hall for music, of which you have so kindly spoken during the past week, and of my relation to it, I ask leave to make the following statement:

I must engage a conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if at all, for five years, and musicians for one or more years, and before doing this we must be sure of a hall in which to play. Still further, these engagements must be made at once, as the musicians cannot wait longer. In all probability the present Music Hall will be taken by the city within a year for the new street, and in any case it cannot be relied on for more than one season. There is no other hall in Boston which would fill the place of Music Hall for large concerts.

It has been a great pleasure for the past twelve years to plan for, to work for, and to support the Symphony Orchestra, which is the outcome of much artistic skill, knowledge, and long persistent work on the part of the musicians. No good orchestra can be got in any other way. I shall gladly carry on my work as regards the orchestra if a good hall be provided for it, but only on that condition.

The orchestra has this year reached a self supporting stage, which it may or may not keep, for there is always a considerable risk each year as to the receipts. During these past years the total deficit has been large; but the expenses must always be met, and this risk falls on me and may be fairly considered my share.

May I suggest that a new hall can readily and without much greater expense be built so as to be used for opera, and thus command a larger rental; it may well have open boxes, as in the Carnegie Hall in New York, and seats of various grades and at different prices. At the present time it is very difficult to get any theatre in Boston for opera, or other large occasional entertainments.

Every considerable city in our country has some such hall, and it is for the citizens of Boston and its neighborhood to decide whether they care enough for music in its different forms to build this hall, and for them to decide at once if they wish to keep the orchestra. Money will be wanted for the building later in the year, but the promise of it is needed now.

The building must be ready for use, so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned, in October, 1894.

To sum up: The public may be sure that to make a good orchestra, much work, much time and much expense are required. All these elements have been contributed, and we have the orchestra as it now stands. Shall we keep it, or lose it for want of a proper hall? The decision cannot be postponed beyond a few days. Unless within that time a new hall is assured, I must disband the orchestra and finally abandon the symphony concerts.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

SHALL BOSTON HAVE A MUSIC HALL OR NOT?

The connoisseurs of music in Boston generally appreciate the impending crisis in our means of musical enjoyment, the items of which are the demolition of the Music Hall and the dismemberment of the Symphony Orchestra. As chance will have it, however, they among us who are best able to appreciate the splendid opportunities for musical gratification the Symphony concerts afford are, as a rule, precisely the ones who are the least able to furnish the means for a new home for the orchestra. There are, however, citizens who possess both wealth and musical taste and who can sympathize with other music lovers in their anxiety over Mr. Higginson's present dilemma. There is but one way, however, to give expression to that sympathy, and that is to subscribe for stock in the new concert hall which must be built in order to save the orchestra. Furthermore, the emergency is pressing. Unless positive assurance that the hall will be built is in the hands of those who have already made a good start in this matter, within a week, the Symphony Orchestra will cease to be an institution and the city will also be without a proper, well-fitted, adequate hall for other high class concerts that demand a large apartment.

MUSIC HALL MELODIES.

I.

Sing a song of sixpence, a pocket full of gold,
Just in time the pocket 's filled as full as it can hold!

When the pocket 's opened, the birds 'll begin to sing.

Oh, won't it be a merry hall, about a year from spring!

II.

The treasurer in counting-room
Is counting up his money,
The people down towards Chester Park
Are eating bread and honey.

III.

Hippity-hop to the Symphony shop
To buy a stick of candy!
One for you and one for me,
The shares will all come handy.

IV.

Little Bopeep won't lose her sheep!
Rehearsal days will find 'em
Still tooting away, an orchestra gay
With Beethoven up behind 'em!

environment in Boston, the pecuniary net results are not exactly encouraging. There is virtually no cessation to the work of a conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its many Public Rehearsals and Concerts in Boston, Cambridge, Providence, other New England cities, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and the annual Western tour. The private rehearsals necessary to keep the repertory in condition take up a considerable portion of every week, and add to this the public performances, and it will be found that the work is, as we say, incessant.

It may have been possible that Mr. Higginson retreated from the literal interpretation of his contract with Mr. Nikisch; but this is somewhat doubtful. The payment of that sum consequently signified that Mr. Nikisch had returned to the owner of the Boston Symphony Orchestra all of his earthly possessions and all that he had saved as the result of his four years of work—surely not an encouraging aspect of affairs for those who have the ambition to succeed Mr. Nikisch.

Foreign conductors who come here under the tempting influences of what appears as a great emolument frequently forget the relatively high cost of living as compared with the expenses of a family in such a continental city as Buda-Pesth, which will be Mr. Nikisch's home. To meet the exigencies imposed by Boston's social functions compels an outlay that diminishes the salary of a symphony conductor to a mere cipher. Mr. Nikisch did of course not know this nor can his inexperienced successor be aware of it. The $5,000 supposed to have been paid by Mr. Nikisch to Mr. Higginson on Saturday might be properly applied as an emergency fund for symphony conductors who are unacquainted with the style and cost of living in large American cities.

Was it not queer that the orchestra as a whole did not stay to hear the farewell speech of Conductor Nikisch Saturday evening? When, addressing the audience, he paid a compliment to the efforts of the orchestra and turned to bow his acknowledgments, lo! the orchestra had vanished for the most part, only a little handful of the musicians remaining, and not one of them manifesting any emotion or enthusiasm.

Nikisch kept on with his little speech just the same, and brought it to a close with a little dramatic flourish as he laid his hand on his breast and thanked the audience "with all his heart."

THERE MUST BE PROMPTNESS.

Colonel Higginson Again Gives the Reasons for the Need of Immediate Subscriptions to the Music Hall Fund.

Colonel Henry L. Higginson today makes another statement of the imperative reasons for prompt subscriptions to the fund for the new music hall. Unless public-spirited citizens at once accept the burden of responsibility for the erection of the proposed great building, there will be no more Symphony concerts. Colonel Higginson writes:

BOSTON, June 20.

To the Editor of the Transcript: In order to avoid any mistake in the minds of the public as to the new hall for music, of which you have so kindly spoken during the past week, and of my relation to it, I ask leave to make the following statement:

I must engage a conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, if at all, for five years, and musicians for one or more years, and before doing this we must be sure of a hall in which to play. Still further, these engagements must be made at once, as the musicians cannot wait longer. In all probability the present Music Hall will be taken by the city within a year for the new street, and in any case it cannot be relied on for more than one season. There is no other hall in Boston which would fill the place of Music Hall for large concerts.

It has been a great pleasure for the past twelve years to plan for, to work for, and to support the Symphony Orchestra, which is the outcome of much artistic skill, knowledge, and long persistent work on the part of the musicians. No good orchestra can be got in any other way. I shall gladly carry on my work as regards the orchestra if a good hall be provided for it, but only on that condition.

The orchestra has this year reached a self supporting stage, which it may or may not keep, for there is always a considerable risk each year as to the receipts. During these past years the total deficit has been large; but the expenses must always be met, and this risk falls on me and may be fairly considered my share.

May I suggest that a new hall can readily and without much greater expense be built so as to be used for opera, and thus command a larger rental; it may well have open boxes, as in the Carnegie Hall in New York, and seats of various grades and at different prices. At the present time it is very difficult to get any theatre in Boston for opera, or other large occasional entertainments.

Every considerable city in our country has some such hall, and it is for the citizens of Boston and its neighborhood to decide whether they care enough for music in its different forms to build this hall, and for them to decide at once if they wish to keep the orchestra. Money will be wanted for the building later in the year, but the promise of it is needed now.

The building must be ready for use, so far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned, in October, 1894.

To sum up: The public may be sure that to make a good orchestra, much work, much time and much expense are required. All these elements have been contributed, and we have the orchestra as it now stands. Shall we keep it, or lose it for want of a proper hall? The decision cannot be postponed beyond a few days. Unless within that time a new hall is assured, I must disband the orchestra and finally abandon the symphony concerts.

HENRY L. HIGGINSON.

SHALL BOSTON HAVE A MUSIC HALL OR NOT?

The connoisseurs of music in Boston generally appreciate the impending crisis in our means of musical enjoyment, the items of which are the demolition of the Music Hall and the dismemberment of the Symphony Orchestra. As chance will have it, however, they among us who are best able to appreciate the splendid opportunities for musical gratification the Symphony concerts afford are, as a rule, precisely the ones who are the least able to furnish the means for a new home for the orchestra. There are, however, citizens who possess both wealth and musical taste and who can sympathize with other music lovers in their anxiety over Mr. Higginson's present dilemma. There is but one way, however, to give expression to that sympathy, and that is to subscribe for stock in the new concert hall which must be built in order to save the orchestra. Furthermore, the emergency is pressing. Unless positive assurance that the hall will be built is in the hands of those who have already made a good start in this matter, within a week, the Symphony Orchestra will cease to be an institution and the city will also be without a proper, well-fitted, adequate hall for other high class concerts that demand a large apartment.

MUSIC HALL MELODIES.

I.

Sing a song of sixpence, a pocket full of gold,
Just in time the pocket's filled as full as it can hold!

When the pocket's opened, the birds 'll begin to sing.

Oh, won't it be a merry hall, about a year from spring!

II.

The treasurer in counting-room
Is counting up his money,
The people down towards Chester Park
Are eating bread and honey.

III.

Hippity-hop to the Symphony shop
To buy a stick of candy!
One for you and one for me,
The shares will all come handy.

IV.

Little Bopeep won't lose her sheep!
Rehearsal days will find 'em
Still tooting away, an orchestra gay
With Beethoven up behind 'em!

NEW MUSIC HALL ASSURED. Committee Has the Required $400,000 Subscribed.

Boston Now in No Danger of Losing Her Symphony Concerts—Handsomely Structured Will Surely Be Erected—City May Come to the Front Once More in Musical Enterprises.

The committee appointed to secure the $400,000 subscriptions for stock in a new music hall corporation can go fishing now. It has that amount and more subscribed, and it has all been secured within two weeks.

The limit was 10 days, and with two Sundays and two half and one whole holiday the subscriptions have been got within the time at first fixed.

The city has, by the good work of this committee, been saved the disgrace of failing to supply the patron of the Boston Symphony orchestra with a suitable hall for his concerts, and events may be anticipated which will prove that the action now assured will bring Boston again to the front in many musical enterprises which have languished in recent years.

The subscription list will be kept open until further notice, as it may be necessary to use a larger sum than was at first contemplated.

The enterprise is in good hands, and it is gratifying to know that this fact has been a general subject of congratulation among those who have put their names down among the stock subscribers.

THE NEW HALL.

A Way to Make It a Benefit to All the People of Boston.

To the Editor of the Herald: This Music Hall scheme which is now being so much discussed seems to me to afford a fine chance to do something for the benefit of the entire public, and not only for the comparative few who can afford to pay high prices for the weekly Symphony concert.

In the first place, the sum of $400,000 is inadequate to make a building of the noble monumental and architectural character which befits our community, for are we not going to build for 50 years hence, as well as for the present generation? In addition to the sum above named, several hundred thousand dollars more would be needed to make the building worthy of us.

Why could we not have popular concerts given two or three evenings each week almost the whole year round under somewhat the same conditions as the present popular concerts are given, thereby giving the multitude a chance to get an improving and innocent amusement at prices within the reach of all. I am sure that these concerts would pay a profit, as the present populars do, and this profit could be devoted to paying the interest and part of the principal required over and above the $400,000 now being talked about. It would not be necessary to have as expensive a lot of performers as compose the Symphony orchestra.

I admire the orchestra as now organized as much as anybody, but its scope is limited and the public at large derive no benefit. Let us have a music hall for the whole population of the community.

W. W.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL. Some Quiet "Hustling," with Gratifying Results.

The Danger Line Passed—With Earnest Work the Symphonies Safe—A Chicago Man's Ideas—An Appeal Notably Signed—Some Financial Views.

A Chicago man, upon being told the situation as regards the raising of money to build a new Music Hall, is said to have delivered himself in the following eminently characteristic fashion:

"Why, in Chicago, half a dozen men would have offered $100,000 apiece by this time! I'm not asking where's your rich men's devotion to music and to civilization and culture generally; what I want to know is, where's their business hustle? Why, a stranger can see with one eye shut and both hands tied behind him that real estate is moving right down in the direction of the site for your new Music Hall, and it's money in a man's pocket to get shares in the new hall. If you'll excuse my language, you can't boom æsthetics anywhere unless you tackle the problem the way we do in Chicago and look your so much per cent. right in the eye along with your high and holy convictions about this or that art or t' other. I heard a man say that it is a shame to let your Gen. Higginson—well, colonel, then; a man that has given a quarter of a million for music is a fine enough fellow to be called general or anything else—my friend said that it's a shame he should have to disband the Symphony orchestra for lack of a house to put it in. I said just what I should like to say to every man with a hundred dollars to invest in and around Boston: 'What are you going to do about it? Where is your æsthetic horse-sense? Where in time's your hustle?'"

However lacking the native born Bostonian is in the element of "hustle," there has been the best possible evidence of an ability to "get there" in this matter. It is only eight days since it was generally known that Boston must have a new Music Hall.

About everybody takes a day off on the seventeenth, and this year there was an unusual exodus from the city on account of the Massachusetts day at the World's fair. Then again, many business men are already at their summer homes and do not come to town with any regularity, so that there have been hardly more than four good working days since the idea of a new hall was suggested to the musical public.

Possibly the committee to whom the duty of getting the funds has been entrusted may object to being classified as "hustlers," but the result of their labors thus far certainly brings them within this classification.

It looks very much as if they would have some "coasting" in their future experience in this undertaking. People are now beginning to realize that the stock in the new hall may be a bit safer investment than some "riltedge" railroad and other securities that have been popular in this section in recent years.

One conservative gentleman remarked in regard to the stock: "It's always a satisfaction to me to see where my money is spent."

The experience of investors in the stock of the present Music Hall is worth quoting at this time. The stock in this corporation was put at $100 a share, and if the affairs of the corporation were to be wound up today, the shares which were obtained 40 years ago have averaged over 6 per cent. as an investment. The shares are probably worth nearer $400 per share than par today, after paying off all obligations and incumbrances. The cash dividends on each share have amounted to $127.20. The increase in the investor's principal is nearly 30 per cent.

It is extremely gratifying to know that for the four real working days the subscriptions have averaged $50,000 a day, and that the conditional promises carry the amount well over the danger line. The people who ought to subscribe have done so; that is, the list already has the names of many of those who are known as patrons of all that is best in music. Many wealthy subscribers have left the committee a wide margin to assess them as the needs of the situation may demand. A peculiarly pleasing feature of the subscription is that there have been a large number of names put down for a single share, thus showing the widespread interest among small investors.

"Nothing succeeds like success," and undoubtedly the fact that the idea is approved by such staunch friends of music as those already "listed" will make the future efforts of the committee far easier than they have been.

The necessity for active energetic and successful effort is still imperative. The total amount needed should be subscribed by tomorrow night. This result can easily be accomplished. It is entirely unnecessary to question the expenditure of the money to be put into this investment. The committee are thoroughly competent to deal with all the details.

A NOTABLE APPEAL.

A number of music lovers of this city propose to organize a stock corporation to erect a suitable building to replace the present Music Hall, which is soon to be lost to the public as a place of enjoyment. They have issued the following appeal:

We think that the appeal for a new hall for music in Boston is just, and we urge upon our fellow-citizens the necessity for prompt action. Boston is to lose its Music Hall, and must, in justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one. The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the Symphony orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr. Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband unless a home for it is assured.

We are aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking, but circumstances force it upon us. We cannot allow Boston to lose its prestige in these matters without an effort to save it.

It is proposed to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each.

It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months; and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means.

Subscriptions may be sent to T. Dennie Boardman, Ames building, Boston.

Signed: Martin Brinumer, Henry Cabot Lodge, William E. Russell, Patrick Donohoe, Charles W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, John D. Long, Eben Jordan, Matthew Luce, Lesly A. Johnson, George O. Shattuck, Solomon Lincoln, J. K. Paine, Charles Eliot Norton, Henry S. Grew, George Wheatland, C. L. Pierson, F. Haven, Jr., John L. Gardner, John Lowell, Oliver H. Durrell, N. W. Rice, Thomas E. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Henry Whitman, A. Shuman & Co., Walter T. Winslow, Henry M. Whitney, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs. George Tyson, George C. Lee, Robert Bacon, Mrs. Samuel T. Morse, Miss Frances R. Morse, Charles F. Choate, R. H. White, George F. Fabry, David P. Kimball, E. Winchester Donald, S. Endicott Peabody, N. W. Jordan, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, William L. Chase, George A. Gordon, S. Lothrop Thorneike, Francis H. Manning, Henry Parkman, Henry L. Morse, John W. Eliot.

Boston, June 21, 1893.

THE SYMPHONIC CRISIS.

It is questionable if the public at large realizes the imminent danger which now exists as to the future of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. H. L. Higginson, its founder and patron, is about as much a misunderstood man as any that can be named, but those who realize what a fashion he has of carrying out his agreements can hardly fail to have serious anxiety as to the future of the great organization he has so nobly sustained for 12 years.

In order to once again call attention to the matter it may be well to restate the situation. The contracts for the orchestra engagements must be signed at an early day, some of these extending for fully five years. Mr. Higginson, in common with many citizens, thinks that the Music Hall will be taken at an early day by rights granted under the rapid transit bill. Its destruction will make an orchestra an elephant upon his hands, for Boston possesses no other auditorium suited for such concerts as he desires to give.

The position that he takes is, therefore, that unless he can be assured of the building a new Music Hall by others than himself suited for his uses in giving orchestral concerts, and unless this assurance can be had within a week's time, he will decline to continue the organization and abandon the Symphony orchestra once and for all.

It is, of course, difficult for the general public to realize this critical situation to its full extent, but it seems reasonable to suppose that those whose wealth has come to them in this city should take interest enough to study the position in which Mr. Higginson finds himself and come forward to extricate him from it.

The organization and maintenance of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 12 years is the greatest public spirited action in the cause of music known in the history of the world. Mr. Higginson has never asked or desired aid in this effort. He does not ask or desire aid now. He simply says that, if his fellow-citizens, many more able than he to do what he has done and is doing, will not guarantee him a place to give his concerts, he sees no necessity for assuming the immense financial obligations incidental to its maintenance.

An intelligent estimate of the extent of the risk assumed yearly by Mr. Higginson in this scheme of orchestral concerts puts the amount at from $200,000 to $250,000.

322
In other words, if Mr. Higginson renews his contracts for the usual terms, and by the demolition of Music Hall and the failure of the plan to build a new one, has no place for his concerts during the season of '94-'95, he is liable to be called upon to pay a quarter of a million dollars for his adherence to his obligations of the last 12 years.

A very large proportion of the Saturday evening patrons of the Symphony concerts are wealthy, and it would be easy to name a dozen sets of a score each of these lovers of high-class music, who, by co-operation, could without personal loss, supply the financial assistance demanded.

The question, then, is, will the wealthy men and women of Boston by lack of action, cause the city the loss of the finest orchestral organization known anywhere in the world?

A NEW MUSIC HALL.

"Sweet are the uses of adversity," chanted William Shakspeare; also "out of this nettle danger we pluck this flower, safety." One feels like quoting the divine Williams passim, or singing or dancing or standing on one's head, on realizing that the raid of rapid transit on the old Music Hall has secured us what has been so long desired in vain, —a hall for music worthy of the distinction to which Boston has attained in the musical world. Only to just such conditions as obtain here and now could the successful effort of the past ten days have been possible. It is the fruition of faithful work. Colonel Henry Higginson has been planting and watering with an open hand for a dozen years the slow-growing plant of confidence which has finally blossomed in this burst of public spirit and generosity to build a new temple for music. Let the details take care of themselves later on; the main fact is glorious enough for present contemplation. Only it should be understood by all, and especially by those who dream of ambitious sites and architecture for it, that while $400,000 will build a fine modern music hall, $450,000 or $500,000 would do it still more worthily. So let the subscribing of the capital stock not stop at the barely safe $400,000.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA and the Common are saved. In neither case has the salvation been free, and in both it has been effected at the expense of much exertion beyond the power of money to buy. When the reserve power of Boston is put forth in even a little of its might, results promptly prove that materialism has no lasting hold in this "stronghold of the Puritans," as Mr. Walter Besant likes to call Boston. Boston is iconoclastic in her own way, but she never wilfully throws down her own idols, and is much given to useful action when the smallest stone of their pedestals is threatened.

MUSIC HALL AS AN INVESTMENT.

We have taken pains to look up the pecuniary results of the first Boston Music Hall investment, and find that if the corporation were to be wound up today the shares which were obtained at $100 apiece forty years ago have averaged over six per cent as an investment. The shares are probably worth nearer $400 per share than par today, after paying off all obligations and incumbrances. The cash dividends on each share have amounted to $127.20. The increase in the investor's principal is nearly three hundred per cent. Now, wherein is the outlook for a new music hall today less promising than that of forty-one years ago?

To be sure, the cost of the real estate bought and occupied in 1852 was comparatively light, owing to the wise selection of the interior of a block where existed no properties of any great value. This point is of the first and greatest importance. In fact it virtually disposes of all those picturesque projects which insist on the choice of such sites as those suggested on Copley Square or Commonwealth avenue as the base of operations for the creation of a new hall. However desirable such sites would be for the new house, and however ornamental that structure might be made for the city, the success of the project in hand depends on its commending itself to our public-spirited capitalists as an investment. The lot of land that has been bonded on Huntington avenue and West Chester Park, though not in every quality the most fitting, certainly has the merit of rendering the scheme practicable as a fairly promising investment.

We have in mind, however, a lot which in our view combines reasonableness in price and sightliness of situation—namely the land now occupied by the Union Boat Club and the private and livery stables adjacent. The grand and beautiful Charles River Embankment improvement can reach this spot in another year and in the course of one more year extend the whole length of the Back Bay. The act passed by the last Legislature provides for the extension and ornamentation of this river esplanade under the direction of the Park Commission as far as the Charlesgate. Why should not Boston utilize this noble water-front so long neglected and despised, except from the back parlors and dining-rooms of the mansions on the water side of Beacon and Brimmer streets, for some of its best public buildings, theatres, halls and hotels, as is done in London and every other European city which enjoys the advantages of such embankments? The projectors of the rapid transit subway on Tremont street have always contemplated a lateral branch to the Back Bay and Brookline, via tunnel and Mt. Vernon street and the Charles River water front, and that branch would bring an opera house or hall on the Embankment into direct connection with the entire system of city transportation.

But this is a detail to be settled according to the maturer conclusions of the best judges. The point we are pressing is that to be a reasonably safe and promising investment the new Music Hall must begin with a reasonably cheap lot of land, as did the Music Hall project of forty years ago, with the very satisfactory results to the investors above stated on the best authority.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

June 1, 1895
To the Editor of the Transcript: The citizens of Boston seem strangely to fail to appreciate the public importance of completing at once the subscriptions for a new building to take the place of Music Hall, for it is hardly probable that the sum needed—$400,000—would be wanting long if the matter were rightly understood. Briefly stated, the facts of the case are these:

Even were there no question of the removal of the present building, Music Hall has certain obvious defects which prevent its being at all adequate to its uses or worthy of the splendid series of concerts which are given there. The entrances are awkward, and its enclosed position prevents their being improved. The same cause, together with the character of the building, renders proper ventilation impossible; and every frequenter of the Symphony concerts has suffered from the bad air of the auditorium. Both these considerations are of importance; and it is to be added that it is a shame to Boston that it has so long failed to provide a proper hall for the concerts which are at once a delight and an inspiration to every music-lover, and an object not only of civic pride, but of interest to every man who has a wholesome pleasure in seeing an American city take its place in the front ranks of the musical centres of the world.

The proposed building is to be owned by a corporation—an advantage not to be overlooked—and will afford a hall not only for the symphonies, but for opera, which now seeks in vain for proper accommodation in Boston. If there were a suitable place here, it is not to be doubted that we should have far more opera, and hear it under better conditions, than at present. This would also be likely to insure an income from the house, so that the investment, although a long one, would not be in the end a losing one. Those who subscribe to the fund are not necessarily giving their money to a philanthropic scheme, although under the circumstances there should be no difficulty in raising $400,000 in Boston for a purpose which so vitally affects the best interests of the city.

The thing which complicates the question is the necessity of completing the subscription at once. The contracts with the members of the orchestra for five years must be signed by the first of July. The leading musicians cannot be kept waiting in uncertainty, and Colonel Higginson naturally cannot afford to risk the loss of a quarter of a million by taking the chance of having the orchestra on his hands for four years, with no place in which to give concerts should Music Hall be pulled down next summer. The shares are $100 each, and there should be many among the large body of concert-goers and the music lovers in the city who are able to take a few shares if they cannot do more. Something must be decided within the next week, and it will be cause for lasting regret and shame should our noble orchestra be disbanded because the moneyed men of Boston will not rally to the support of the finest and most disinterested art enterprise which has ever been seen in America, and of which it is not too much to say that it has not had its parallel in the history of music. It is certainly not possible that Bostonians are so insensible to generosity, public spirit and the influence of art as to fail now that a practical test is applied to their appreciation. The response must be instant to be effective. It should be abundant alike from a sense of the merits of the case and from simple justice.

323

A. B.

....The site said to have been selected for the new Music Hall, near the corner of Huntington avenue and West Chester Park is centrally situated so far as a large majority of symphony concert patrons are concerned. A new Music Hall at that point would build up Huntington avenue immensely.

...."Oh, oh!" sadly exclaimed the Boston woman "to think of their tearing down our poor old dear lovely Music Hall, where we have almost lived! I can't help it, I am conservative. They may build a new one, but it will never be that one. Think of all those we have heard there who have died! Dear me, I used to go there to Germania concerts forty years ago, as long ago as when we used to wear muffs, if you know what they are, and my muff was three times as big, too, as the biggest ones worn last winter. Poor Carl Bergmann! Oh dear! Why must the Music Hall be torn down? It makes me feel so old, to think of it, and yet I feel just as young as I ever did."

"MONEY TALKS."

To the Editor of the Transcript: Will you give an old croaker space for a few lines on a matter of passing general interest—the imminent danger of losing the Symphony Orchestra. "Thank heaven," said an eminent writer when told of Mrs. Browning's death, "there will be no more Aurora Leighs." The old Music Hall is to go. Thank heaven, say I, there will be no more Symphony concerts. I am tired of being tugged around by Mrs. Grundy to the old hall. I always said to my family that this adoration of classical music was in large part affectation. And here comes a card from the founder of the orchestra in the morning papers which proves me right. For this adoration does not yet go far enough to induce the lovers to provide a home for their beloved. And yet I have never been to one of the old symphony concerts when it was not possible to count up the wealth of one's neighbors to, in the aggregate, forty millions.

PONS.

A MUNICIPAL MUSIC HALL.

To the Editor of the Transcript: The Metropolitan district of Boston has many of the things which are essential to the most complete modern civilization. Several hundred thousand intelligent, industrious and well-to-do people live within a radius of ten miles of the State House, between the surrounding hills, where the rivers run through fields and lawns, by the city wharfs and warehouses, to the ocean. The streets lined with substantial public and private structures; the Common, Public Garden and system of surrounding parks; the educational institutions, comprehending the various fields of research and well equipped for service; the libraries, and institutions charitable and humane; all are of a high standard of excellence.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the educational institutions which has naturally been a source of pride to Boston, as one of the largest and best concert orchestras established in any city in the world. It has now become a problem whether it shall have a continued existence or be discontinued, and it is stated that the matter turns on the providing of a new music hall to properly accommodate the concerts.

Numerous locations for a new temple of music have been suggested in print, some of which are objectionable on account of the cost of the land, others because of the shape of the lot available or the lack of a quiet location. The limited time in which to raise the funds needed is another difficulty as well as the present unfavorable financial condition of the business world. Under all the circumstances the following plan is offered as one which might solve the difficulties in the way and perhaps secure permanently a worthy orchestra for Boston.

Let the Park Commission be authorized to grant a suitable location in the Back Bay Park where there will ever be assured a quiet home for a music hall; where there will be room for carriage approaches and a branch of the street car service. The city to erect a hall for public purposes, perhaps using the Franklin fund, not to take the place of Faneuil Hall, but to be used when that hall is not sufficiently capacious for fairs, school exhibitions, drills, etc. This hall to be rented for the Symphony concerts and for other concerts, in fact for any musical entertainment, the income to be used to provide for free concerts, which would attract to the Back Bay Park on summer evenings, thousands of people, and would tend to popularize this beautiful pleasure ground, and make it an evening resort which could be artistically illuminated, and in years to come rival the resorts of the capitals of Europe of a similar character, which give so much pleasure to the public. It might be well to first erect a structure of wood, in the most approved form, so as to be sure of securing perfect acoustic properties, and use this for a few years as a temporary expedient. This would be inexpensive, and if the city were not prepared to erect it, private enterprise might, and this arrangement would give time to plan a permanent structure, architecturally worthy of the city and an ornament to the park itself.

It would be worth the expenditure on the part of the city to build this temporary hall to provide for the musical education and amusement of the people, the more so if it should result in the permanent establishment, by private capital, of a great local orchestra, which should give not only a series of concerts, as under the present arrangement, but which should also at stated times, in this public music hall, give free performances to the public who may not be able to pay for admission. This plan might result in future donations by liberal citizens and bequests of large sums of money to provide frequent musical entertainments for the public, and for this reason it may be deemed worthy of consideration by the public and the authorities.

PARKER C. CHANDLER.

A NEW MUSIC HALL ASSURED.

The Last Dollar of the $400,000 Necessary Subscribed This Afternoon.

A new music hall for Boston is now assured, for shortly after three o'clock this afternoon subscriptions to stock came in raising the amount to the $400,000 originally called for. There is now absolutely no question about the building of the hall for the symphony concerts; but because the fund has been raised there is no reason why the public who are interested should stop sending in their subscriptions. The more money there is raised the better the building will be when it is completed, and no one need fear that in case the fund exceeds the amount asked for by the committee, any of the money will be wasted. When the subject was first considered it was decided that $400,000 was the smallest sum that could possibly suffice. Should the subscription now grow from its present figure to $450,000 it will not be any too large, and will enable the committee to prepare plans for a better building.

SUGGESTIONS OF WHAT the new Music Hall should be will probably flow in upon the committee who have assumed the preliminary direction of affairs, until they may be led to wish that they had never undertaken the task. Therefore, before the flood begins, a few hints of the needs of the town are herewith submitted. Besides the large hall, which will, presumably, be made to contain not less than 2500 seats, there should be two other concert rooms, with a seating capacity of 1200 and 600 respectively. Of course the means of egress and of communication between the several parts of the house will be adequate and convenient, the building laws being severe and searching in these particulars. The latest exploits in theatre and hall building, the Metropolitan Opera House and the Carnegie Music Hall in New York and the Auditorium in Chicago, contain each features in plan, construction and equipment that may well be copied or imitated. As desirable as it is to have a fine work of architecture for the exterior, we can well spare highly decorative conceits there for the sake of an effective interior, which should be, first of all, cheery, to say nothing of an organ which shall be a worthy tenant of the new art temple.

FIFTY THOUSAND DOLLARS YESTERDAY

Generous Subscriptions to the Music Hall Fund—But $225,000 More Needed.

The success of the new Music Hall enterprise is almost assured, for only $225,000 is needed now by the gentlemen having the matter in charge. Fifty thousand dollars were subscribed yesterday, bringing the amount up to $175,000, and as much more is hoped for today. Still as only two days remain for the securing of the amount needed in order to retain the Symphony concerts, it is necessary for all who contemplate giving their aid to the enterprise to do so at once.

The following circular has been issued in regard to the new Music Hall:

BOSTON, June 21, 1893.

We think that the appeal for a new hall for music in Boston is just, and we urge upon our fellow-citizens the necessity for prompt action. Boston is to lose its Music Hall, and must, in justice to its high name for devotion to education and to art, replace this old hall with a new and better one. The choral societies must have a good home or fade away, and the Symphony Orchestra, which has been called into existence by the long, hard work of so many men, which represents the expenditure of $250,000 voluntarily given by Mr. Higginson, in addition to the receipts from tickets, and which is now fully equipped for the best kind of service to a large and excellent public, must very soon disband, unless a home for it is assured.

We are aware that this is a bad time to start such an undertaking, but circumstances force it upon us. We cannot allow Boston to lose its prestige in these matters without an effort to save it. It is proposed to organize a corporation with a capital of $400,000, divided into 4000 shares of $100 each. It is most important that this money should be assured without delay, although it will not be wanted for a number of months; and it is to be hoped that everybody will take stock according to his means.

Subscriptions may be sent to T. Dennie Boardman, esq., Ames Building, Boston.

The circular bears the signatures of Martin Brimmer, Henry Cabot Lodge, William E. Russell, Patrick Donahoe, Charles W. Eliot, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Miss Alice Longfellow, John D. Long, Eben Jordan, Matthew Luce, Lesley A. Johnson, George O. Shattuck, Solomon Lincoln, J. K. Paine, Charles Eliot Norton, Henry S. Grew, George Wheatland, C. L. Pierson, F. Haven, Jr., John L. Gardner, John Lowell, Oliver H. Durrell, N. W. Rice, Thomas E. Proctor, Barthold Schlesinger, Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Henry Whitman, A. Shuman & Co., Walter T. Winslow, Henry M. Whitney, Miss Pauline Shaw, Mrs. George Tyson, George C. Lee, Robert Bacon, Mrs. Samuel T. Morse, Miss Francis R. Morse, Charles F. Choate, R. H. White, George F. Fabyan, David P. Kimball, E. Winchester, Donald, S. Endicott Peabody, N. W. Jordan, C. A. Coffin, F. G. Webster, William L. Chase, George A. Gordon, S. Lothrop Thorndike, Francis H. Manning, Henry Parkman, Henry L. Morse, John W. Eliot.

FOR THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Subscriptions for Stock Reach $370,000 at Noon Today — $30,000 Yet to be Raised.

The total subscriptions to the new music hall stock this afternoon amounted to $370,000, leaving $30,000 to be secured, which, it is believed, will be done this afternoon. Up to Saturday night 242 people had subscribed, in amounts ranging from $100 to $25,000, as follows:

2 subscriptions of.....	$25,000 each.
1 " " " " " " " " " "	15,000 "
1 " " " " " " " " " "	11,000 "
18 " " " " " " " " " "	10,000 "
1 " " " " " " " " " "	5,000 "
3 " " " " " " " " " "	3,500 "
8 " " " " " " " " " "	3,000 "
6 " " " " " " " " " "	2,500 "
12 " " " " " " " " " "	2,000 "
1 " " " " " " " " " "	1,500 "
1 " " " " " " " " " "	1,100 "
40 " " " " " " " " " "	1,000 "
1 " " " " " " " " " "	900 "
1 " " " " " " " " " "	800 "
40 " " " " " " " " " "	500 "
5 " " " " " " " " " "	400 "
11 " " " " " " " " " "	300 "
25 " " " " " " " " " "	200 "
70 " " " " " " " " " "	100 "

The following self-explanatory letter was issued today:

Unauthorized statements having been made that the stock of the new Music Hall is likely to be fairly profitable, the committee appointed to receive subscriptions wish subscribers to understand that the new hall is to be built to serve the purposes of music in the best way possible, and that the stock is not expected to be a regular dividend paying security. It is probable that the increased value of the land on which the hall is to be built will in time give some market value to the stock, as it has in the case of the present Music Hall.

If any subscriptions have been made through a misunderstanding on this point, the committee should be promptly notified.

[Signed] E. W. HOOPER,
H. F. SEARS,
H. L. HIGGINSON, } Committee.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL SHARES.

"Fiddle-de-dee, what's a hundred thousand dollars!" exclaimed a visiting Chicagoan, on hearing that somewhere near this sum is in hand towards the necessary $400,000 for the new Music Hall. "Why, in Chicago, half a dozen men would have offered $100,000 apiece by this time! I'm not asking where's your rich men's devotion to music and to civilization and culture generally, what I want to know is, where's their business hustle? Why, a stranger can see with one eye shut and both hands tied behind him that real estate is moving right down in the direction of the site for your new Music Hall, and it's money in a man's pocket to get shares in the new hall. We built our Auditorium because we wanted the biggest Music Hall in the country, but great Scott! we knew we should make money! If you'll excuse my language you can't boom aesthetics anywhere unless you tackle the problem the way we do in Chicago and look your so much per cent right in the eye along with your high and holy convictions about this or that art or t' other. I heard a man say that it is a shame to let your General Higginson—well, Colonel, then; a man that has given a quarter of a million for music is a fine enough fellow to be called General or anything else—my friend said that it's a shame he should have to disband the Symphony Orchestra for lack of a house to put it in. I said just what I should like to say to every man with a hundred dollars to invest in and around Boston, "What are you going to do about it? What makes you even consider a possibility of disbanding the Symphony Orchestra for one single minute? Where is your aesthetic horse-sense? "Where in time's your hustle?"

SAVE THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Friends of the Organization Earnestly at Work.

Yesterday was not allowed to be passed as a holiday by those who are engaged in the work of ensuring a new home for the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Energetic work was done by many gentlemen who realize the disgrace which would fall upon Boston if the Boston orchestra is disbanded, and it is pleasant to be able to say that there is a large chance that the funds for a new music hall will be within a few days secured.

Despite the conservative inertia so characteristic of Boston's wealthy classes, the appeal for this fund has met with a ready recognition of its value to the city, and with the hearty co-operation of all who have benefited by the existence of the Boston orchestra the last 12 years, there is no need to fear for the result.

The only danger lies in the inclination of the average citizen to wait until some one else takes the initiative. "There is no time for inaction," said one of the leading movers in this great public effort in the cause of good music, "Every one who wants to have the symphony concerts next season must lend a hand."

It seems not to be realized that the almost immediate disbandment of the great orchestra is threatened. It will not be in existence July 1st if the subscriptions needed to build a new hall are not obtained by the end of the present week.

The amount should be complete by Wednesday. It should be remembered that it is not the instant payment of money that is asked, but a reliable guarantee that it will be forthcoming when the plans for its use are matured.

Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, who is receiving the subscriptions, reports excellent progress, but there should be no misunderstanding in regard to the matter and no oversanguine views of the situation indulged in.

It is gratifying, also, to be able to say that further discussion of the lot of land of which an option has been got, at the junction of West Chester park and Huntington avenue, has greatly improved its popularity among the people who are interesting themselves in this matter.

Frequent allusions to the change in the location of the concert hall of New York have been made by those working in this effort, and the fact that concerts given for years at Steinway Hall, at Fourteenth street and Fourth avenue, were at one move successfully taken to the new Carnegie Hall, at Fifty-seventh street and Seventh avenue, is cited as an evidence that the change in the location here will be equally successful.

One gentleman was heard to say in this matter: "See here, it seems to me it's about time for the southern side of the city to be accommodated a little. I've been going to the symphony concerts from Dorchester for 12 years, and have not had a square dinner at home of a Saturday night in the season since they begun. Now, let the patrons in Chelsea and that side of the city have their turn; it's only a fair exchange."

The old hall which has so little of attractiveness as compared with modern built auditoriums is getting some pretty sharp criticisms these days, and when the money is ready for a new structure, it seems likely that there will be a volunteer committee to pull down the old building and let the daylight into the obscure location it now occupies.

A few days only are left to save the Symphony orchestra, and Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, 56 Ames building, corner of Washington and Court streets, will receive any and all subscriptions.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

A Citizen's Ideas in Regard to the Plans for the New Building.

To the Editor of the Herald: The subject of a new music hall having been introduced and a sum of money pledged for its construction upon the somewhat problematical basis of a rapid transit line, will you kindly allow a space in your columns for a few suggestions from a citizen who has, with many others, noticed the absence of public spirit in the matter of such an edifice as becomes the modern Athens?

Primarily, there should be competitive designs submitted, not limited to local talent. No architect is thoroughly competent to enter such competition unless familiar with the construction of similar buildings abroad, where the best examples may be found.

The acoustic properties are of first importance and call for a scientific consideration; in fact, upon the form of the interior hangs the success or failure of the enterprise. The next is the amount of room allowed for individual seating, not only in width, but in front. Foreign examples prove the great comfort of ample room. Next to hearing perfectly is sitting comfortably. This subject has received little attention in our city of many theatres.

A capacious foyer, the purpose of which is not yet fully appreciated, will fill a demand of the future. Again, a foreign feature, a division of the house, entrance and exit being on each side, with their respective coat rooms, reducing the confusion at the latter one-half.

Especially a question to be settled for this city—the home of the finest choral society—is the facility for oratorio performances, which an opera house does not furnish. I beg to suggest a plan: Place new internal works behind the architecturally beautiful case (if not already spoiled by neglect), not generally known to be of American design and manufacture, really a fine work, and which so long screened some of the wisdom and more of the folly of the old "great organ"; give it a central and elevated position, where its grandeur, graceful curves and free tonal effect would be appreciated, with fixed seats in amphitheatre form for chorus at one end of a hall of maximum size, and a perfectly appointed stage for symphony or opera use at least 60 feet wide at the other, the entrances, etc., being on each side, as stated. We have only to invent, if there is not one already invented, a comfortable chair (not merely a seat) with a reversible back, and nothing will prevent an oratorio performance in the afternoon and an opera in the evening. By means well known, the "console" or key-desk of the organ may be located any place near the conductor. The organ could be screened by curtain if desired, on opera night, and the chorus seats would be quite desirable for that performance. The level floor would serve the purpose of balls, etc., by removal of seats. The question of location and purchase of land should be deferred until the plans are selected. The designer should not be handicapped by land limit. It should occupy an entire block or centre of a square accessible on all sides.

Lastly, double by some means the amount already subscribed. JAMES E. TREAT.
Boston, July 12, 1893.

TO SAVE THE SYMPHONIES

A New Music Hall Must Be Guaranteed.

A Site on Huntington Avenue Held on an Option—A Circular Appealing for Subscriptions to the Stock of a New Corporation Issued Today—$400,000 Required—A Part Already Promised.

It seems to be assumed in State street that the rapid transit bill which is to be submitted to the voters in Boston at a special election in October next, will meet their sanction and become operative. As pointed out in the Advertiser editorially this morning, "with the powerful influence of City Hall arrayed in favor of the bill, and the fact that the opposition is, and is likely to remain, unorganized, the chances are that the measure will be accepted by the voters of the city, and that the strip of land between Causeway street and Franklin Park will soon be laid bare preparatory to the building of the elevated road." Among the first public buildings to fall beneath this march of progress would be Boston Music Hall. A conference on Monday between Mr. Higginson and Mayor Matthews appears to have convinced Mr. Higginson that the probabilities are strongest in the line of the Advertiser's editorial judgment above quoted. At all events the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra feels so uncertain as to whether he will have a hall at his command for the winter of '94-'95 that he has decided to abandon the concerts unless the funds for a new hall are at once provided. The time is short before he will be obliged to make a five-years' engagement with a conductor and renew his contracts with the eighty odd members of his band. As the sum of these is large, it had become a very serious question by the first of the present week, as the decision must be reached within three or four days.

At this juncture a number of prominent and public-spirited gentlemen are trying to raise the money to build a new Music Hall worthy of Boston and its musical traditions. The sum of about half a million at least would be required for a fitting site and worthy structure. It should be understood that Colonel Higginson is not among the subscribers—the Symphony concerts being considered his share.

The following circular of appeal is issued today:

The new rapid transit bill, which will become a law (in all probability) next autumn, destroys Music Hall, thus depriving the city of the only hall which can be used for concerts, public meetings, or festivals of any kind, always excepting Mechanics Hall, which is too large for ordinary use. This loss will interfere with the concerts heretofore given at Music Hall, viz.: those of the Handel and Haydn, Apollo and Cecilia societies and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as all occasional concerts.

The contracts for the Symphony Orchestra are now in process, and must be settled at once. If funds to build a new hall cannot be raised within ten days the concerts of that orchestra must be abandoned definitively.

It is proposed to build a new hall or theatre, of which the plans will be put in the hands of a competent committee. An option on an excellent location at the corner of West Chester park and near Huntington avenue has been taken at a fair price.

To this end it is desired to raise $400,000, and subscriptions may be sent to the office of Mr. T. D. Boardman, Ames Building.

No doubt the Boston of today will be found at least as enterprising as the Boston of forty years ago which built the Boston Theatre and the present Boston Music Hall in a similar fashion. In connection with this, a sketch of the early history of the Music Hall is interesting.

Jenny Lind was the inspiring cause of the Music Hall. The matchless singer was here in the years 1850, '51 and '52, and our want of a hall in all respects adequate for high class concerts was made more apparent than ever. There had already been some talk of a large hall, the increase in population, the spread of musical taste and the growing wealth of the town combining to justify the demands of music connoisseurs for such a hall. But the matter slumbered until Jan. 31, 1851, when at a meeting of the Harvard Musical Association, following an informal conversation at the supper table (it being the annual meeting), a committee was appointed to consider the matter practically. Charles C. Perkins, Robert E. Apthorp, Dr. J. Baxter Upham, George Derby and John S. Dwight formed that committee. Dr. Upham had already agitated the subject in the councils of the Musical Fund Society and his name was constantly identified with its history until within a few years. It was through his perseverance that the famous great organ was bought and set up in the hall and in many other ways he was instrumental in the development of sound musical taste in Boston.

To go back to the history of the hall. A subsequent committee found a site and settled on a general plan and after appointing Mr. George Snell for architect called for subscriptions to the stock and in sixty days had secured $100,000. Messrs. Apthorp, Chickering, Curtis, Perkins and Upham were the largest subscribers, and Hon. C. P. Curtis (of this group) was the first president of the board of seven directors. The work of construction was pushed rapidly forward but never at the cost of thoroughness, Mr. Snell being specially distinguished for his mastery of the science of building. The opening came on the night of Saturday, Nov. 20, 1852. A miscellaneous concert was given and the performers were the Musical Fund Society Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society, the Musical Education Society, the German Liederkranz, and the Germania Serenade Band, with Mme. Marietta Albani and Mr. August Kreissmann for solo singers. Other occasions of significance in the early history of the hall were these: Nov. 21, 1852, first concert of the Handel and Haydn Society with the aid of Mme. Sontag; March 1, 1856, dedication of the Beethoven statue, a gift, in trust, by Charles C. Perkins; Nov. 2, 1863, dedication of the great organ.

This is not the place to summarize or even to sketch the subsequent history of the hall. That is a task to ponder over and may well be deferred until a more fitting opportunity.

A public misfortune, unless the public shall without delay stir itself to prevent it, will be the disappearance of the Music Hall before the pushing forward of the new road ordered by the rapid transit act, and hanging on the chances of a popular vote. The loss will be great—if it be not immediately made good by another hall elsewhere—not because the building and its apartments are objects of architectural art of such beauty and significance that their disappearance is an æsthetic loss; they are not even tasteful in their present condition nor as convenient and safe as the times demand. But they are all we have in the way of accommodations for concerts of a high grade; and the question at once comes up, "With no Music Hall, where may we hear oratorio and symphony in their best estate?" For not even the Tremont Temple may be available, while the immense hall of the Mechanics Building is entirely out of the question.

Without the certainty of a hall exactly fitted to its use the Symphony Orchestra will come to an end—another misfortune, but which the public has also the power to prevent. To provide a new Music Hall here, however, or to preserve the orchestra, immediate, instant action is necessary. Within a fortnight the contracts with the musicians and the conductor must be signed and if not signed or concluded the best of the force will be looking elsewhere for employment; and although the suspension of the concerts may be but temporary, to bring up the orchestra again to its present excellence will take as long a series of years as it has already required. We are glad to be able to state that the first steps taken towards meeting this crisis in Boston's social and art life have met with a most gratifying reception. A number of public-spirited citizens—not including Colonel Henry L. Higginson, whose quarter of a million dollars already spent in the cause is a quite sufficient contribution for one man—have already taken the matter in hand, and if they are at once seconded by generous subscriptions to the new Music Hall stock company that is proposed, success is certain. But the subscription must be completed within a week.

For the first time in at least three-quarters of a century the city will be without a hall (if this plan should not be a success), suited in all respects for concerts of classic music. Before the Music Hall was built there had been for thirty years or more concert rooms that were entirely adequate for the purposes to which they were put and the demands of the times as well. For the older Boston the hall of the Boylston Market and the Melodeon were found as spacious, as convenient and as well fitted as the existing conditions of population, wealth and musical taste warranted. Suddenly, however, Jenny Lind came to us and it was made apparent to some public-spirited citizens that the times were ripe, or at least were a-ripening, for a concert hall that should prove at once our taste, our readiness to provide a worthy home for music and our confidence that the people would demonstrate by their use of the hall the public need of the institution. All that was expected or hoped for by those who were reasonable in their zeal has been fulfilled, while the warm interest in the hall as a temple of art felt by persons of means and generous impulses has been shown in the gifts of beautiful works of sculpture and of paintings with a distinctive value for students of the history of music.

Now, the chances are that this temple will be destroyed and music will no longer have its own home in Boston—unless, as already hinted, the public spirit that manifested itself so opportunely and so generously in the case of the Music Hall, and a few years later of the Boston Theatre, again be set in action. Otherwise, it is certain that the Symphony Orchestra and its concerts will cease to be features in the musical life of the town. Not only will the home of the art be destroyed, but an organization that stands among its exemplars who have reached the highest plane will no longer be our comfort or our pride. It is difficult to believe that the men of means and of artistic taste in Boston will permit either loss to be ours.

Looked at in merely a business light we cannot afford to lose hall or orchestra. A city that has its recognized art institutions draws to it an enormous throng of people in these days when travel for intellectual gratification is twenty times as common as it was twenty years ago.

Much, very much, of the distinction of London, Paris, Dresden, Munich, Berlin and other cities of Europe to which everybody goes is due to the liberal provision of opportunities for seeing and hearing art in its highest forms, and Boston has found that its symphonies and oratorios are sources of fame for our city second to nothing that we can boast and an attraction to people from far and near. Those who wish to hear good music in Boston must act, and act at once.

A NEW MUSIC HALL.

Is Boston to continue to have a Music Hall, and a series of symphony concerts? These are questions that have been forced to the front by the recent action of the Legislature in adopting a method of rapid transit which, if approved by the citizens of Boston, will lead first to the sacrifice of Music Hall, and second, through the inability of the promoter of the Boston Symphony orchestra to obtain a suitable place in which to give its concerts, to the discontinuance of that organization.

The facts in the case were set forth yesterday in a graphic report printed in the HERALD. It is assumed that Music Hall will be sacrificed to the needs of transportation; and, even if this were not the case, it must within the last few years have dawned upon a large number of our people that the hall is not well located for the purpose for which it is used. When entertainments are given in it that lead to the employment in large numbers of public and private carriages to bring people to or take them away from the hall, the narrow and greatly occupied streets in its vicinity are crowded to repletion, to the immense annoyance, not only of those who are to be carried in these vehicles, but to that also of many thousands of others using Winter or Tremont street, particularly the latter, who find their progress materially delayed.

It is clear that Music Hall is fast outliving its usefulness for the purposes for which it is frequently employed, and that the facilities that it affords could be provided elsewhere with decided advantage to the community. But if the seizure of the property for a distinct and different purpose, under right of eminent domain, had not presented itself, it is probable that the question of having a new music hall would not have been brought forward for a year or two to come. The present urgency, indeed, grows out of the necessity the promoter of the Symphony orchestra is under of making contracts with his conductor and musicians within a few weeks—contracts which must cover several years of time, involving large expenditures of money, which can only be recouped by having it clearly arranged in advance that a suitable place shall be provided in which a regular series of concerts can be given.

In our graphic account of yesterday we gave the location of the new hall on the corner of West Chester park and Huntington avenue, and showed by diagram that it would be much more convenient than the present hall to those living in the Back Bay, the South End, Cambridge, Roxbury and Dorchester, and to those residing at all points reached by the Boston & Albany and the Providence railroads. As Chester park is to be the great crosstown thoroughfare of Boston, and will before many years have electric cars running through it from Cambridge on the one hand to Dorchester on the other, it may be fairly easy to provide for stations on or near the line of this highway, which would also accommodate passengers coming in over the New England and the Old Colony lines.

The site selected is near what is to be the centre of the retail trade of our city. But at the present time it is possible there to obtain land at a price which would enable the construction of a more spacious and more convenient hall than the hall in which the Symphony concerts are now given. The latter occupies a lot of 16,000 square feet. The lot which it is proposed to take at the South end has an area of about 34,000 square feet. The present Music Hall is, as we have said above, enclosed by narrow streets, making at times access to or departure from it a work of great inconvenience. The proposed hall would front on one street of 100 feet in width—Huntington avenue—on another of 90 feet in width—West Chester Park, and on another of 50 feet in width—Falmouth street, thus giving upon all sides an implitude of access that is entirely wanting under existing conditions.

It is not well to have an enormous hall. The undesirability of such a structure has been brought strongly into light by the experience of performances given in Mechanics' Hall. But the last word in architecture of this kind was not said when the late Mr. Snell built the Music Hall. The work that he did there was admirable in its way; but he was limited in the space that he could use for entrance and exits, and in a number of respects the hall was better adapted to meet the demands of the ear than the eye. The constructors of the new Music Hall, if it is built, will doubtless take all these matters into account and will be able, even if they travel to such an unpromising place as Salt Lake City, to find an instance of a hall capable of holding many thousands of people that has acoustic properties which make it better in respect to hearing than many halls that are but a tenth of its size.

What is needed is that the public spirit of Boston should assert itself to the extent of providing the funds needed to take up and put through this undertaking. It is believed that $400,000 will be sufficient to buy the land and build the hall. There is reason to think that, when built, the income that can be earned upon the investment will in a short time make it a reasonably profitable one. More than this, the location of such a hall at the point selected, will have the tendency to give an added value to property in the vicinity, to lead to its use for the higher classes of retail business, and this in turn will react upon the plot occupied by the hall itself, making it a more and more valuable piece of property. The subscriptions are asked for as a business undertaking, and yet at the same time it is thought well to emphasize the fact that the public spirit in Boston should be sufficiently developed to lead its wealthy citizens to subscribe to such an undertaking even though immediate profit could not be counted upon, seeing that a failure so to do would be a public misfortune leading, as it doubtless would, to the breaking up of an orchestra that, through years of training, has acquired a world-wide reputation and has given to Boston, in respect to instrumental music, the leading position on this continent.

THE OPERA HOUSE PROBLEM.

Now that the Symphony Orchestra is "saved," there is naturally a growing interest in the building which will house it when it is moved from the old Music Hall to a new one, or to an opera house. There will be a great opportunity for an architect in the Opera House problem, and of course Boston architects are not averse to the idea of a competition, should the three gentlemen in charge open a competition and let Boston men have a chance. It is also natural that these three gentlemen should consider themselves fitted to decide in advance exactly who is most likely to please them, and to ask any firm they choose to prepare plans; since there never would have been a new music hall or opera house at all without the many years of heroic outlay for classic music by one of them, and the confidence which all three inspire in immediate friends and acquaintances who have subscribed from $1000 to $25,000 apiece. Small shareholders also would scarcely have put their $100 apiece into any control but that of the man who has proved his public spirit in devotion to a great public service and has himself put a fortune into the support of music in Boston. Leaving out of the question this weighty personal reason for an autocratic decision in regard to the architect of the Opera House, there remains the possibility of a great stimulus to the art of architecture in this part of the world, if it were found advisable to open a competition for plans for an opera house. There are numbers of Boston firms extremely well fitted to rise to the occasion.

But it would hardly serve the purpose of any person of an inquiring turn of mind even to attempt discovery of what is going on in the minds of Boston architects concerning the idea of a competition for the Opera House. Outsiders will tell you all sorts of things if you will listen; but they are men entirely outside this profession of architecture, which combines all the sensitiveness of an art with all the worldly wisdom of a business. One outsider will tell exactly who is to build the Music Hall, a second one will name another firm with equal certainty, and a third will declare inside knowledge that there is to be a competition!

All those immediately concerned are "layin' low and ain't sayin' nothin'"; but while this is going on, the general reader, who is merely one of the public, may find interest in a casual glance at some Boston architects' work. It has been given to very few Americans to build modern and scientific music halls. Most architects must quote churches, assembly rooms, and lecture halls. Peabody & Stearns built two at the World's Fair, and there is one of theirs in connection with the University of St. Louis. The stock exchange here is theirs, but not even the most ambitious classifier of auditoriums would call that musical shrine exactly a model of a classic concert room!

The Ames Building might be put into a competition for a campanile, at a pinch, but Shepley, Rutan & Coolidge, who built it, have chiefly followed in the footsteps of the great Richardson, whose artistic and business descendants they are, and their list of places of public assembly includes chambers of commerce in different cities, and churches, and excludes any great temple of music.

There is a Spiritual Temple in Boston, by the way, to be credited to a talented Richardson who still lives—the junior member of the firm of Hartwell & Richardson. It is said that the acoustics of that room (seating 1200 people), are excellent. That building must have presented a difficult problem with the limitations of space which too often cramp an architect. The Youth's Companion Building and the Normal Art School, and the large theatre at Fall River, are examples of good quality to be stimulated by larger opportunity.

The Carnegie library in Pittsburg must have offered one of those conglomerate western problems to Longfellow, Alden & Harlow, for there are combined a library, an art museum, and a music hall to seat 2000 people, all under the same roof. The picture of that building, as it is to be, is extremely interesting, for each part is distinctly signified, yet all combined in a harmonious whole. The buff sandstone used seems to be in an increasing favor with architects for all buildings of a cheerful and musical nature. Certainly we should not look for any airy, fairy effects in granite in the interests of music on the Back Bay, neither is it likely that the cheaper simplicities of brick and terra cotta will be preserved.

There was once, long ago, a scheme on foot for a big theatre out at the corner of Columbus avenue and Berkeley street, and Andrews, Jaques & Rantoul were busied with the plans of a great structure which was to outdo in size the most ambitious theatre in town. But the Monte Cristo who had a notion of building that theatre faded out of public sight, if indeed he ever had any golden reasons for being as much exploited as he was. But the architects he employed live to see his dream of a place of entertainment away from the city's "crowded mart" about to be realized, although not exactly in the form then planned.

Probably most Boston architects could contribute plans of some similar castle that never was built except in air, if not always for like purposes. Certainly Mr. Wheelwright's plan for a new City Hall was a dream worth realizing on Beacon Hill, with its ideal suggestions and repetitions of the graces of rare old Bulfinch's State House in clever combination with the requirements of municipal architecture. Mr. Arthur Rotch, too, has built broad foundations for innumerable beautiful buildings of the future in his endowment of the fund for the European cultivation of young architects.

Apart from his own most excellent handiwork this sort of contribution to the art of architecture is a part of the pride of Boston. A realistic abode of the muses, already in process of construction, is a telephone building that Walker & Kimball are making in Omaha. It would be easy to continue this mention of representative Boston architects, but it would be like a summing up of painters, a task hard to round out with anything like completeness. If there were a possibility of a competition in almost any art but architecture, it would be easy to mention many men whose names the great general public knows at least as well as, (possibly better) than the most distinguished of those named here. But fortunately architecture is an art which depends for its nourishment less upon the many than upon the few, less upon the vague thousands forming the public than upon those who know and care for the best in all the arts. But it is safe to venture a guess that if the commission should at last be given to the New York firm which has already one "monument" in Boston, that concern is broad enough in accomplishments to vary its manner to suit its subject.

PROPOSED NEW MUSIC HALL.

Herald June 16/93
Suggestion That It Shall Be Located on the Back Bay.

What Is Thought of the Plan by Mayor Matthews, Ex-Gov. Ames, Col. Henry L. Higginson and T. Dennie Boardman—Work on the Project Outlined in the Herald Begun.

The article in yesterday's HERALD, "A Critical Situation," in which was outlined the danger of suspension of our symphony concerts in view of the probable taking of the present Music Hall property for the proposed highway under the rapid transit system, excited a great deal of interest among the music loving people of Boston and those who have an interest in the general welfare of the city.

As in all new projects, there is, of course, a variety of opinions, but not a great diversity except as to the matter of location. There is, however, a great unanimity of expression favorable to securing some permanent, suitable and well located music hall, or music hall and opera house combined, in which the grand symphonies of the masters could be presented under the best conditions for reception and enjoyment.

A large number of gentlemen were called upon for an expression of opinion in relation to the matter, but many had not given the matter sufficient thought, and still others were too busy with the concerns of their business, and could not spare the time to think, perhaps much less to express their thought.

332

One of the busiest men in Boston, without a doubt, is Mayor Matthews.

But, notwithstanding his cares, he gave enough time—a few minutes only—to talk of the project.

He said that he had the fullest and warmest sympathy with the project to build a new music hall and hoped it would be done, for he did not want to see our grand symphony concerts discontinued for want of an adequate hall in which to give them.

In regard to the proposed location on the Back Bay, however, his first thought was that it was rather too far removed from the centre of population. That section of the city, to be sure, was central to the populations of the Roxburys, the Newtons and Cambridge, but there were large and growing populations north, east and south of Boston that would be better accommodated if the new music hall were located nearer to the present business centre of Boston.

Why not, he said, take the public library property on Boylston street, which would be vacated by the city for its present purposes and be ready for delivery long enough before the present Music Hall would be demolished in any event.

It is true the cost of this property would be very great in comparison with that proposed for the new hall on Huntington avenue, but he believed that, as there was ample room on the library lot for an adequate auditorium in the rear, a very considerable front area could be utilized for business purposes, which would bring in a large revenue to the building association. The area was about 23,000 feet, and the depth about 300 feet.

Of course, the cost of this land would be very high, the lowest price that would be considered being about $35 per square foot, and he believed it would perhaps reach $40. Negotiations for its purchase had already begun, and it was, of course, only a question of a short time when such desirable and valuable property would be secured by some one.

Ex-Gov. Oliver Ames

was found at his office in the Ames building, and, on the subject being presented to him, said:

"The best location in the city of Boston, in my opinion, is the corner diagonally from where I live on Commonwealth avenue and West Chester park, right in the heart of the best residential portion of Boston. That is the best place also for Cambridge, Brookline and other towns. It is near the railroad, too—a large piece of property next to Henry D. Hyde's and Col. Pope's. It always seemed to me to be an ideal place.

"Another site is the corner of Dartmouth and Boylston streets, opposite the new Old South Church. There is a splendid place, central as well. I saw it mentioned some time ago, and it is really the grand spot. A proper building erected on that site and Boston would be proud of it. Of course the land would cost a good deal, but when you want an opera house or theatre, you want to put it where land is high-priced, and it pays to put it there. Such a building in that place could be used for a theatre if necessary.

"In the location proposed the cost would be, it is said, about $400,000. You could not get the land at the corner of Dartmouth street for less than $20 a foot. It is a valuable piece—the gem place in Boston for a building of that kind."

"Do you think the thing would pay there as a business operation?"

"I don't believe any music hall would pay as a business operation. The present one does not. But whoever goes into it does so with the idea that they are going to make a contribution to the public benefit."

"Do you think the moneyed men of Boston would be prepared to help a project of that kind along?"

"Oh, yes. I think so, if you make it fashionable."

"Don't you think they ought to?"

"Yes, I think so."

"What would the land cost near you?"

"I think it would cost from $12 to $13 a foot. Those corners are high. That is the only good corner there is left. You want to go where travel is. Travel by my house is perfectly immense. It is wonderful how it has increased since I have been there. There is a railway there and electric car lines to Brookline and Brighton."

"Would you be prepared, Mr. Ames, to help a project of that kind along?"

"I don't know. It depends altogether on how a fellow feels at the time. Sometimes you feel as poor as a crow; at other times you feel pretty well off. At this time I do not think a subscription would succeed, because everybody feels a little distressed by the trouble in the market."

"But you think that under ordinary circumstances there would be a good show of getting a liberal contribution?"

"I think so. There is one advantage about this place—it is near the depot. It is near to West Chester park, and to the Providence depot. There is talk that sometime the Boston & Albany will have an extra station between Boylston street and Huntington avenue, and that would be equally near each of the sites I have spoken of. The other land is most valuable because there is nothing on it. You know they need a deep cellar in a theatre. That land is at least 20 feet above the track. So in making a building of that kind, where you have to have deep basements for scenery, you get an ideal place for that purpose. There would be hardly any digging. I don't know whether on Huntington avenue they would have to drive piles or not."

Col. Henry L. Higginson.

Another busy man, was found in his State street office. Of the project he said:

"The plan is a very nice one, indeed. I like it. This matter is important with me, for I have to make my arrangements for the orchestra for the next five years, and in the next few days. I don't know of any other place. I have looked over the ground again and again, and I know of no other site. You have got to get far away from the railways, from the ringing of bells and from the sound of steam whistles. A man came to me two or three years ago with a plan for a music hall, but it was too noisy for me. I don't think Gov. Ames has taken that into account. The land will cost about $100,000, and the building will be erected for $300,000, perhaps for less. If you pay $100,000 or $200,000 for land, that makes it so much more to raise. It depends on what men will give. No doubt the condition of the market and the way people feel financially has something to do with it."

"This comes at an unfortunate minute for our orchestra, but it is necessary to decide. They can make the building both an opera house and a concert hall if they choose. You know it has taken a good deal of work and a good deal of money to get the orchestra together. We have not had so large an orchestra gathered before, nor has anybody else. There is no such orchestra merely for concert purposes in the world. They use orchestras in operas, and they play them in concerts, but ours is altogether devoted to concerts. In Vienna, Berlin, Paris and London all the great orchestras are used for opera purposes and for concerts, while ours is for concerts alone. I should be very sorry to see it go. I have spent a great deal of time and strength on it, and a great deal of money, and if the orchestra once goes apart, I don't know how we can get it together again.

"Well, we cannot play unless there is a place to play in, and I cannot engage the players unless I know I have a place. It won't do to wait a year, because I have to make my engagements for five years."

"Do you feel sanguine that the plan can be put through?"

"I don't know, but I think so. Every fellow has got to give a lift, or it won't be done. These gentlemen haven't got to put any money in now. The money would not have to be paid at once—not for some months, in fact. I think the people will do more if it is made perfectly clear that it will be only a few days before I shall have to throw up the sponge. I cannot keep people waiting. Today I got a cable from Europe asking what I had to say. I don't get to know what I have to say. I have to take these men out of places where they are well placed. I want to know something tangible. If that place goes down, we want another place to go into."

"I am going to have a very good conductor. The public have excellent musical taste and they won't take anything. Of course, the best men get high wages and that is the reason it costs so much. The expenses go on, increasing from year to year."

"Do you think enough will be contributed to carry it through?"

"The first suggestion of it came from a gentleman outside who said that he would do so much, and he has given a handsome sum toward it. I hope there will be enough contributed, but I can't say much about it."

"Have you no assurances?"

"Oh, yes; we have $70,000 or $80,000 assured. It seems to me that the concerts are my share, after all. It has been a great risk and a great responsibility, as everybody knows. I think there is risk about it. I don't want to carry the load. I have—I can do anyway. There are enough other gentlemen interested in the plan to help it along."

Mr. T. Dennie Boardman, in a brief interview, said:

"I feel that the Boylston street location is far better than the site at West Chester park and Commonwealth avenue, for the very reason that it is more central and that there is more means of conveyance near it. The great objection to having a music hall at the corner of West Chester park and Commonwealth avenue is the noise from the railway there. The situation is an admirable one—there can be no question about that—provided you cannot get a central position. If they could buy a lot of land in back of Copley square, where there is no noise, it would be a good thing. But they cannot. There is no land there. There is not room enough between the front of the street and the passageway. You would need 20,000 feet. This plan fills all the desirable conditions except centrality. The city is growing all the while; the site will be central in a few years, as population extends. We have got to grow to the south and west."

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

I.

We Americans pride ourselves, among other things, on our ability to learn from experience as well as from others. Boston has had enough experience in concert-giving and concert-going to be no chicken in the matter, and, now that our old Music Hall is to be torn down and another built in its stead, the time seems to have come to profit by this experience. If anything is certain in this connection it is that we have long since got past the stage at which mere makeshifts are in order; for makeshifts often have a way of turning out more permanent than they were originally intended to be. We have found often enough that musical conditions, musical organizations, etc., which, in the beginning, were the best we could afford and even considerably in advance of previously existing ones of like character, would crystallize into permanency, remain stationary instead of keeping pace with the times, and in the end stand as not easily surmountable obstacles in the way of progress. What had at first marked a conspicuous onward step in our musical life would in time become a very millstone round our necks in virtue of its inertia; to remove it was difficult; to improve it, impossible! There is no need of specifying cases; we all know them well enough.

The moral of which is that, now that for once in a while we can be choosers—as we certainly can in this matter of the new Music Hall—now that we have a free field before us, we should be exceedingly careful to make our hall the very best we possibly can, so that in years to come its permanency shall not be regretted. The new Music Hall should not only be better than the old one, not only fully up to the best standard of the present day, but as far in advance of the times as we can possibly make it in every respect. The old Music Hall was in advance of the needs of our city when it was built; and yet it is now fully twenty years that the best judges have complained of it as not good enough! We cannot look too far forward into the future, nor leave too large a margin for progress; let the new hall be even better than we want now, that it may be good enough fifteen or twenty years hence.

It has been suggested that it might be well to build the new hall so that it could be available not only for symphony concerts and oratorios; but also for performances of operas. Heaven knows that we are badly enough off for an opera house in Boston, and that all of us would fain have a serviceable one; there can be no doubt whatever of this! But is this proposed fusion of concert hall and opera house practicable? Can it at its best be anything better than a makeshift? In any case it can be but one of two things: either a real opera house, from the stage of which orchestral or choral concerts can be given, or else a concert hall, which can more or less easily be adapted to operatic uses. Either one or the other of these two characters must predominate in it; it cannot be equally well adapted to both purposes, unless it is a not very easily definable tertium quid, equally ill adapted to both.

Now, if the world's experience in such matters has taught anything, it is that no known opera house or theatre (built like a theatre) has been a good place for orchestral or choral concerts. Theatres and opera houses have often been used for these purposes both in Europe and here; but such use has been made of them almost in every case because there was no concert hall in town large enough for certain concerts. Large concert halls, like our old Music Hall, are quite a new development on the continent of Europe; thirty years or so ago they were virtually unknown, except in a very few large capitals. Until the hall of the Trocadéro was built for the Exposition of 1885, there was not a large concert hall in all Paris. Take an important musical centre like Dresden twenty years ago: the regular symphony concerts were given in the banqueting-hall of the Hôtel de Saxe—seating from eight hundred to one thousand and at the most generous estimate—but special grand concerts, especially for charitable purposes, were given at the Court Opera. Why? Simply because of the greater seating capacity of the opera house, and for no other reason. Had there been a really large concert hall in the city, the opera house would not have been thought of. Of how terribly an orchestra is handicapped by playing on the stage of a theatre we have had examples enough here in Boston. Mr. Seidl's concerts in the Boston Theatre (the acoustics of which are admitted on all hands to be phenomenally fine, when the place is put to its normal use), the concerts given by Mr. Listemann and by Mr. Damrosch in the Tremont Theatre, have all been recognized failures in point of good orchestral effect. A theatre or opera house is always a lamentable makeshift whenever it is made to do duty as a concert hall. Every composer and every orchestral conductor has recognized this; it is an indubitable fact.

Now let us take the other case; that of a concert hall temporarily turned into a theatre or opera house. The melancholy attempts to do this in the old Music Hall need not count for anything in this connection; even if they had been successful, if the artistic results had been satisfactory, they would still prove nothing, one way or another. Leaving aside the question of insufficient room "behind," the old Music Hall platform was more than ordinarily easy to convert into a dramatic stage, if only for the reason that it never was well adapted to the needs of a concert orchestra. The platform is extraordinarily broad, far too broad for concert purposes. As far as reflectors of sound go, it virtually takes in the whole breadth of the hall. To be sure, when Mr. Gericke once said emphatically that the Music Hall was too broad for an orchestra, some one, not wholly disconnected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, laughingly replied, "I know that well enough, and it is too long and too high into the bargain!" But the extreme breadth of the platform was after all the most serious difficulty; had the orchestra been walled in on both sides with good sound reflectors, as it was overhead, the worst part of the difficulty would have been obviated. But this would have wiped out all the seats in the first and second balconies next the stage—a serious consideration to concert-givers! Of course this loss of seating-room could have been made up for by a third balcony, and a third balcony would have been an admirably good thing. I wonder, by the way, how many persons have noticed what an enormous waste of cubic space there is in the old Music Hall; that, for instance, the second balcony does not even come half way between the floor and the ceiling, in fact not more than half way between the floor and the cornice of the gas gallery. The hall ought by rights to seat several hundred more people than it does. But, to return to the platform: suppose it be walled in on three sides—at the right, the left, and above—with permanent sound reflectors, as every orchestral or choral concert-platform ought to be; what would then be the chances of converting it into an operatic stage? Practically null!

No; the two things do not and will not go together. An opera house is an opera house, and, as such, unfit for orchestral or choral concerts; a thoroughly good concert hall is a totally different thing, and next to impossible to make fit for operatic purposes. A hall intentionally adapted—as far as possible—to both uses will and can be nothing but a makeshift; not really serviceable for either. Such a temple of the dramatic and musical arts might be well enough in places like, say, Taunton or Brockton; Boston has no use for it. This is the homely English of it!

As I understand it, enough money has been subscribed to build a thoroughly good music hall; I may be wrong, but I have a strong suspicion that the "opera-house" part of the scheme is introduced mainly, if not solely and simply, with an eye to the possible profits of the building—as a matter of economy. But it is poor economy to scrimp on the sine qua non of any enterprise; and the sine qua non in the case of the new Music Hall is that it shall be a good, admirable, magnificent place for orchestral and choral effect. To make it a second-rate concert hall, just for the sake of making it a third-rate opera house into the bargain, were sheer Philistine folly.

W. F. A.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

II.

Next to the plan of giving the new hall a double-headed character, the suggestion to make it a "monumental" building is the worst yet advanced. In the first place, a concert hall, theatre, or opera house never should be a "monumental" building—unless it be some such enormous pile as the Paris Académie de Musique, or some of the court opera houses in Germany. The best thing about the old Music Hall, the Boston, Tremont, and Globe Theatres, is that they have practically no outside, that they are surrounded by other buildings, and thus shut off from the noise of the street. And the great "monumental" opera-houses in Europe, with their splendid façades and striking architecture all round, are really no exceptions to this rule; they are so vast that they surround themselves (that is, their auditoriums) with their spacious lobbies, foyers, business offices, etc., so that all noises from the street or square are effectually shut out. If anyone wishes the new Music Hall to be such a "monument," he is at liberty to furnish the funds, and the present writer will be the last to complain. If it be objected that one of the proposed sites for a "monumental" building—the middle of Commonwealth avenue, near the terpsichorean statue of the discoverer of Old Cambridge—is not in a noisy locality, the answer is that, if that part of the city is not noisy now, it will be as soon as the new Music Hall is in running order; such an establishment is bound to draw street-railway lines to itself like a magnet. Let the new hall rather be in the middle of a block, surrounded by as many other structures as possible, with an entrance like that of the Boston Theatre; then there will be quiet within its walls. Have the interior as handsome as you please; but no outside!

Another objection to a "monumental" building is its cost. I doubt much whether the $400,000 called for and subscribed will allow the projectors much elbow-room for luxury; and, unless enough extra money is subscribed to erect a "monumental" structure that would run into the millions, all exterior luxury is worse than needless. Still we are a luxurious people, and fast growing more and more so; luxury will by no means be out of place in the new hall, if it be the right sort of luxury. To my mind the available money should be spent, first, upon securing the best possible musical effect in the hall; next upon comfort, and thirdly upon beauty.

A word or two on the subject of comfort. It has always been a matter of astonishment to me that the rule which obtains in all our theatres, and against which no one that I ever heard of has kicked, should be considered impracticable in our concert halls; I mean the rule of having graduated prices for seats in different parts of the house, and very obvious distinctions between such seats. It has been urged that such is the pride of the native-born American that he will not consent to be seen at a concert occupying a seat for which he has evidently not paid the highest price; that the best is not too good for him, and that, if he should perchance occupy a lower-priced seat than the very best, there must be no visible line of demarcation to publish this fact to the rest of the audience. In other words, that he must at least look as if he had paid as much for his seat as anybody. Now, I claim to be a tolerably patriotic American myself and a firm believer in the American spirit; consequently this assertion seems to me to be about the most insulting to the honor of my fellow-countrymen that can be imagined. To try to make anyone believe that we sons of tea-spillers have developed that super-refined quintessence of snobishness that can make a bifurcated animal ashamed of his own shortness of purse, and base his "respectability" on, not even the seat, but the mere look of the seat he occupies at a concert, is simply a monstrous piece of impudence. We have all heard of "purse-pride" as a not very estimable feeling; but surely this alleged "purse-shame" is doubly and trebly contemptible; let him run the risk of imputing it to us Americans who dares! And what has all this to do with comfort in a concert hall? Simply this: that, beyond a certain pretty narrow limit, a comfortable seat at a concert, as at the theatre, is something of a luxury, and, as such, ought to be paid for. The right principle is, or should be, that every member of the audience pays so much for the right to hear the music, uninterrupted; for the additional, extra-artistic right of listening to it comfortably he must pay so much more; for the right to listen to it luxuriously he must pay so very much more. This is the principle on which all theatres are run; all concert rooms ought to be run on the same. There ought to be at least four classes of seats at our symphony concerts, their respective prices to be regulated in part according to their situation in the hall, and also in part according to the amount of physical comfort they afford the occupant—for which comfort he must, of course, be willing to pay. There is no reason why people able and willing to pay for them should not have wide, deep, luxurious seats in the best and "most favored" parts of the hall, the rows far enough apart to allow late-comers to pass in and early-goers to pass out without making themselves absolute nuisances to their sitting neighbors. The best opera houses and theatres in France and Germany—where people do not begin to know as much about the material comforts of life as we do here—have such seats. Why, then, should not we have them also, even in our concert halls? Managers look askance upon them, for they take up room in a hall and reduce the seating capacity. But what of that? Raise the price as far as the public will stand it; increase the seating capacity by crowding at the other end—in the top gallery, for instance—and cutting down the price there accordingly. It is the merest moonshine to say that a public which accepts this plan at our theatres will not accept it at concerts. Our public is not such a fool as that!

Another point! We as a people are beginning to pay more regard to sanitary living than we used to; we go in more for athletics, out-of-door exercise, wholesome dress, ventilation, etc. I am much mistaken if the days of the man who keeps his overcoat on at the theatre or at a concert are not numbered; surely the coming generation will have outgrown this most gracious of all invitations to influenza, pneumonia and pleurisy. The "coming man" will take off his overcoat at a concert, and his wife and daughters will provide themselves with outer garments from which they can extricate themselves without dislocation. Now it is not pleasant to hold one's outer wraps—to which may possibly be added a dripping umbrella—in one's lap, neither is it particularly good for those garments to be stowed away on the floor under the seat; to take off or put on warm overshoes, when cramped in your seat, is also a process accompanied with more or less difficulty and discomfort. A good cloak-room is a great convenience. Remember, I say a good cloak-room, not one of those terrible places where you painfully struggle to reclaim your belongings in Rugby football fashion. No doubt the cloak-room problem presents serious difficulties, but it seems to have been satisfactorily solved at the new concert hall of the Gewandhaus in Leipzig. Leipzig is not notorious for its enterprise, but even the most "go-ahead" city in the world might learn a lesson from it in this particular. At the new Gewandhaus every numbered ticket to a concert gives the holder the right, not only to a reserved seat, but is accompanied by a correspondingly numbered key to a private locker for his overcoat, hat, umbrella and overshoes. There is consequently no strugle in the cloak-room after the concert; every one goes to his own locker, gets his belongings and departs, leaving the key in the lock. It seems to me that Boston is quite as ready to enjoy such a luxury as Leipzig! When we do a thing at all, it is just as well to do it in a civilized way; that we have been barbarous for ages is no good reason for remaining barbarous forever.

336

On the most important point of all I hesitate to speak: the size of the new hall. That the platform in the old Music Hall—not walled in at the sides—was too broad for good orchestral effect may be regarded as an established fact; that the effect of the orchestra could have been notably improved by having proper sound-reflectors at the sides, as well as overhead, thus narrowing the space occupied by the players, is more than probable. A thoroughly good sounding-board would doubtless have made the orchestra as effective as possible in that hall. But remember also that, when Mr. Gericke complained that the hall was too broad—meaning especially the part occupied by the orchestra, the answer was made, "Yes; and too long and too high into the bargain!" In fact the hall was too large for any orchestra to make its best effect in. And yet the seating capacity of the hall was none too great; for some purposes it was even insufficient. Here is one point on which it would be well for all interested in the cause of music in our city to reflect. The president of the Handel and Haydn Society told me not long ago that, with a third balcony added to the Music Hall, the society could make enough more money on annual performances of the "Messiah" and of "Elijah" or the "Creation" to enable it to bring out one or two new oratorios every year without pecuniary loss (be it remembered that new works do not draw well, as a rule, and are consequently unremunerative). This item of a large seating capacity is a purely practical one, and is the only possible excuse for waiving the artistic consideration that music halls should not be too large. But it should not be forgotten that the seating capacity of the old Music Hall was out of all rational proportion to its cubic contents, that it was abnormally and ridiculously small, considering the vast size of the hall; never was space more ruinously wasted in a concert hall. Except for the sake of architectural proportions, the whole upper half of the hall was utterly wasted. Now, although the most ardent and firmly convinced champion of small concert halls for orchestral purposes would hardly dare to advocate the new music hall's having a smaller seating capacity than the old one, and it would probably be well worth while to have this seating capacity largely increased, it may be perfectly consistently urged that the new hall itself ought certainly not be larger than the old one, and might perhaps be even smaller to good advantage. Here is a problem for architects to solve. At any rate, this much is certain: by just so much as the new hall is larger (in cubic contents) than the old one, by just so much will it represent a retrograde movement, and not an advance, in the musical conditions in our city.

W. F. A.

SITE FOR THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Lot at the Corner of West Chester Park and Huntington Avenue Has Been Selected.

It is announced today that the lot at the northwest corner of West Chester park and Huntington avenue has been selected by the committee as a site for the new Music Hall building. Now that the question of a site has been settled, the committee has asked subscribers to pay in one-half of the amount of their subscriptions on or before Nov. 15, and the balance in a second instalment to be paid before May 15 of next year. As soon as the amount of $200,000 has been paid in the corporation will be organized and one share of stock will be issued for each $100 paid in. The capital stock will be $500,000.

Musical Notes.

The Town Topics remarks: "Mr. Nikisch, now installed at Buda-Pesth, discloses a lively interest in the future of the B. S. O. His estimate of Mr. Higginson, imparted to most of his intimates, should be given to the Boston public, and not kept for the exclusive edification of Germany." It might be equally interesting to know what Mr. Higginson's estimate of Mr. Nikisch is, and if it was given to the Boston public it might startle some of Mr. Nikisch's former intimates in this city. Considering the sort of an exit that Mr. Nikisch made, it might be well for him to remain silent under the circumstances. There is no doubt concerning the estimate the critical press of Boston have imparted to the public regarding Mr. Nikisch. Neither is there any doubt concerning the estimate that the press and the public both entertain regarding the noble generosity of Mr. Higginson, the benefactor of the public as well as of Mr. Nikisch, if the latter does not appreciate the fact.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, this season, will be given at Carnegie Hall instead of Chickering Hall as formerly. The latter seats only 1200 while the former has 3000 chairs. As the patronage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has constantly increased in New York until the Chickering Hall has been overflowed with listeners, this extra room at Carnegie Hall will enable the management to accommodate comfortably the surplus of subscribers, the number of which will be increased as the facility for offering good seating places is improved. It is reported that Mr. Damrosch's orchestra will be reduced in numbers this season. This fact will render Mr. Higginson's superb and complete orchestra all the more welcome to the New Yorkers. There is every reason also to hope that the new conductor, Mr. Paur, will prove a great success,—an additional item of consideration.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

A NEW MUSIC HALL.

It seems that the destruction of Music Hall is inevitable, in order to make way for the new rapid transit route through the city, and if another building of the same kind is not erected, Boston will be without a fitting place in which orchestral and choral works of importance can be heard to the best advantage. This means that unless a new hall be erected we shall lose, among other things, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an event that no one who takes pride in the musical standing of Boston can anticipate without dismay. The concerts by this splendid organization have given the city an enviable place among the prominent music centres of the world, and their loss would be little short of a calamity. The situation is somewhat critical. Mr. Higginson cannot feel justified in reorganizing his orchestra, unless he has a proper place in which their performances can be given; nor can he make a contract with a new conductor, for the same reason. His future course must be decided within a very few days, and if some $400,000 be not subscribed for a new hall without delay, it is imperative that the concerts shall be abandoned. In this crying emergency a number of gentlemen have subscribed largely for a building to take the place of that which is to pass away. The site is already selected, but the subscriptions have not yet reached the amount called for. It would appear that Boston should contain enough of wealth and public-spirited music lovers to respond to the appeal made to them by the circular that has been issued. Mr. Higginson is content to contribute his share by maintaining the orchestra, and should not be expected to do more, considering the great expense and responsibility that fall on him in this connection. Time is an important element in the matter, for if the needed sum be not subscribed in a few days it is almost certain that the orchestra which has reflected such honor on Boston will have ceased to be, and it will be no credit to the reputation of the city as a rich and famous art home, that such a disaster should happen through lack of public spirit to avert it. The pulling down of Music Hall will leave us without any large concert room, and it is only a matter of time when another must be built to take its place, unless we are to be left wholly without a structure devoted to musical art of the highest order.

337
 The emergency might as well be met now as at any other date, especially in view of the certain disbanding of the symphony orchestra unless a proper home is provided for it. It is difficult to realize that the money will not be subscribed quickly and generously for a new Music Hall, but time presses; engagements with the orchestra are to be made, and a five years' contract with a conductor is to be signed. These important matters cannot be delayed beyond a week, and hence the situation is reduced to a consideration whether the symphony concerts are or are not to be continued. It would seem that an answer in the affirmative should be immediately given by the rapidity with which the money to build a new hall, is subscribed.

THE SUBSCRIPTION for a new Music Hall has reached a figure that gives fair promise that the needed sum will be raised. It is to be hoped that the full amount may be subscribed within the stipulated time, not only because the continuance of the Symphony Concerts will thereby be assured, but because Boston should have a temple of music better adapted to modern requirements than is the hall that has done service so long. In no American city of the importance of Boston is there such a scant provision for concert giving as there is here; and whether the old Music Hall is to be pulled down or not, a new one on the plan suggested will remedy a shortcoming that has been felt for many years. Nearly three quarters of the sum called for has already been subscribed, and it would seem that there should be no difficulty in obtaining the rest.

POEM. "Le Rouet d'Omphale."

Armide."

"Academic Festival."

st:

EAMES.

gle in the cloak-room after the concert; every one goes to his own locker, gets his belongings and departs, leaving the key in the lock. It seems to me that Boston is quite as ready to enjoy such a luxury as Leipzig! When we do a thing at all, it is just as well to do it in a civilized way; that we have been barbarous for ages is no good reason for remaining barbarous forever.

On the most important point of all I hesitate to speak: the size of the new hall. That the platform in the old Music Hall—not walled in at the sides—was too broad for good orchestral effect may be regarded as an established fact; that the effect of the orchestra could have been notably improved by having proper sound-reflectors at the sides, as well as overhead, thus narrowing the space occupied by the players, is more than probable. A thoroughly good sounding-board would doubtless have made the orchestra as effective as possible in that hall. But remember also that, when Mr. Gericke complained that the hall was too broad—meaning especially the part occupied by the orchestra, the answer was made, "Yes; and too long and too high into the bargain!" In fact the hall was too large for any orchestra to make its best effect in. And yet the seating capacity of the hall was none too great; for some purposes it was even insufficient. Here is one point on which it would be well for all interested in the cause of music in our city to reflect. The president of the Handel and Haydn Society told me not long ago that, with a third balcony added to the Music Hall, the society could make enough more money on annual performances of the "Messiah" and of "Elijah" or the "Creation" to enable it to bring out one or two new oratorios every year without pecuniary loss (be it remembered that new works do not draw well, as a rule, and are consequently unremunerative). This item of a large seating capacity is a purely practical one, and is the only possible excuse for waiving the artistic consideration that music halls should not be too large. But it should not be forgotten that the seating capacity of the old Music Hall was out of all rational proportion to its cubic contents, that it was abnormally and ridiculously small, considering the vast size of the hall; never was space more ruinously wasted in a concert hall. Except for the sake of architectural proportions, the whole upper half of the hall was utterly wasted. Now, although the most ardent and firmly convinced champion of small concert halls for orchestral purposes would hardly dare to advocate the new music hall's having a smaller seating capacity than the old one, and it would probably be well worth while to have this seating capacity largely increased, it may be perfectly consistently urged that the new hall itself ought certainly not be larger than the old one, and might perhaps be even smaller to good advantage. Here is a problem for architects to solve. At any rate, this much is certain: by just so much as the new hall is larger (in cubic contents) than the old one, by just so much will it represent a retrograde movement, and not an advance, in the musical conditions in our city.

SITE FOR THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Lot at the Corner of West Chester Park and Huntington Avenue Has Been Selected.

It is announced today that the lot at the northwest corner of West Chester park and Huntington avenue has been selected by the committee as a site for the new Music Hall building. Now that the question of a site has been settled, the committee has asked subscribers to pay in one-half of the amount of their subscriptions on or before Nov. 15, and the balance in a second instalment to be paid before May 15 of next year. As soon as the amount of $200,000 has been paid in the corporation will be organized and one share of stock will be issued for each $100 paid in. The capital stock will be $500,000.

Musical Notes.

The Town Topics remarks: "Mr. Nikisch, now installed at Buda-Pesth, discloses a lively interest in the future of the B. S. O. His estimate of Mr. Higginson, imparted to most of his intimates, should be given to the Boston public, and not kept for the exclusive edification of Germany." It might be equally interesting to know what Mr. Higginson's estimate of Mr. Nikisch is, and if it was given to the Boston public it might startle some of Mr. Nikisch's former intimates in this city. Considering the sort of an exit that Mr. Nikisch made, it might be well for him to remain silent under the circumstances. There is no doubt concerning the estimate the critical press of Boston have imparted to the public regarding Mr. Nikisch. Neither is there any doubt concerning the estimate that the press and the public both entertain regarding the noble generosity of Mr. Higginson, the benefactor of the public as well as of Mr. Nikisch, if the latter does not appreciate the fact.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York, this season, will be given at Carnegie Hall instead of Chickering Hall as formerly. The latter seats only 1200 while the former has 3000 chairs. As the patronage of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has constantly increased in New York until the Chickering Hall has been overflowed with listeners, this extra room at Carnegie Hall will enable the management to accommodate comfortably the surplus of subscribers, the number of which will be increased as the facility for offering good seating places is improved. It is reported that Mr. Damrosch's orchestra will be reduced in numbers this season. This fact will render Mr. Higginson's superb and complete orchestra all the more welcome to the New Yorkers. There is every reason also to hope that the new conductor, Mr. Paur, will prove a great success,—an additional item of consideration.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

A NEW MUSIC HALL.

It seems that the destruction of Music Hall is inevitable, in order to make way for the new rapid transit route through the city, and if another building of the same kind is not erected, Boston will be without a fitting place in which orchestral and choral works of importance can be heard to the best advantage. This means that unless a new hall be erected we shall lose, among other things, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an event that no one who takes pride in the musical standing of Boston can anticipate without dismay. The concerts by this splendid organization have given the city an enviable place among the prominent music centres of the world, and their loss would be little short of a calamity. The situation is somewhat critical. Mr. Higginson cannot feel justified in reorganizing his orchestra, unless he has a proper place in which their performances can be given; nor can he make a contract with a new conductor, for the same reason. His future course must be decided within a very few days, and if some $400,000 be not subscribed for a new hall without delay, it is imperative that the concerts shall be abandoned. In this crying emergency a number of gentlemen have subscribed largely for a building to take the place of that which is to pass away. The site is already selected, but the subscriptions have not yet reached the amount called for. It would appear that Boston should contain enough of wealth and public-spirited music lovers to respond to the appeal made to them by the circular that has been issued. Mr. Higginson is content to contribute his share by maintaining the orchestra, and should not be expected to do more, considering the great expense and responsibility that fall on him in this connection. Time is an important element in the matter, for if the needed sum be not subscribed in a few days it is almost certain that the orchestra which has reflected such honor on Boston will have ceased to be, and it will be no credit to the reputation of the city as a rich and famous art home, that such a disaster should happen through lack of public spirit to avert it. The pulling down of Music Hall will leave us without any large concert room, and it is only a matter of time when another must be built to take its place, unless we are to be left wholly without a structure devoted to musical art of the highest order.

The emergency might as well be met now as at any other date, especially in view of the certain disbanding of the symphony orchestra unless a proper home is provided for it. It is difficult to realize that the money will not be subscribed quickly and generously for a new Music Hall, but time presses; engagements with the orchestra are to be made, and a five years' contract with a conductor is to be signed. These important matters cannot be delayed beyond a week, and hence the situation is reduced to a consideration whether the symphony concerts are or are not to be continued. It would seem that an answer in the affirmative should be immediately given by the rapidity with which the money to build a new hall, is subscribed.

THE SUBSCRIPTION for a new Music Hall has reached a figure that gives fair promise that the needed sum will be raised. It is to be hoped that the full amount may be subscribed within the stipulated time, not only because the continuance of the Symphony Concerts will thereby be assured, but because Boston should have a temple of music better adapted to modern requirements than is the hall that has done service so long. In no American city of the importance of Boston is there such a scant provision for concert giving as there is here; and whether the old Music Hall is to be pulled down or not, a new one on the plan suggested will remedy a shortcoming that has been felt for many years. Nearly three quarters of the sum called for has already been subscribed, and it would seem that there should be no difficulty in obtaining the rest.

POEM. "Le Rouet d'Omphale."

Armide."

"Academic Festival."

st:

EAMES.

VOLUME 13

1893-1894

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON.
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION.

★★ M 125.5 vol. 13

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1893-1894 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. Spence.

 M. 125. 5. Vol 13
1893-94
Allen A. Brown
Aug 14. 1894

For '95 read 94
Index " 94 " 93

Composer	Title of Work	Concert	Date	Soloists
d'Albert E.	Ouv. "Esther" op 8.	XIV	July 3. 94
Back J. S.	Suite No 2. B min for String Orchestra and Flute	XII	July 20. 94
Beethoven	Symphony No 1. op 21	IX	Dec 23. 93
"	" 3 " 55	XXI	Apr 7. 94
"	" 4 " 60	XVIII	Nov 10. "
"	" 5 " 67	I	Oct 14. 93
"	" 6 " 68	XXIV	Apr 28. 94
"	" 8 " 93	XIV	July 3. "
"	" 9 " 125	XIX	Nov 17. "
	(Two movements only)
	Overture "Leonore" No 3. op 72	III	Oct 26. 93
"	" "Coriolan" op 62	XII	July 20. 94
"	" "Egmont" op 84	XVI	July 24. "
"	" "König Stephen" op 117	XXIII	Apr 21. "
	Concert für Violin und op 61	X	Dec 30. 93	Franz Kneisel
"	" für Piano " op 58	IX	Dec 23. "	Carl Baermann
	Rec. u. Aria from "Fidelio" "Atschentlicher" with orch.	II	Oct 21. 93	Minu Nordica
Berlioz H.	Three motifs "Romeo u. Juliette" op 17.	VI	Nov 25. 93
	Ouv. "King Lear" op 4	XII	July 20. 94
	" Rakoczy March" (Dram. Faust) op 24	XXII	" 27. "
	" Symphonie Fantastique" op 142	XXII	Nov 3. "
Brahms J.	Symphonie No 1. op 68	VII	Dec 2. 93
"	" 2. " 73	XV	July 17. 94
"	" 4. " 98	XXIII	Apr 21. "
	Academische Fest Overture op 80	IV	Nov 4. 93
	Tragische Overture op 81	XXI	Apr 7. 94
	Var. on a Theme by Haydn op 56 a	XXII	Dec 9. 93
	Concerto für Violin, Cello u. orch. No 1	V	Nov 8. "	Franz Kneisel u. J. Schroeder
Bruck, Max	Romanza für Violin u. orch. op 42	XV	July 17. 94	C. M. Loeffler
	" Not Nidrei" Cello u. orch. op 47	XX	Nov 24. "	Leo Schultz

	For "94 Read" 93 "95" 94
Bulow H. von	Funerale op 23 no 4	XXI	Apr 7.95
Dvorak et.	Symphonie No 5. op 95	X	Dec 30.94
	" Slavische Rhapsodie " No 2. op 48	II	Oct 21. "
Glinka	Opus "Ruslan u. Ludmilla"	XXII	Nov 3.95
	"Kamerinskaja" Fantasia	"	" " "
Gluck	Opus "Iphigenia in Aulide"	V	Nov 18.94
	Wagner's arrangement
	Aria "Ah! si la liberte" Armide	IV	Nov 4.94	Emma Eames
	with orchestra
Goetz H.	Symphonie in F op 9.	III	Oct 28.94
Handel	Concerto Grosso No 10. in D m:	XXVI	Feb 24.95
	Air "Honour and Arms" from Samson	"	" " "	Max Heinrich
	with orchestra
Hartmann E.	"Eine Nordische Meerfahrt" für orch.	XV	Feb 17.95
Haydn	Symphonie No 2. D maj:	XXVI	Feb 24.95
	Aria "With verdure clad" (Creation)	XXIX	Feb 17. "	Mad. Lillian Blauvelt with orch.
Johns, Clayton	"Berceuse and Scherzo" (String orch.).	XX	Feb 24.95
Liszt F.	Eine Faust Symphonie	XX	Feb 24.95
	"Orpheus" Symph. Poem	XXII	Feb 3. "
	"Nephitis Waltz" (Scene in the Tavern)	XXIV	Apr 28 "
	"Rhapsodie Espagnole" arr. for Pianos	XXII	Jan 27 "	F. Buroni and orch. by F. Buroni
Loeffler C.M.	"Concerto Fantastique" for cello and	XXIV	Feb 3.95	M. Schreder orchestra
Marmont J.	Rec. et Air "Herodiade" Il est d'ouste	II	Oct 21	Mme Rodier
	" " " " "	XXIII	Apr 21.94	Antoinette Trebelli
	"Rec et air" "Le Cid"	IV	Nov 4. "	Emma Eames

Mendelssohn	Symphonie No 3. op 56	XXII	Jan 20.95
	Opus "Die Hebriden" op 26	XXVII	Feb 10 "
	" " "Meeresstille" op 27	XX	" 24 "
	"Midsummer's Night Dream" Music
	Complete - Geo. Riddle Reader	XXIF	Apr 14.95	Barnard - Smith
	Cho. by Cecilia Club			Hermit S. Whittier
Mohique B.	Violin Concerts No 5. op 21.	XXI	Apr 7.95	Otto Roth
	2 movements
Mozart	Symphonie in C maj. (Jupiter)	V	Nov 18.94
	" " "G minor"	XXIX	Feb 17.95
	Overture "Die Zauberflöte"	VI	Dec 2.94
	" " "Le Nozze di Figaro"	XXVII	Feb 10.95
	Serenade No 7 - Kaffner -	IV	Dec 23.94	Franz Ximel with Violin obligato
	Aria "Die Entführung" with orch.	XVI	Feb 24.95	Max Heinrich
	Aria "Voi che sapete" Figaro " "	XXIX	Feb 17 "	Lillian Blauvelt
	Rec et air "Non mir dir" Dr. Giovanni	XXII	Apr 21 "	Antoinette Trebelli
Paine J. X.	Prelude "Oedipus Tyrannus" op 30	XXIII	Apr 21.95
Rubinstein A.	Dramatic Symphonie No 4. op 95	VII	Dec 9.94
	Ballet Music from "Fenians"	XIV	Feb 3.95
	"Don Quixote" op 87	XV	" 17. "
Saint-Saens C.	Symp. Poem "Le Rocco d'Onphale" op 31.	IV	Nov 4.94
	Concerto Violin + orch. op 62	XV	Feb 17.95	C. M. Loeffler
Schubert F.	Symphonie No 9. in C.	II	Oct 21.94
	Opus "Rosamunde" op 26.	IX	Dec 23 "
	Grande Fantasia in C maj: op 15	VI	Nov 25 "	Mme Emil Pauer
	Piano orchestra
Schumann R.	Symphony No 1. op 38	VI	Nov 25.94
	" " "4. " 120	XXII	Jan 27.95
	Opus "Manfred" op 115	VII	Dec 9.94
	" " "Genoveva" " 81	XXIV	Apr 28.95
	Opus. Scherzo + Finale op 52	XXIII	Feb 10. "

Janetana	Symp. Poem "Vltava"	VII	Dec. 74
Tschaikowski	Serenade for strings op. 48	I	Oct 14. 94
	Ouv. "Solemnelle" 1812 op. 49	X	Dec 30. "
	Violin Concerto No 2 op. 35 with orch. (2 parts)	VII	Dec. 1. "	P. Adamowski
Volkmann R.	Ouv. "Richard III" op. 68.	II	Oct 18. 94
	Serenade No 3. op. 69	III	" 28. "
Wagner R.	Ouv. "Tannhauser"	I	Oct 14. 94
	Prelude "Die Meistersinger"	XI	Jan 6. 95
	"Faust Overture"	"	" " "
	"Siegfried Idyll"	"	" " "
	"Huldigungs Marsch"	XIV	Apr 18 "
	"Vorspiel u. Liebestod" Tristan with orch	XI	Jan 6. "	Wine Materns
	"Brunnhilde's Dying Remarks" Sotterdänny	"	" " " "	"
Weber C. M. von	Ouv. "Euryanthe"	XIII	Jan 27. 95
	"Oberon"	XIX	Feb 12 "
	"Concertstück" Piano + orch. op. 79	XII	Jan 27 "	F. Busoni

Composers with no. of works given d'Albat E.	1

Bach J. S.	1
Beethoven	13
Berlioz H.	4
Brahms J.	7
Brech, Max	2
Bulow H. von	1
Dvořák A.	2
Glinka M. J.	2
Gluck Chev. de	2
Gaetz H.	1
Handel	2
Hartmann E.	1
Haydn J.	2
Johns, Clayton	1
Liszt F.	4
Loeffler C. M.	1
Marsenet J.	2
Mendelssohn	4
Molique B.	1
Mozart	8
Paine J. K.	1
Rubinstein A.	3
Saint-Saens G.	2
Schubert F.	3
Schumann R.	5
Janetana	1
Tschaikowski	3
Volkmann R.	2
Wagner R.	7
Weber C. M. von	3

Soloists
With Date of Appearance

Pianists

Baermann, Carl	Dec 23. 94	93
Buroni F.	Jan 27. 95	94
Pauer, Mrs Emil	Nov 25. 94	93

Violinists

Adamowski F.	Dec 2. 94	93
Kneisel, Franz	" 23. "	"
" "	" 38. "	"
Loeffler L. M.	Feb 17. 95	94
Roth, Otto	Apr 17. "	"

Cello

Schraeder, Chas	Nov 18. 94	93
" "	Feb 3. 95	"
Schulz, Leo	Mar 24. "	"

Vocalists

Barnard-Smith, Mrs	Apr 14. 95	94
Blauvelt, Lilien	Mar 17. "	"
Eames, Emma	Nov 4. 94	93
Heinrich, Max	Feb 24. 95	94
Matern, Madame	Jan 6. "	"
Nordica, Madame	Oct 21. 94	93
Prehelli, Antoinette	Apr 21. 95	94
Whitten, Harriet S.	Apr 14. "	"

"The Cecilia"

Apr 14. 1895

Conductor Emil Pauer

10
~ ~ ~ BOSTON MUSIC HALL ~ ~ ~

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

ON CONSECUTIVE SATURDAY EVENINGS, FROM OCTOBER 14, 1893, TO APRIL 28, 1894, OMITTING NOV. 11, DEC. 16, 1893, JAN. 13, FEB. 10,
AND MARCH 31, 1894, AND

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, FROM OCTOBER 13, 1893, TO APRIL 27, 1894, OMITTING NOV. 10, DEC. 15, 1893, JAN. 12, FEB. 9,
AND MARCH 30, 1894.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts, $12.00 and $7.50, according to and for the series of Rehearsals, location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, September 25th, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, September 26th, at 10 A.M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, September 28th, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, September 29th, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice ; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

TIGHT BINDING

CONNELLY'S PLANS OF MUSIC HALL

From which to order season seats for the Symphony Rehearsals and Concerts, season of '93 and '94. Select your seats and mail Plan to Connelly's Theatre Ticket Office, Adams House.

(See next page.)

STAGE.

A	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	A	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
B	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	B	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
C	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	C	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
D	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	D	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
E	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	E	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
F	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	F	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
G	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	G	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
H	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	H	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
I	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	I	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
J	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	J	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
K	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	K	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
L	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	L	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
M	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	M	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
N	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	N	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
O	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	O	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
P	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	P	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
Q	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	Q	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
R	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	R	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
S	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	S	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
T	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	T	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
U	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	U	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
V	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	V	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
W	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	W	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
X	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	X	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
Y	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	Y	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
Z	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	Z	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
AA	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	AA	7 6 5 4 3 2 1

10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26	27	28	29	30	31	32	33	34	35	36	37	38	39	40	41	42	43	44	45	46	47	48	49	50	51	52	53	54	55	56	57	58	59	60	61	62	63	64	65	66	67	68	69	70	71	72	73	74	75	76	77	78	79	80	81	82	83	84	85	86	87	88	89	90	91	92	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100
----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	-----

PLEASE RETURN THIS SHEET HERE AND RETURN TO US.

TIGHT BINDING

CONNELLY'S PLANS OF MUSIC HALL

From which to order season seats for the Symphony Rehearsals and Concerts, season of '93 and '94. Select your seats and mail Plan
46 Connelly's Theatre Ticket Office, Adams House.
(See next page.)

STAGE.

A	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	A	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
B	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	B	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
C	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	C	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
D	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	D	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
E	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	E	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
F	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	F	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
G	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	G	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
H	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	H	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
I	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	I	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
J	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	J	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
K	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	K	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
L	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	L	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
M	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	M	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
N	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	N	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
O	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	O	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
P	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	P	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
Q	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	Q	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
R	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	R	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
S	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	S	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
T	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	T	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
U	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	U	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
V	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	V	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
W	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	W	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
X	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	X	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
Y	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	Y	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
Z	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	Z	7 6 5 4 3 2 1
AA	34 33 32 31 30 29 28	AA	7 6 5 4 3 2 1

MRS. EMIL PAUP.

(From the first photograph she has had taken in this country.)

PLEASE CUT THIS SHEET HERE AND RETURN TO US.

10	11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19	20	21	22	23	24	25	26	27	28	29	30	31	32	33	34	35	36	37	38	39	40	41	42	43	44	45	46	47	48	49	50	51	52	53	54	55	56	57	58	59	60	61	62	63	64	65	66	67	68	69	70	71	72	73	74	75	76	77	78	79	80	81	82	83	84	85	86	87	88	89	90	91	92	93	94	95	96	97	98	99	100
----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	----	-----

A SEPARATE TICKET OFFICE IS PROVIDED FOR LADIES AT THE END OF THE LADIES' ENTRANCE TO THE HOTEL.

Connelly's Balcony Plans of Music Hall.

CAPACITY OF MUSIC HALL, 2,397 SEATS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

SEASON 1893-94.

TEN CONCERTS

... IN ...

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge,

... ON ...

THURSDAY EVENINGS, October 19, November 2, November 16,
December 7, January 4, January 25, February 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

SOLOISTS:

MME. NORDICA.

MR. LEO SCHULZ.

MR. MAX HEINRICH.

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50.

The sale of season tickets opens at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, Saturday, October 14, at 8 A.M.

A limited number of seats have been reserved for College officers and invited guests.

10
3
AFTER MARKING THE PLAN DETACH THIS SHEET HERE AND RETURN TO US.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

THIRTEENTH SEASON, 1893-94

EIGHTH SEASON IN NEW YORK.

= - Five Concerts in = - Music Hall

(Seventh Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street).

Wednesday Evening, November 8,

Thursday Evening, December 14,

Thursday Evening, January 11,

Thursday Evening, February 8,

Thursday Evening, March 29.

SOLOISTS.

Mme. EMMA EAMES,

Mme. LILLIAN NORDICA,

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL,

And others to be announced.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.50, $6.00, $5.00, and $4.00, according to location. Boxes (seating six), $50.00.

The sale of subscription tickets opens Thursday, Oct. 12, at Messrs. E. Schuberth & Co.'s, 23 Union Square.

 Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of subscription tickets.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

HERR EMIL PAUR.

The Boston Orchestra's New Conductor.

His Personal Characteristics and Professional Career—A Violinist and Pianist of Excellent Parts—Illustrations of His Domestic and Artistic Life—The Scenes of His Recent Work in Leipsig.

[FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.]

LEIPSIG, July 13, 1893. Emil Paur was the successor of Nikisch in Leipsig, and he is to be the successor of Nikisch in Boston. Paur is a thorough artist and a capital man. There is about him none of the arrogant pretension, nor the manner of a pedantic martinet, which so often is associated with the public manner of eminent German conductors. Paur has been very popular in Leipsig. They say here that he understands completely how to make a programme. Besides, he is regarded in Leipsig as an orchestral conductor of the first rank. Then, again, he is a man of extraordinary versatility in his profession. He is not only one of the best conductors, but he is also an admirable violin soloist, and he is one of the most accomplished pianists in Germany. So you see that a man of parts is coming among you.

Paur goes to Boston, I am told, at a yearly salary of 40,000 marks, which in American money is equivalent to about $10,000 in round figures. There was some trouble and delay about the negotiations, because Paur's contract at the Leipsig Opera House, had still two years to run. But the matter was settled by Mr. Higginson coming to the rescue and offering to pay the forfeit money. I suppose that he paid it, because Paur will leave Leipsig for Boston in a couple of months.

We wonder here how long he will stay. Some say that Boston's artistic atmosphere is too frigid. An orchestral conductor in Vienna, Berlin, Leipsig, or any other considerable European town, seems to find his surroundings more congenial than those to which he becomes transferred in your part of the world. Here he is a little king; there, well, he is the leader of an orchestra. Let all this be as it may, and I am only prattling in conjecture. Paur goes with the good wishes of everybody here, and their regrets into the bargain. For we would rather keep him.

EMIL PAUR.

[From his latest photograph.]

Paur's Manner

is the most agreeable imaginable, both on the concert platform and off of it. He charmed me today when as a HERALD man I went to see him at his apartment on a third floor in the Loehrstrasse. He received me with a merry smile and a hearty handshake, and led me through his music room to his private study. There we chatted for three-quarters of an hour. Paur was willing enough to talk, but he said he had little to tell. "My life," quoth he, "has been an uneventful one. My story is only a story of work." Well, I looked about the place, and I thought this was a very modest way of putting it, for the room where we sat was pretty well trimmed with wreaths of laurel and other tokens of popular and professional admiration.

Paur is a tall man, slender in build, but well knit and strong, and with light, fair hair and beard. He is very pleasant looking, and he really enjoys being agreeable, but you can easily see that he has a mind of his own.

It is rather odd that you should take away our Nikisch and then our Emil Paur; but so it is, and now we shall have to see what can be done for ourselves. Paur is 38 years old. He was born at Czernowitz in the Bukowyna. He showed in early youth an unsurmountable and his tastes were cultivated, for his parents were fond of art. Not only did he receive regular musical instruction, but he had to experience all the toils and sufferings of a musical prodigy. At the age of 8, he met with huge success at the public musical examinations at Czernowitz. Some time after that his family went to Vienna to live, and it seems by that time his father, for some reason or other, had changed his mind, and opposed the young fellow's wish to follow the musical profession. But judicious friends interceded, and finally the father placed his son in the Vienna Conservatoire. There he gave himself up to study. You can see that he had the best masters, for he learned the violin of Hellmersberger, theory and composition of Bruckner and Despot, and the piano of Epstein. He was four years at the conservatoire, and he took the first prize there. Soon after this he became the first violinist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera of Vienna. But this position did not satisfy him long. He was ambitious; he yearned for a larger field.

Passion for Music.

Adelbert von Goldschmidt induced him to study the now well known composition "Die Siebel Todsdunen" and to produce it in Berlin. Paur did so. It was a Very Courageous Thing to Do.

because Berlin is not enamoured of those whom it considers outsiders. And, besides, where was our friend's experience? What reputation had he? What was the reason for this sudden springing up? The questions were answered and forever silenced. The Berlin press came out in high praise of the new conductor. The Berlin public applauded heartily, the Berlin musicians joined in the chorus of praise. So it came about that Paur's friends counselled him to become and to remain a conductor. He had, they said, every capacity for that high position. Then Paur was made conductor at Cassel. But at the same time he continued to study the piano, and by and by he was able to gratify his wish to be near his beloved Von Bulow, for he went to Hanover and studied there continually. From 1879 to 1880 he was at Koenigsberg, where he had been called by Conductor Staegemann, who later on became conductor at Leipzig.

MARIE PAUR-BURGER.

One of the first works conducted by Paur at Koenigsberg was Wagner's "Meistersinger." In this effort he found his reputation among the Wagnerians. But in spite of his success in this way he did not remain long at the Crowning Town, because his work was too much confined to the theatre, and it did not suffice to satisfy his ambitious and active spirit. Then he was made conductor of the Court Theatre of Mannheim, where there was good scope for his ability and his energy. For nine years he steadily developed as a conductor of concerts and operas and as a soloist on the piano and the violin. One of the best known German critics said after a performance of "Tristan and Isolde," which Paur conducted: "The effect was extraordinary. We very rarely hear such enthusiasm as this first representation aroused. The work was played with such power and force, and with such complete understanding of the spirit of the composer, that the performance at Mannheim was more than equal to the more celebrated performances of Berlin."

Paur sacrificed himself in the most unselfish way in order to obtain the brilliant results which are now being attached to his name. He Labored Early and Late.

He was untiring. But he did not neglect his accomplishments as an individual performer while he was doing all this, for when you come to know him you will know that he neglects nothing. To show that this is true let me tell you what an eminent German critic said when, in November, five years ago, Emil Paur conducted at the instrumental concert of the Bach Society, the B major concerto of Brahms, at the same time playing the piano part. It was written of him by our critics: "Only a real artist would dare the piano part; only the great have tried it. This part can be played only for the sake of the composition; it can never be played for the sake of the performer, because in it there is no occasion to be brilliant, there is no trace of parade passages. On the contrary there are immense difficulties. Brahms has been thinking orchestrally, and the piano is used only to work out the symphonic thought. How Paur can keep this wonderful composition in his memory surpasses our comprehension. He conducts as well as plays the piano parts; he becomes absorbed in the work; he overcomes the immense difficulties."

After this Paur's star rose rapidly. He had offers from Leipzig, from Hamburg and Berlin, but he remained at Mannheim until 1889. He conducted Berlioz's "Faust," and he became noted as one of the very best conductors of the Wagnerian operas. He made Mannheim quite a musical centre.

People used to go there from all parts to hear his concerts, to see him conduct, to make his acquaintance, to get his advice. He directed the concerts for the academy, he conducted for the musical societies, he wielded the baton in operas, and they say that no better concerts ever were given than Paur's concerts at Mannheim.

It was in 1889 that Paur was summoned to Leipzig to become

The Successor to Nikisch.

Here were difficulties. Nikisch was a great favorite, and Leipzig rather resented being deprived of him. His work had made his place difficult for any successor; but what happened? Why this? That, after Paur's first appearance at Leipzig, the critics recorded a brilliant success, and they said: "This man fights for Wagner with the fire of youth, and with burning enthusiasm he realizes Wagner's ideas. More than this, he is many sided; he does justice to other masters." I find an article in which it was said of Paur, about this time: "It was a pleasure to find 'Tannhauser' given with the animation of this new conductor, who is able to express the intention of the composer with the clearness of symphonic poetry. It was a pleasure to note the richness of accent, the varieties of reflection, the delicate shadings, the mysterious quietness and the violent passion produced under the conductorship of this man."

EXTERIOR OF THE GEWANDHAUS (MUSIC HALL), LEIPZIG.

So now you know something about Emil Paur, something about the manner of man he is, and what we think of him here. You must not for a moment think of him as solely a conductor of Wagner's operas. He interprets all masters with equal zeal; and, besides, you must bear in mind that, in addition to being a distinguished conductor of opera, this Emil Paur is fully as renowned among us as a concert giver, and in this line of work he is delightfully assisted by his charming wife, whose maiden name was Marie Burger, and who is now professionally known as Marie Paur-Burger.

Mrs. Paur

is a pianist who delights always by the grace and poetic charm of her performance. She was born in 1862 at Gengenbach, in the Schwarzwald. She received her education at Mannheim and Stuttgart, studying at the latter place in the conservatoire and particularly under the excellent professors Lebert and Bruckner. Anton Rubenstein encouraged her greatly, admired her playing and arranged that she should conclude her studies under the direction of Lescheditzki and his wife Annetta Essipoff.

Marie Burger married Emil Paur in 1881. They have two sons. Next to their children, Paur and his wife are devoted to their which he becomes transferred in your part of the world. Here he is a little king; there—well, he is the leader of an orchestra. Let all this be as it may, and I am only prattling in conjecture, Paur goes with the good wishes of everybody here, and their regrets into the bargain. For we would rather keep him.

Paur's Manner

is the most agreeable imaginable, both on the concert platform and off of it. He charmed me today when as a HERALD man I went to see him at his apartment on a third floor in the Loehrstrasse. He received me with a merry smile and a hearty handshake, and led me through his music room to his private study. There we chatted for three-quarters of an hour. Paur was willing enough to talk, but he said he had little to tell. "My life," quoth he, "has been an uneventful one. My story is only a story of work." Well, I looked about the place, and I thought this was a very modest way of putting it, for the room where we sat was pretty well trimmed with wreaths of laurel and other tokens of popular and professional admiration.

Paur is a tall man, slender in build, but well knit and strong, and with light, fair hair and beard. He is very pleasant looking, and he really enjoys being agreeable, but you can easily see that he has a mind of his own.

It is rather odd that you should take away our Nikisch and then our Emil Paur; but so it is, and now we shall have to see what can be done for ourselves. Paur is 38 years old. He was born at Czernowitz in the Bukowyna. He showed in early youth an unsurmountable

Passion for Music.

and his tastes were cultivated, for his parents were fond of art. Not only did he receive regular musical instruction, but he had to experience all the toils and sufferings of a musical prodigy. At the age of 8 he met with huge success at the public musical examinations at Czernowitz. Some time after that his family went to Vienna to live, and it seems by that time his father, for some reason or other, had changed his mind, and opposed the young fellow's wish to follow the musical profession. But judicious friends interceded, and finally the father placed his son in the Vienna Conservatoire. There he gave himself up to study. You can see that he had the best masters, for he earned the violin of Hellmersberger, the theory and composition of Bruckner and Despot, and the piano of Epstein. He was four years at the conservatoire, and he took the first prize there. Soon after this he became the first violinist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera of Vienna. But this position did not satisfy him long. He was ambitious; he yearned for a larger field.

Adelbert von Goldschmidt induced him to study the now well known composition "Die Siebel Todsunden" and to produce it in Berlin. Paur did so. It was a Very Courageous Thing to Do.

because Berlin is not enamoured of those whom it considers outsiders. And, besides, where was our friend's experience? What reputation had he? What was the reason for this sudden springing up? The questions were answered and forever silenced. The Berlin press came out in high praise of the new conductor. The Berlin public applauded heartily, the Berlin musicians joined in the chorus of praise. So it came about that Paur's friends counselled him to become and to remain a conductor. He had, they said, every capacity for that high position. Then Paur was made conductor at Cassel. But at the same time he continued to study the piano, and by and by he was able to gratify his wish to be near his beloved Von Bulow, for he went to Hanover and studied there continually. From 1879 to 1880 he was at Koenigsberg, where he had been called by Conductor Stagemann, who later on became conductor at Leipzig.

MARIE PAUR-BURGER.

One of the first works conducted by Paur at Koenigsberg was Wagner's "Meistersinger." In this effort he found his reputation among the Wagnerians. But in spite of his success in this way he did not remain long at the Crowning Town, because his work was too much confined to the theatre, and it did not suffice to satisfy his ambitious and active spirit. Then he was made conductor of the Court Theatre of Mannheim, where there was good scope for his ability and his energy. For nine years he steadily developed as a conductor of concerts and operas and as a soloist on the piano and the violin. One of the best known German critics said after a performance of "Tristan and Isolde," which Paur conducted: "The effect was extraordinary. We very rarely hear such enthusiasm as this first representation aroused. The work was played with such power and force, and with such complete understanding of the spirit of the composer, that the performance at Mannheim was more than equal to the more celebrated performances of Berlin."

Paur sacrificed himself in the most unselfish way in order to obtain the brilliant results which are now being attached to his name. He Labored Early and Late.

He was untiring. But he did not neglect his accomplishments as an individual performer while he was doing all this, for when you come to know him you will know that he neglects nothing. To show that this is true let me tell you what an eminent German critic said when, in November, five years ago, Emil Paur conducted at the instrumental concert of the Bach Society, the B major concerto of Brahms, at the same time playing the piano part. It was written of him by our critics: "Only a real artist would dare the piano part; only the great have tried it. This part can be played only for the sake of the composition; it can never be played for the sake of the performer, because in it there is no occasion to be brilliant, there is no trace of parade passages. On the contrary there are immense difficulties. Brahms has been thinking orchestrally, and the piano is used only to work out the symphonic thought. How Paur can keep this wonderful composition in his memory surpasses our comprehension. He conducts as well as plays the piano parts; he becomes absorbed in the work; he overcomes the immense difficulties."

After this Paur's star rose rapidly. He had offers from Leipzig, from Hamburg and Berlin, but he remained at Mannheim until 1889. He conducted Berlioz's "Faust," and he became noted as one of the very best conductors of the Wagnerian operas. He made Mannheim quite a musical centre.

People used to go there from all parts to hear his concerts, to see him conduct, to make his acquaintance, to get his advice. He directed the concerts for the academy, he conducted for the musical societies, he wielded the baton in operas, and they say that no better concerts ever were given than Paur's concerts at Mannheim.

It was in 1889 that Paur was summoned to Leipzig to become

The Successor to Nikisch.

Here were difficulties. Nikisch was a great favorite, and Leipzig rather resented being deprived of him. His work had made his place difficult for any successor; but what happened? Why this? That, after Paur's first appearance at Leipzig, the critics recorded a brilliant success, and they said: "This man fights for Wagner with the fire of youth, and with burning enthusiasm he realizes Wagner's ideas. More than this, he is many sided; he does justice to other masters." I find an article in which it was said of Paur, about this time: "It was a pleasure to find 'Tannhauser' given with the animation of this new conductor, who is able to express the intention of the composer with the clearness of symphonic poetry. It was a pleasure to note the riches of accent, the varieties of reflection, the delicate shadings, the mysterious quietness and the violent passion produced under the conductorship of this man."

EXTERIOR OF THE GEWANDHAUS (MUSIC HALL), LEIPZIG.

So now you know something about Emil Paur, something about the manner of man he is, and what we think of him here. You must not for a moment think of him as solely a conductor of Wagner's operas. He interprets all masters with equal zeal; and, besides, you must bear in mind that, in addition to being a distinguished conductor of opera, this Emil Paur is fully as renowned among us as a concert giver, and in this line of work he is delightfully assisted by his charming wife, whose maiden name was Marie Burger, and who is now professionally known as Marie Paur-Burger.

Mrs. Paur

is a pianist who delights always by the grace and poetic charm of her performance. She was born in 1862 at Gengenbach, in the Schwarzwald. She received her education at Mannheim and Stuttgart, studying at the latter place in the conservatoire and particularly under the excellent professors Lebert and Bruckner. Anton Rubenstein encouraged her greatly, admired her playing and arranged that she should conclude her studies under the direction of Lescheditzki and his wife Annetta Essipoff.

Marie Burger married Emil Paur in 1881. They have two sons. Next to their children, Paur and his wife are devoted to their art. They often appear together in the concert room each at a piano. They present music of rare delicacy, of exceptional value. I should say that there cannot be a work of any value in musical literature which the Paur's have not studied. To give you an idea of their concerts let me name these selections from one of their recent programmes: Emil Paur appears at the piano and gives Brahms's B

INTERIOR OF THE GEWANDHAUS (MUSIC HALL), LEIPZIG.

EMIL PAUR'S CHILDREN.

major "Concerto"; then he appears as the first violinist in Beethoven's last quartet; then he and his wife render a delightful variation from Schumann, and then they give Liszt's "Concert-Pathétique" for two pianos. Well, there is versatility!

So in Leipzig this very interesting and accomplished couple are highly esteemed. That is quite in the natural course of things, and they are very gracious, charming, vivacious, caring for not much else in the world than Their Family and Their Music.

They live very simply but very prettily in the Loehrstrasse, and they are always busy with their practising and their public work.

Emil Paur unites with an almost fiery zeal, clearness of aim; and with untiring physical perseverance an amazing freshness of spirit, which no duties, however fatiguing, seem to diminish. He has composed a violin sonata, a concerto, a string quartet, piano pieces and some songs. His style of conducting is very animated, but very graceful. He inspires his men. He gets more work out of them, I think, than anybody else would, because he understands the art of handling men. That is a great thing in a conductor, and has the reputation of keeping his people in a good humor. Paur speaks a little English, but very little. Now, of course, he will apply himself to learning it. He looks forward with pleasure to his American experience, for he is one of those men who like to widen their horizon. In September he will start with his wife and two sons for Boston to begin the concerts in October. I bespeak for Emil Paur your most courteous consideration, and from what we hear of you and your ways I am sure he will get it, winning from you also golden opinion.

LEIPZIG'S FAREWELL.

Her Most Eminent Critic's Tribute to the Favorite Conductor.

Bernhard Seuberlech, the well known musical critic of Leipzig, has inscribed the following lines of farewell upon the departure from that city of Emil Paur:

"Very great will be the loss sustained by our opera through the departure of Director Emil Paur, who leaves Leipzig to assume the directorship of the famous Symphony orchestra of Boston, America. Four years ago, when Herr Arthur Nikisch went to Boston and the 'land of dollars,' there was general sorrow and dismay at the loss of that distinguished director and musician. It really seemed as though it would be impossible to find a fully qualified substitute. Such an one was found, however, in Emil Paur, the director of the Mannheim orchestra, a highly gifted, extremely versatile and wonderfully energetic artist and leader. What this hero has planned and accomplished on the director's stand in the few years of his activity here can but inspire deep admiration.

LEIPZIG OPERA HOUSE (FRONT VIEW).

"His knowledge and ability, his unexampled energy and his far-reaching influence have assumed for the musical life of Leipzig an ever higher significance. The more rarely one meets now-a-days among artists such men of action and inspiring initiative, the deeper such powers must be appreciated. Only the most perfect idealism, only the loftiest enthusiasm for the great and noble in art can engender such impellent force for the ennobling of art, and such divine fire in the heart, together with tireless zeal, demand irresistibly the guerdon of true artistic fame.

"The opera of Leipzig possessed in Emil Paur the most assiduous of all directors. No labor and no obstacle was sufficient to deter him from the most difficult undertakings, which he always accomplished in an unerringly efficient manner. The members of the orchestra have been inspired by his example, carried away by his enthusiasm, spurred on by his perseverance, and in the same manner the singers have been led to the exertion of every power by the constant incitement of his vigorous intellect. The indifferent old ways have never been allowed to resume their sway. Emil Paur has forced them aside and insisted upon the most careful execution of the greater operatic works. Power might fail and courage sink during the preparations for such works as the 'Nibelung Ring' and 'Tristan and Isolde,' but ever at his post, full of force and courage, with incomparable energy and ambition, has been the leader of the battle, the never tiring Emil Paur. He would not have been able to excuse himself had any detail been neglected, and his lofty aims were always realized. Let one set at naught or violate the sanctity of the great masters by shortening or otherwise mutilating their noble works, and our Director Paur was at once in the field, spurred by his sense of duty to restore them to their proper form. In this great scrupulousness he honored himself. Brilliant success has been his reward.

LEIPZIG OPERA HOUSE (REAR VIEW).

In the concert hall, as in opera, Herr Paur has met with extraordinary success. Whoever was able a short time ago to watch the manner in which he brought into execution a long and intensely difficult symphony by A. Bruckner must have rendered him the high honor he deserves. Such triumphs have been his in many important concerts, as, for instance, those of the Gewandhaus. In the Liszt association especially has he been an important factor and an indispensable leader.

Works of Bruckner, Liszt, Berlioz and others have been brilliantly performed under his genial guidance, and beyond all this he has made for himself an enviable reputation as a pianist in his model recitals. In this field of labor his wife, who is one of the most talented of pianists, has been a most congenial co-operator. In the Gewandhaus concerts he has distinguished himself as an interpreter of Beethoven (as in the E major concert) and other masters, especially Brahms, showing in all the works undertaken a quick and full comprehension and much ingenuity of expression.

Several new selections of chamber music, notably, the beautiful clarinet-quintet, by Brahms, were first made known to a small musical circle in the home of Director Paur. Often has this artist appeared in charity concerts as director, pianist and violin virtuoso, winning by his noble zeal and disinterested efforts the sympathy of all. We have known but few, aside from the great masters, who, having achieved success as directors, could also be finished artists and play with so much soul as Herr Paur. Such an eminent variety of artistic gifts is reserved only for certain chosen ones.

"And now we must lose this man! That he should have accepted the brilliant position in Boston is most natural, for as the father of a family he must extend his hand and grasp that of fortune. Our heartiest wishes for a future rich in fame accompany him on his voyage across the ocean, and our kindest remembrances are forever assured to him in Leipzig. Let us hope that we shall succeed in filling the great chasm he leaves here with another as greatly talented director."

Emil Paur, of whom you Bostonians have deprived us, was born at Czernowitz, Austro-Bukowina on Aug. 29, 1855, and will thus have completed his thirty-eighth year by the time he reaches you. His father, Franz P. Paur, is music-director at Czernowitz. In addition to his exceptional merits as a conductor he is an admirable violinist and pianist (his wife also excels in the latter capacity) and he is the composer of a string quartette, a violin concerto, and sonatas for piano-forte and for pianoforte and violin. He was first a pupil of his father, subsequently of Otto Felix Dessoff and Josef Helmesberder, professors at the Vienna Conservatory. Among his fellow-students were Felix Mottl and Arthur Nikisch. For some time he conducted, first the Königsberg Opera, next that at Mannheim until he replaced Nikisch at Leipzig, where, in addition to being first conductor at the Opera, he held the directorship of the Liszt Society. His wife (formerly Burger, and born in the Black Forest) was a pupil of Theodor Leschetitzky. Paur appeared as a violinist in public in his eighth year. As you will see, he is a man of agreeable presence. In personal intercourse and in private life he is highly esteemed. At the present moment he is bracing his nerves in the Tyrol prior to facing the New England folk. What I do not write here of my own knowledge I have gathered from personal friends, of whom he has many. Great are the regrets expressed at his departure. It is openly stated that your authorities paid $2500 in order to release him from his contract here. If this is a fact, you will have obtained good value for the money. It is rumored that Franz Krauzner of the City Theater, in Bremen, will succeed him.

CYNICISMS.

The new conductor of the Symphony Concerts is an interesting mystery; just now, to the fair ones who glorify the Symphony rehearsals by their presence. They debate him industriously; and he is made to wile away many a long and wearisome summer hour. I heard the following conversation anent him, on a street car, last week: "I wonder if this Herr Paur is like his pictures in the papers." "It isn't Paw, dear; but Power. That's the way he's pronounced." "Of course. I might have known better. Isn't it nice that he's so young. Only a little over-thirty. I wonder if his hands are as small and as white as Nikisch's." "I see he brushes his hair back from his forehead, instead of having it come down like a bang, as Nikisch did. I liked Nikisch, though; only his complexion was so pale, and his legs so short." "I didn't admire his legs, but I must say that I thought the pallor of his face was very artistic and poetic." "It always struck me that it made him look sick and feeble." "Oh no, dear, it was the poetic pallor. Paderewski had it also, and so did that delightful Marteau. I hate to see a healthy-looking artist. He isn't interesting, and when I see one with color in his face and much flesh on his bones, I can't help thinking of the eating and drinking he must have done to bring him to that condition; and you will admit that eating and drinking are not artistic." "I suppose you are right; and, when I come to think of it, Lichtenberg, Kneisel, Loefler, and Adamowski are all pale and thin, and look fascinatingly sickly. Yes, dear, you are right." "Kneisel is pale, dear, but he's not thin. He is not half as slender as he was, around the waist. I wonder if Paur is pale. I hear he is married and has two children. His wife plays the piano. I'm so glad she doesn't sing. I suppose that he will give us lots of Wagner, and Brahms, and dear old Bach." "Of course, he will, and of Beethoven, too. I hope that he'll interpret Beethoven in the new, modern style, if only to vex the critics. They were real to mean to Nikisch. I'm sure I can't see why a conductor shouldn't read a composer according to his own ideas. Who wants the same things over and over again?" "To tell you the truth, my dear, I don't know when it is read in the old way or the new, and I don't care. I know what I like, and when I am pleased, and that is enough for me. Oh, do you know dear, that Herr Paur is a blonde. He is the first blonde conductor that we have had. Isn't that lovely! And his portraits look just like Lohengrin. Won't it be delightful to hear the Prelude from "Lohengrin" led by a blonde? So realistic. But I must get off here, dear. Come, and see me soon." This is not the only interesting conversation I have heard about the new conductor, but it contains the essence of the other comments that have come to my ears. I trust that Mr. Paur may begin right. Unless he has been warned in advance, he has a difficult task before him, in steering his way properly at the outset among the various social ecoteries, Bohemian and otherwise, that are ready to capture him as early as possible after his arrival, and to become his guide, philosopher and friend. Much depends on his willingness or unwillingness to be "taken up" by certain people. This, of course, only in respect to his social success, providing he has social aspirations. Professionally, his success rests wholly with the public, and there can be little doubt of that. None of the Symphony conductors has failed to become a favorite with his audience. It is true, also, that none of them has failed of social success, though there have been rumors of heartburnings in social circles anent the preferences the conductor has shown for this or that particular circle. Perhaps Mr. Paur is a domestic man, with aspirations to pass his leisure hours with his family, or else to accept no hospitality or social patronage that is not also extended to Frau Paur, in which case—well, we shall see. In the meanwhile we may confidently expect from foreign correspondents, an early flood of particulars regarding the new conductor, and extending from his early infancy to the present day. The romantic will not be absent from it, and it will be none the less readable if it should not be wholly true.

CHATTERER.

A CONDUCTOR FOUND AT LAST.

Emil Paur of the Opera House at Leipzig to Assume Charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—His Musical Career—What a Critic Says of Him.

A despatch from Leipzig, which has just been received by Colonel Henry L. Higginson, contains the welcome news that a conductor has at last been found for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The satisfaction with which this announcement is sure to be hailed by the musical public of this city will be intensified when it is understood that the new conductor is the successor of Mr. Arthur Nikisch in the conduct of the opera house at Leipzig and a man whose unusual abilities, both as a musical director and composer, have already gained him hearty commendation from the severest of the musical critics of that music-loving city. His name is Emil Paur, and he is about thirty-eight years of age. Colonel Higginson had him in mind ten years ago, when he was in Vienna.

Born at Czernowitz in Bukowina, a province of the Austrian empire, Paur showed himself as a boy to be so highly gifted that his father, himself a fine musician and the director of the Musikverein of Czernowitz, sent his son to the Conservatory of Music in Vienna when he was about fourteen years of age. He remained there for about six years, studying composition under Dessoff and the violin under Hellmesberger. Among his fellow-students were Arthur Nikisch, Felix Mottl and Eugene Grünberg. From the first he was an exceedingly brilliant student, and although his unusual capacity enabled him to accomplish his tasks easily and quickly, he proved himself also capable of close application and steady effort. Most of his compositions at this period were pieces for string quartettes, and it is related of him that some times, just before a vacation, his father would suggest that if he composed something good his effort would be remembered in a way that would enable him to spend his vacation much more pleasantly than he otherwise might; whereupon he would set to work and compose a string quartette. He graduated from the conservatory with high honors, receiving the large medal for his superior work, and immediately secured the chair of first violin in the orchestra of the Vienna Opera House. At this time he composed a number of concertos for violins.

After a few years spent in this way, he obtained the position of conductor in the court opera house at Cassel, and not long afterward he became conductor of the large opera house in Königsberg, the leading city of East Prussia. A little later on he went to Mannheim, one of the best known of the musical centres of Germany, and there his services as conductor were appreciated so deeply that it was hoped he would never leave the position. Mr. Stagemann, however, the director of the opera house at Leipzig, brought his influence to bear strongly upon Mr. Paur and succeeded in inducing him to accept the position of conductor at Leipzig as successor to Mr. Nikisch. Besides conducting the orchestra in that city, he has appeared as a violinist and piano virtuoso, as well as in chamber music. From the outset he made an excellent impression, not only upon the general public but upon the most exacting critics, and he was at once accorded a most favorable reception.

Paur's capacity as a conductor was lately shown in fine lights in a performance of Bruchner's seventh symphony by the Liszt-Verein, the work which appalled so many critics by its enormous length—one hour and ten minutes. The interpretation is described as something wonderful, considering his material—the orchestra of the 134th Regiment, which at best can only be ranked as second class. In this work, as well as in the closing number, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," the precision of attack and accuracy in obedience to the conductor's interpretation showed the best drilling of all the orchestra concerts heard in Leipzig this season. These are the opinions of August Glasbacher, correspondent of the New York Musical Courier, who says that if Paur obtains leave to come to Boston we are to be most heartily congratulated. He adds—were always realized. Let one set at naught or violate the sanctity of the great masters by shortening or otherwise mutilating their noble works, and our Director Paur was at once in the field, spurred by his sense of duty to restore them to their proper form. In this great scrupulousness he honored himself. Brilliant success has been his reward.

With Paur at the helm the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in the hands of one of the most thorough and conscientious conductors of

"In the concert hall, as in opera, Herr Paur has met with extraordinary success. Whoever was able a short time ago to watch the manner in which he brought into execution a long and intensely difficult symphony by A. Bruckner must have rendered him the high honor he deserves. Such triumphs have been his in many important concerts, as, for instance, those of the Gewandhaus. In the Liszt association especially has he been an important factor and an indispensable leader.

"Works of Bruckner, Liszt, Berlioz and others have been brilliantly performed under his genial guidance, and beyond all this he has made for himself an enviable reputation as a pianist in his model recitals. In this field of labor his wife, who is one of the most talented of pianists, has been a most congenial co-operator. In the Gewandhaus concerts he has distinguished himself as an interpreter of Beethoven (as in the E major concert) and other masters, especially Brahms, showing in all the works undertaken a quick and full comprehension and much ingenuity of expression.

"Several new selections of chamber music, notably, the beautiful clarinet-quintet, by Brahms, were first made known to a small musical circle in the home of Director Paur. Often has this artist appeared in charity concerts as director, pianist and violin virtuoso, winning by his noble zeal and disinterested efforts the sympathy of all. We have known but few, aside from the great masters, who, having achieved success as directors, could also be finished artists and play with so much soul as Herr Paur. Such an eminent variety of artistic gifts is reserved only for certain chosen ones.

"And now we must lose this man! That he should have accepted the brilliant position in Boston is most natural, for as the father of a family he must extend his hand and grasp that of fortune. Our heartiest wishes for a future rich in fame accompany him on his voyage across the ocean, and our kindest remembrances are forever assured to him in Leipzig. Let us hope that we shall succeed in filling the great chasm he leaves here with another as greatly talented director."

Emil Paur, of whom you Bostonians have deprived us, was born at Czernowitz, Austro-Bukowina on Aug. 29, 1855, and will thus have completed his thirty-eighth year by the time he reaches you. His father, Franz P. Paur, is music-director at Czernowitz. In addition to his exceptional merits as a conductor he is an admirable violinist and pianist (his wife also excels in the latter capacity) and he is the composer of a string quartette, a violin concerto, and sonatas for piano-forte and for pianoforte and violin. He was first a pupil of his father, subsequently of Otto Felix Dessoff and Josef Helmesberger, professors at the Vienna Conservatory. Among his fellow-students were Felix Mottl and Arthur Nikisch. For some time he conducted, first the Königsberg Opera, next that at Mannheim until he replaced Nikisch at Leipzig, where, in addition to being first conductor at the Opera, he held the directorship of the Liszt Society. His wife (formerly Burger, and born in the Black Forest) was a pupil of Theodor Leschetitzky. Paur appeared as a violinist in public in his eighth year. As you will see, he is a man of agreeable presence. In personal intercourse and in private life he is highly esteemed. At the present moment he is bracing his nerves in the Tyrol prior to facing the New England folk. What I do not write here of my own knowledge I have gathered from personal friends, of whom he has many. Great are the regrets expressed at his departure. It is openly stated that your authorities paid $2500 in order to release him from his contract here. If this is a fact, you will have obtained good value for the money. It is rumored that Franz Krauzner of the City Theater, in Bremen, will succeed him.

CYNICISMS.

The new conductor of the Symphony Concerts is an interesting mystery; just now, to the fair ones who glorify the Symphony rehearsals by their presence. They debate him industriously; and he is made to wile away many a long and wearisome summer hour. I heard the following conversation ament him, on a street car, last week: "I wonder if this Herr Paur is like his pictures in the papers?" "It isn't Paw, dear; but Power. That's the way he's pronounced." "Of course. I might have known better. Isn't it nice that he's so young. Only a little over-thirty. I wonder if his hands are as small and as white as Nikisch's." "I see he brushes his hair back from his forehead, instead of having it come down like a bang, as Nikisch did. I liked Nikisch, though; only his complexion was so pale, and his legs so short." "I didn't admire his legs, but I must say that I thought the pallor of his face was very artistic and poetic." "It always struck me that it made him look sick and feeble." "Oh no, dear, it was the poetic pallor. Puderewski had it also, and so did that delightful Marteau. I hate to see a healthy-looking artist. He isn't interesting, and when I see one with color in his face and much flesh on his bones, I can't help thinking of the eating and drinking he must have done to bring him to that condition; and you will admit that eating and drinking are not artistic." "I suppose you are right; and, when I come to think of it, Lichtenberg, Kneisel, Loefler, and Adamowski are all pale and thin, and look fascinatingly sickly. Yes, dear, you are right." "Kneisel is pale, dear, but he's not thin. He is not half as slender as he was, around the waist. I wonder if Paur is pale. I hear he is married and has two children. His wife plays the piano. I'm so glad she doesn't sing. I suppose that he will give us lots of Wagner, and Brahms, and dear old Bach." "Of course, he will, and of Beethoven, too. I hope that he'll interpret Beethoven in the new, modern style, if only to vex the critics. They were real to mean to Nikisch. I'm sure I can't see why a conductor shouldn't read a composer according to his own ideas. Who wants the same things over and over again?" "To tell you the truth, my dear, I don't know when it is read in the old way or the new, and I don't care. I know what I like, and when I am pleased, and that is enough for me. Oh, do you know dear, that Herr Paur is a blonde. He is the first blonde conductor that we have had. Isn't that lovely! And his portraits look just like Lohengrin. Won't it be delightful to hear the Prelude from "Lohengrin" led by a blonde? So realistic. But I must get off here, dear. Come, and see me soon." This is not the only interesting conversation I have heard about the new conductor, but it contains the essence of the other comments that have come to my ears. I trust that Mr. Paur may begin right. Unless he has been warned in advance, he has a difficult task before him, in steering his way properly at the outset among the various social coteries, Bohemian and otherwise, that are ready to capture him as early as possible after his arrival, and to become his guide, philosopher and friend. Much depends on his willingness or unwillingness to be "taken up" by certain people. This, of course, only in respect to his social success, providing he has social aspirations. Professionally, his success rests wholly with the public, and there can be little doubt of that. None of the Symphony conductors has failed to become a favorite with his audience. It is true, also, that none of them has failed of social success, though there have been rumors of heartburnings in social circles ament the preferences the conductor has shown for this or that particular circle. Perhaps Mr. Paur is a domestic man, with aspirations to pass his leisure hours with his family, or else to accept no hospitality or social patronage that is not also extended to Frau Paur, in which case—well, we shall see. In the meanwhile we may confidently expect from foreign correspondents, an early flood of particulars regarding the new conductor, and extending from his early infancy to the present day. The romantic will not be absent from it, and it will be none the less readable if it should not be wholly true.

CHATTERER.

A CONDUCTOR FOUND AT LAST.

Emil Paur of the Opera House at Leipzig to Assume Charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—His Musical Career—What a Critic Says of Him.

A despatch from Leipzig, which has just been received by Colonel Henry L. Higginson, contains the welcome news that a conductor has at last been found for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The satisfaction with which this announcement is sure to be hailed by the musical public of this city will be intensified when it is understood that the new conductor is the successor of Mr. Arthur Nikisch in the conduct of the opera house at Leipzig and a man whose unusual abilities, both as a musical director and composer, have already gained him hearty commendation from the severest of the musical critics of that music-loving city. His name is Emil Paur, and he is about thirty-eight years of age. Colonel Higginson had him in mind ten years ago, when he was in Vienna.

Born at Czernowitz in Bukowina, a province of the Austrian empire, Paur showed himself as a boy to be so highly gifted that his father, himself a fine musician and the director of the Musikverein of Czernowitz, sent his son to the Conservatory of Music in Vienna when he was about fourteen years of age. He remained there for about six years, studying composition under Dessoff and the violin under Hellmesberger. Among his fellow-students were Arthur Nikisch, Felix Motte and Eugene Grünberg. From the first he was an exceedingly brilliant student, and although his unusual capacity enabled him to accomplish his tasks easily and quickly, he proved himself also capable of close application and steady effort. Most of his compositions at this period were pieces for string quartettes, and it is related of him that some times, just before a vacation, his father would suggest that if he composed something good his effort would be remembered in a way that would enable him to spend his vacation much more pleasantly than he otherwise might; whereupon he would set to work and compose a string quartette. He graduated from the conservatory with high honors, receiving the large medal for his superior work, and immediately secured the chair of first violin in the orchestra of the Vienna Opera House. At this time he composed a number of concertos for violins.

After a few years spent in this way, he obtained the position of conductor in the court opera house at Cassel, and not long afterward he became conductor of the large opera house in Königsberg, the leading city of East Prussia. A little later on he went to Mannheim, one of the best known of the musical centres of Germany, and there his services as conductor were appreciated so deeply that it was hoped he would never leave the position. Mr. Stagemann, however, the director of the opera house at Leipzig, brought his influence to bear strongly upon Mr. Paur and succeeded in inducing him to accept the position of conductor at Leipzig as successor to Mr. Nikisch. Besides conducting the orchestra in that city, he has appeared as a violinist and piano virtuoso, as well as in chamber music. From the outset he made an excellent impression, not only upon the general public but upon the most exacting critics, and he was at once accorded a most favorable reception.

Paur's capacity as a conductor was lately shown in fine lights in a performance of Bruchner's seventh symphony by the Liszt-Verein, the work which appalled so many critics by its enormous length—one hour and ten minutes. The interpretation is described as something wonderful, considering his material—the orchestra of the 134th Regiment, which at best can only be ranked as second class. In this work, as well as in the closing number, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," the precision of attack and accuracy in obedience to the conductor's interpretation showed the best drilling of all the orchestra concerts heard in Leipzig this season. These are the opinions of August Güssbacher, correspondent of the New York Musical Courier, who says that if Paur obtains leave to come to Boston we are to be most heartily congratulated. He adds—

With Paur at the helm the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in the hands of one of the most thorough and conscientious conductors of the present time. Paur's talents are especially for concert conducting, his disposition being a little too nervous for the opera, while his thoroughness, magnetism and generalship qualify him particularly for concerts. Of the numerous orchestra concerts here during the past season the two conducted by Paur for the Liszt-Verein and his part in the benefit concert at the Gewandhaus were incomparably superior gems.

While at Mannheim Paur married, and he now has two sturdy-looking little sons. His wife, who has a keenly intelligent and expressive face, is an unusually fine piano player, but is prouder of her reputation as a good housewife than of her artistic success. Paur himself is a broad shouldered, thick-set man of medium height, with regular features and light hair and beard. His character is a sterling one; he is earnest and energetic, and at the same time kind-hearted and tolerant. While firm, strict and even exacting as a conductor, he is invariably agreeable and courteous in personal intercourse.

Now and then Mr. Paur has delighted his Leipzig audiences by having one of his own compositions played, but he has done this only on rare occasions; and his modest disposition inclines him rather to keep back his work than to push it to the front. Unlike Mahler, Wagner, Strauss and Mottl, who have a bent toward the composition of opera, Paur has a strong leaning toward concert music.

MR. EMIL PAUR, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, is said to be a trustworthy and excellent musician, but hardly a genius. There is comfort in that thought. Of all the varieties of the human "genius" that which assumes an artistic habit is the most exasperating and, specifically, the musical genius is the most unendurable. The competition between the man of talent and the man of genius is a parallel of the race between the tortoise and the hare, and we all know how that contest ended. Your genius is not without his value. He wakes up people, whether they follow him or not; he has the boldness of his convictions and though he may shock us by his defiance of conventionalities he often serves to show that certain forms have lost their significance, while he illustrates the axiom that there is room in the world for everybody who is decent. The exasperation which the genius often engenders is due to his want of orthodoxy. He shouts for freedom of thought and action, but makes faces at those who think and act otherwise than he lays down for the correct thing. He demands consideration for the new thought, the new form, and has nothing but contempt for all that has gone before. This is not the sort of man to aid in the development of art in this country. Our large assortment of parentage has made us the most cosmopolitan people in the world and we will no more be satisfied with one phase of an art, whether the limner's, the sculptor's or the musician's, than we will consent to an unchanged bill of fare for a month's breakfasts, though the ingredients be never so nicely cooked and dextrously served. We can be easily persuaded to listen to anything, but prohibition of what we want or dictation of what we ought to want will alike breed rebellion. The man of talent holds his ground, for he knows how to be elastic and tactful; the man of genius mars all by his stiffness and impolitic methods.

Within a period of about five years of the time when Emil Paur, who has just been secured as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, graduated from the Conservatory of Music at Vienna, a number of brilliant musicians and singers were produced by that institution. Among them were Felix Mottl, Hugo Reinhold, the composer; Arthur Nikisch, Gustaf Mahler, Mrs. Schuch-Proska, the singer; Rudolf Kryzanofsky, a conductor in Prague; Bertha Hafft, a violin player; Arnold Rosé, concert master in the Vienna Concert House, and one of the foremost violin players of the day, Mrs. Adele Gerster, Josef Staudigl, the baritone; Josef Bayer, a composer of duets; Adolf Brodsky, the violin player and concert master for Mr. Walter Damrosch; Josef Hellmesberger, a composer, son of the director; Wilhelm Junck, a leading musical artist in Detroit; Vladimir Pachmann, Julius Winkler of the Winkler Quartette in Vienna, and Mrs. Stahmer-Andriesen, who is well known abroad as a singer in Wagner's operas at Bayreuth and elsewhere. To these names should be added that of Franz Kniesel, who graduated more recently.

Compliments for the New Conductor.

[New York Musical Courier, Aug. 2.]

The German papers contain many expressions of regret at the departure of Emil Paur from the Fatherland, and countless good wishes for his future. Martin Krause, in the Neueste Nachrichten of Leipzig, writes—

In losing Emil Paur we lose an executive artist of extraordinary many-sidedness, a director of eminent endowments, a musician of the most thorough education, and a man full of energy, strength of character, and firm faith in the ideal in our great art. Utterly unacquainted with the reasons which have suddenly determined his departure from a sphere of activity to which he belonged with all his soul and heart, we lament that he has not had the opportunity to take a public farewell. When, six years ago, he came to take his Leipzig position, after filling most successfully the like place at Mannheim, his path was often enough strewn with thorns. But he held on his way unswerving, let the pack yelp, and achieved great things that will be long remembered in our operatic annals. How our orchestra esteemed him, how highly it valued him as musician and as man, there are thousands of testimonies. What distinguishes him as a director? The piercing keenness of his perceptions, his direct sentiment, the fire of his generous spirit. He held in honor every work of genius. The masters of the past as well as of the present found in him the warmest admirer, certain to secure the best execution for their works. Not only the theatre, but the concert hall bears witness to his masterly direction. Need we mention how among other things he conducted Wagner's "Faust" overture as no one but Von Bülow had done before in Leipzig? Need we point to the performances of the Liszt Society, and his interpretations of Berlioz, Liszt and Bruckner? How admirable were his performances as a pianist! Who appeared with greater success at the Gewandhaus? Who could play the E-flat major concerto of Beethoven, or the B-flat major of Brahms with more virtuosity and artistic ripeness? Of chamber music he was a zealous supporter, and with his wife, a talented pianist, delighted his audiences with their duet playing. Seldom have so many gifts been united in one person. He plays the violin excellently, and performed in public, when a soloist was suddenly indisposed, Mendelssohn's concerto, with universal applause. He prepared all novelties with the greatest care, and directed with inspiration whatever gave dignity and lasting importance to the repertory.

The Leipziger Tageblatt says:

Mr. Paur's departure leaves a large gap in our musical world, and although his many-sided gifts were scarcely exhibited here as he and his friends could have wished, we shall miss him sadly as a director. We owe much to him as an opera director; he was a model director of "Fidelio," of Mozart's operas, of the great Wagner works, a zealous promoter of new works, a kind adviser of unknown composers, but his most brilliant triumphs were in the concert hall. In rehearsal he was equal to the best. In management of the orchestra he was admirable, and in his musical versatility in general. It is less known that he is an excellent pianist, and he scarcely exhibited his capacity on the violin. I once had an opportunity of seeing him read from the manuscript a very difficult quartet, and can say it was a brilliant musical performance. The Liszt Society will especially hold him in grateful recollection. The best wishes of all follow him in his new career.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The musical Season is upon us. Singers, players of instruments and inventors and borrowers of tunes will soon be busy, and there will soon again be discussion in public places and at home concerning proper tempi, dynamic gradations, temperament, stage presence and all the other phrases found in the terminology of modern musical entertainment.

Whether the concert season will be affected seriously by what is known popularly as financial stagnation remains to be seen. That the premiums at the auction sales of the Symphony concert tickets were not as uniformly high as on previous occasions is not to be wondered at. Speculators who bought heavily last year found their investment not worth the candle, and this year their voices did not rise and fall.

Mr. Paur has already been interviewed, and, like unto a wise man, he said little. When Mr. Paur announces the fact that the soloists at the concerts must be "capable" and "classical," as he "does not believe in putting before the public small stuff," the people say "Amen." Some years ago an appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra was regarded as a privilege, as an honor; and the fact that a singer or player was allowed to appear, was in itself a warrant of the soloist's worth. But Mr. Nikisch allowed himself to be swayed by personal emotion rather than by critical judgment, and Music Hall saw strange sights under his imperial sway, so that the hall might often have been called the Boston Musical Museum.

Some may tremble at the thought that Mrs. Paur plays the piano; for we were afflicted lately and sore distressed by Nikischian marital musical indiscretions.

But Mrs. Paur was known as an excellent pianist, and she was regarded as a musician of talent before her marriage with Mr. Paur.

Mrs. Nikisch, on the other hand, was a soprano in the theatre, and she was never educated for the operatic or concert stage.

Mrs. Paur studied the piano under Mrs. Eastpoff and Leschetitzki.

Mrs. Nikisch was trained for the American market by Mr. Nikisch.

And yet, if certain moralists may be believed, a just man should rejoice when his wife sings with only moderate success or even badly.

Let us quote from the Rev. Arthur Bedford, Chaplain to His Grace Wrothessly, Duke of Bedford, in 1711. "And Salust speaking of Sempronius, as the Tool of Cautine, to foment the Rebellion, adds this among her other Qualifications, that she was taught to sing more finely than became a Virtuous Woman, with many other things, which he also calls The investments of Luxury."

But Mrs. Nikisch was hulled in New York as the great "exhibitionist" of German vocal and lyric art. Well, "I guess she was."

Mr. Paur is a versatile musician, and it is not unlikely that he will be heard here as a soloist; but I can never suppose him a guest in a private house and playing a piano piece for $35. It is said that one of his predecessors thus lowered the dignity of the position of leader of the Symphony Orchestra. And indeed $35 was a paltry sum; if the man had sent his bill for $350, the itching palm would have assumed grand proportions and commanded a certain respect.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Inquiries continue to be made daily at Music Hall concerning the ticket sales for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts of the coming season, and ample evidence is given that the Boston orchestra is held to be an institution commanding the staunchest support from all resident music lovers.

It is questionable if there was ever a more practical test of the estimation of an organization by a public than that proven to exist hereabout for this orchestra, by the subscription to the stock of the corporation which is to provide it with a new home in readiness.

The raising of nearly $500,000, in sums of from $100 to $25,000, showed that all classes are alike alive to the value of the Symphony orchestra in the musical life of Boston, and so there is no need to question the future support of its concerts.

It is announced by Manager Ellis that the 13th season of the orchestra, with Mr. Emil Paur as conductor, will consist of 24 concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10 and March 31, 1894, and 24 public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall on Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Negotiations concluded and pending indicate that the orchestral features of the season will be supplemented by the appearance of many notable soloists aside from those included in the organization, and prominent on the list of singers engaged are Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mme. Emma Eames, both of whom have an early appearance.

It is now definitely announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will henceforward give its concerts at Carnegie Hall, and I await with some curiosity the outcome of the change of scene. It is an open secret that during the last three years the proprietors of Chickering Hall furnished the hall free of charge, and bought for each concert two hundred dollars' worth of tickets, to be distributed among professional friends, who never dreamed of paying for their seats. Hence it follows that, during the current season, the five concerts of the series will cost about $2,250 more than did the recent performances. Some loss is also sustained by the rejection by the Carnegie Hall people of the official programme of the B. S. O., the advertisements of which brought in a round sum. The most disquieting feature of the situation, however, is the difference between Chickering Hall and Carnegie Hall in respect to size. When the former was most densely crowded only 1,200 seats were occupied; now 3,000 chairs must be filled. As Mr. Paur's name is not one to conjure with, and as the business outlook of the season is not very bright, I hardly think the audiences will grow from 1,200 to 3,000 spectators, and the manager is likely to find himself in the disagreeable predicament of creating a deadhead public by a liberal distribution of "paper," or of permitting the faithful to be chilled by the aspect of a large area of empty benches. Mr. Nikisch, now installed at Buda-Pesth, discloses a lively interest in the future of the B. S. O. His estimate of Mr. Higginson, imparted to most of his intimates, should be given to the Boston public, and not kept for the exclusive edification of Germany.

What Some Musicians Earn.—Franz Kneisel, who is one of the greatest concert-meisters, or leaders of violins, in the world has had years of experience, which is the first consideration. He is not alone a great solo performer, but is a great leader and orchestra player as well. What Mr. Kneisel earns in one year would have kept poor, deaf old Beethoven in luxury for his life. Aside from the actual concert-meister, the orchestra must be equipped with at least two equally as great soloists. The men who play these in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are said to earn $7,000 per annum. The others come next in order, and their earnings range from $6,000 to $3,500 per year. After the first violin comes the first 'cello, who is also a great soloist. His earnings net him $10,000 a year. The five other 'cellists in this orchestra are also first-class, and their earnings range from $4,000 to $2,000 per annum. The leader of the second violins gets as much as the third solo player, and his place is just as important. The other second violins earn from $40 to $60 per week. The players of the difficult instruments are even rarer and harder to get than the strings, and are also well paid. First in line comes the oboe, then the bassoon, the flute and the clarinet. The leaders of these instruments earn from $2,000 to $3,000 per year.

CONDUCTOR PAUR.

Boston Finds a Leader for the Symphony.

HE COMES FROM LEIPSIK.

What Local Musicians Have to Say of His Capacity—His Friends Are Enthusiastic Over His Selection.

Boston has at last secured a new conductor for her Symphony Orchestra.

It is Mr. Emil Paur of Leipzig.

Mr. Paur succeeded Mr. Arthur Nikisch as conductor at the Opera House in Leipzig, and has had a very extensive musical training for so young a man.

He is only 37 years old, is a large, light-complexioned man, full of vitality and energy. Everyone who has heard that he has been engaged to take charge of Boston's crack musical organization is much pleased, for his reputation is not unknown on this side of the water.

(From a Picture Taken in 1870.)
EMIL PAUR.

Colonel Higginson took a fancy to him ten years ago in Vienna, and has had him in mind ever since.

The friends and acquaintances of Mr. Paur in Boston are most enthusiastic about him.

"Just the man for the position," said Mr. Schultz of the orchestra which delights hundreds every night at the "pop" concerts in Music Hall, to a Post reporter last evening.

"I know Mr. Paur. I played under him just before I came to this country. He fully understands his business and is one of the easiest conductors I ever played with. His energy is great and he keeps his men well in hand."

PLEASING PERSONALITY.

"Outside of business hours he is very pleasant and socially inclined. I have a great admiration for Mr. Paur."

Mr. Kuntz said: "I met Mr. Paur in Germany once in a railway coach and he played a selection from Beethoven for me. His execution is wonderful and he can play the piano as well as he can the violin. I never grew intimate with him, but know his reputation well."

"He has had excellent schooling, and this, with his remarkable genius, has made him his place in the foremost ranks of musicians."

Other musicians in the city also add their words of praise to this young man's capabilities. Those who have never met him, have heard so much of what he can do and of his power as a leader, that they feel as though they were acquainted.

One example of his capacity as a conductor was shown recently in a performance of Bruchner's seventh symphony by the Liszt-Verein, the work that is of such an enormous length, one hour and ten minutes. He only had the orchestra of the One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Regiment to deal with, yet the precision of attack and obedience to the conductor's interpretation showed the best drilling of any of the concerts heard in Leipzig this season.

August Gussbacher speaks highly of him in the New York Musical Courier, and says that he is one of the most conscientious conductors of the present time. His talents are just suited to concert orchestras, his temperament being a trifle too nervous for opera work.

A SKETCH OF THE MAN.

Emil Paur was born in Czernowitz, in Bukowina, Austria, and, as a boy, showed himself highly gifted. His father was a fine musician, and the director of the Musikverein of that town. Young Paur was sent to the Conservatory of Music at Vienna when he was 14 years old and stayed six years. Among his fellow students were Arthur Nikisch, Felix Motte and Eugene Grunberg.

From the first Mr. Paur was an exceedingly brilliant student. He mostly at this period composed pieces for string quartets. He graduated with high honors and received a medal for his work. Immediately afterward he secured the chair of first violin in the orchestra at the Vienna Opera House.

After a few years spent in this way he obtained the position of conductor in the Court Opera House at Cassel, and not long afterward he became conductor of the large opera house in Königsberg, the leading city of East Prussia. A little later on he went to Mannheim, one of the best known of the musical centres of Germany, and there his services as conductor were appreciated so deeply that it was hoped he would never leave the position.

prominent on the list of singers engaged are Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mme. Emma Eames, both of whom have an early appearance.

It is now definitely announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will henceforward give its concerts at Carnegie Hall, and I await with some curiosity the outcome of the change of scene. It is an open secret that during the last three years the proprietors of Chickering Hall furnished the hall free of charge, and bought for each concert two hundred dollars' worth of tickets, to be distributed among professional friends, who never dreamed of paying for their seats. Hence it follows that, during the current season, the five concerts of the series will cost about $2,250 more than did the recent performances. Some loss is also sustained by the rejection by the Carnegie Hall people of the official programme of the B. S. O., the advertisements of which brought in a round sum. The most disquieting feature of the situation, however, is the difference between Chickering Hall and Carnegie Hall in respect to size. When the former was most densely crowded only 1,200 seats were occupied; now 3,000 chairs must be filled. As Mr. Paur's name is not one to conjure with, and as the business outlook of the season is not very bright, I hardly think the audiences will grow from 1,200 to 3,000 spectators, and the manager is likely to find himself in the disagreeable predicament of creating a deadhead public by a liberal distribution of "paper," or of permitting the faithful to be chilled by the aspect of a large area of empty benches. Mr. Nikisch, now installed at Buda-Pesth, discloses a lively interest in the future of the B. S. O. His estimate of Mr. Higginson, imparted to most of his intimates, should be given to the Boston public, and not kept for the exclusive edification of Germany.

What Some Musicians Earn.—Franz Kneisel, who is one of the greatest concert-meisters, or leaders of violins, in the world has had years of experience, which is the first consideration. He is not alone a great solo performer, but is a great leader and orchestra player as well. What Mr. Kneisel earns in one year would have kept poor, deaf old Beethoven in luxury for his life. Aside from the actual concert-meister, the orchestra must be equipped with at least two equally as great soloists. The men who play these in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are said to earn $7,000 per annum. The others come next in order, and their earnings range from $6,000 to $3,500 per year. After the first violin comes the first 'cello, who is also a great soloist. His earnings net him $10,000 a year. The five other 'cellists in this orchestra are also first-class, and their earnings range from $4,000 to $2,000 per annum. The leader of the second violins gets as much as the third solo player, and his place is just as important. The other second violins earn from $40 to $60 per week. The players of the difficult instruments are even rarer and harder to get than the strings, and are also well paid. First in line comes the oboe, then the bassoon, the flute and the clarinet. The leaders of these instruments earn from $2,000 to $3,000 per year.

CONDUCTOR PAUR.

Boston Finds a Leader for the Symphony.

HE COMES FROM LEIPSIK.

What Local Musicians Have to Say
of His Capacity—His Friends
Are Enthusiastic Over
His Selection.

Boston has at last secured a new conductor for her Symphony Orchestra. It is Mr. Emil Paur of Leipzig.

Mr. Paur succeeded Mr. Arthur Nikisch as conductor at the Opera House in Leipzig, and has had a very extensive musical training for so young a man.

He is only 37 years old, is a large, light-complexioned man, full of vitality and energy. Everyone who has heard that he has been engaged to take charge of Boston's crack musical organization is much pleased, for his reputation is not unknown on this side of the water.

(From a Picture Taken in 1879.)
EMIL PAUR.

Colonel Higginson took a fancy to him ten years ago in Vienna, and has had him in mind ever since.

The friends and acquaintances of Mr. Paur in Boston are most enthusiastic about him.

"Just the man for the position," said Mr. Schultz of the orchestra which delights hundreds every night at the "pop" concerts in Music Hall, to a Post reporter last evening.

"I know Mr. Paur. I played under him just before I came to this country. He fully understands his business and is one of the easiest conductors I ever played with. His energy is great and he keeps his men well in hand.

PLEASING PERSONALITY.

"Outside of business hours he is very pleasant and socially inclined. I have a great admiration for Mr. Paur."

Mr. Kuntz said: "I met Mr. Paur in Germany once in a railway coach and he played a selection from Beethoven for me. His execution is wonderful and he can play the piano as well as he can the violin. I never grew intimate with him, but know his reputation well.

"He has had excellent schooling, and this, with his remarkable genius, has made him his place in the foremost ranks of musicians."

Other musicians in the city also add their words of praise to this young man's capabilities. Those who have never met him, have heard so much of what he can do and of his power as a leader, that they feel as though they were acquainted.

One example of his capacity as a conductor was shown recently in a performance of Bruchner's seventh symphony by the Liszt-Verein, the work that is of such an enormous length, one hour and ten minutes. He only had the orchestra of the One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Regiment to deal with, yet the precision of attack and obedience to the conductor's interpretation showed the best drilling of any of the concerts heard in Leipzig this season.

August Gussbacher speaks highly of him in the New York Musical Courier, and says that he is one of the most conscientious conductors of the present time. His talents are just suited to concert orchestras, his temperament being a trifle too nervous for opera work.

A SKETCH OF THE MAN.

Emil Paur was born in Czernowitz, in Bukowina, Austria, and, as a boy, showed himself highly gifted. His father was a fine musician, and the director of the Musikverein of that town. Young Paur was sent to the Conservatory of Music at Vienna when he was 14 years old and stayed six years. Among his fellow students were Arthur Nikisch, Felix Motte and Eugene Grunberg.

From the first Mr. Paur was an exceedingly brilliant student. He mostly at this period composed pieces for string quartets. He graduated with high honors and received a medal for his work. Immediately afterward he secured the chair of first violin in the orchestra at the Vienna Opera House.

After a few years spent in this way he obtained the position of conductor in the Court Opera House at Cassel, and not long afterward he became conductor of the large opera house in Konigsberg, the leading city of East Prussia. A little later on he went to Mannheim, one of the best known of the musical centres of Germany, and there his services as conductor were appreciated so deeply that it was hoped he would never leave the position.

prominent on the list of singers engaged are Mme. Lillian Nordica and Mme. Emma Eames, both of whom have an early appearance.

It is now definitely announced that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will henceforward give its concerts at Carnegie Hall, and I await with some curiosity the outcome of the change of scene. It is an open secret that during the last three years the proprietors of Chickering Hall furnished the hall free of charge, and bought for each concert two hundred dollars' worth of tickets, to be distributed among professional friends, who never dreamed of paying for their seats. Hence it follows that, during the current season, the five concerts of the series will cost about $2,250 more than did the recent performances. Some loss is also sustained by the rejection by the Carnegie Hall people of the official programme of the B. S. O., the advertisements of which brought in a round sum. The most disquieting feature of the situation, however, is the difference between Chickering Hall and Carnegie Hall in respect to size. When the former was most densely crowded only 1,200 seats were occupied; now 3,000 chairs must be filled. As Mr. Paur's name is not one to conjure with, and as the business outlook of the season is not very bright, I hardly think the audiences will grow from 1,200 to 3,000 spectators, and the manager is likely to find himself in the disagreeable predicament of creating a deadhead public by a liberal distribution of "paper," or of permitting the faithful to be chilled by the aspect of a large area of empty benches. Mr. Nikisch, now installed at Buda-Pesth, discloses a lively interest in the future of the B. S. O. His estimate of Mr. Higginson, imparted to most of his intimates, should be given to the Boston public, and not kept for the exclusive edification of Germany.

What Some Musicians Earn.—Franz Kneisel, who is one of the greatest concert-meisters, or leaders of violins, in the world has had years of experience, which is the first consideration. He is not alone a great solo performer, but is a great leader and orchestra player as well. What Mr. Kneisel earns in one year would have kept poor, deaf old Beethoven in luxury for his life. Aside from the actual concert-meister, the orchestra must be equipped with at least two equally as great soloists. The men who play these in the Boston Symphony Orchestra are said to earn $7,000 per annum. The others come next in order, and their earnings range from $6,000 to $3,500 per year. After the first violin comes the first 'cello, who is also a great soloist. His earnings net him $10,000 a year. The five other 'cellists in this orchestra are also first-class, and their earnings range from $4,000 to $2,000 per annum. The leader of the second violins gets as much as the third solo player, and his place is just as important. The other second violins earn from $40 to $60 per week. The players of the difficult instruments are even rarer and harder to get than the strings, and are also well paid. First in line comes the oboe, then the bassoon, the flute and the clarinet. The leaders of these instruments earn from $2,000 to $3,000 per year.

CONDUCTOR PAUR.

Boston Finds a Leader for the Symphony.

HE COMES FROM LEIPSIC.

What Local Musicians Have to Say
of His Capacity—His Friends
Are Enthusiastic Over
His Selection.

Boston has at last secured a new conductor for her Symphony Orchestra. It is Mr. Emil Paur of Leipsic.

Mr. Paur succeeded Mr. Arthur Nikisch as conductor at the Opera House in Leipsic, and has had a very extensive musical training for so young a man.

He is only 37 years old, is a large, light-complexioned man, full of vitality and energy. Everyone who has heard that he has been engaged to take charge of Boston's crack musical organization is much pleased, for his reputation is not unknown on this side of the water.

(From a Picture Taken in 1879.)
EMIL PAUR.

Colonel Higginson took a fancy to him ten years ago in Vienna, and has had him in mind ever since.

The friends and acquaintances of Mr. Paur in Boston are most enthusiastic about him.

"Just the man for the position," said Mr. Schultz of the orchestra which delights hundreds every night at the "pop" concerts in Music Hall, to a Post reporter last evening.

"I know Mr. Paur. I played under him just before I came to this country. He fully understands his business and is one of the easiest conductors I ever played with. His energy is great and he keeps his men well in hand."

PLEASING PERSONALITY.

"Outside of business hours he is very pleasant and socially inclined. I have a great admiration for Mr. Paur."

Mr. Kuntz said: "I met Mr. Paur in Germany once in a railway coach and he played a selection from Beethoven for me. His execution is wonderful and he can play the piano as well as he can the violin. I never grew intimate with him, but know his reputation well."

"He has had excellent schooling, and this, with his remarkable genius, has made him his place in the foremost ranks of musicians."

Other musicians in the city also add their words of praise to this young man's capabilities. Those who have never met him, have heard so much of what he can do and of his power as a leader, that they feel as though they were acquainted.

One example of his capacity as a conductor was shown recently in a performance of Bruchner's seventh symphony by the Liszt-Verein, the work that is of such an enormous length, one hour and ten minutes. He only had the orchestra of the One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Regiment to deal with, yet the precision of attack and obedience to the conductor's interpretation showed the best drilling of any of the concerts heard in Leipsic this season.

August Gussbacher speaks highly of him in the New York Musical Courier, and says that he is one of the most conscientious conductors of the present time. His talents are just suited to concert orchestras, his temperament being a trifle too nervous for opera work.

A SKETCH OF THE MAN.

Emil Paur was born in Czernowitz, in Bukowina, Austria, and, as a boy, showed himself highly gifted. His father was a fine musician, and the director of the Musikverein of that town. Young Paur was sent to the Conservatory of Music at Vienna when he was 14 years old and stayed six years. Among his fellow students were Arthur Nikisch, Felix Motte and Eugene Grunberg.

From the first Mr. Paur was an exceedingly brilliant student. He mostly at this period composed pieces for string quartets. He graduated with high honors and received a medal for his work. Immediately afterward he secured the chair of first violin in the orchestra at the Vienna Opera House.

After a few years spent in this way he obtained the position of conductor in the Court Opera House at Cassel, and not long afterward he became conductor of the large opera house in Konigsberg, the leading city of East Prussia. A little later on he went to Mannheim, one of the best known of the musical centres of Germany, and there his services as conductor were appreciated so deeply that it was hoped he would never leave the position.

Mr. Staegemann, the director of the Opera House in Leipzig, succeeded in getting him to accept the position of conductor in Leipzig after Nikisch left.

Mr. Paur studied the violin under Hellmesberger and composition with Dessoff. He played first violin in the court opera at Vienna under Richter and Herbeck.

Boston is to be congratulated, say the musicians, over this acquisition for next year, and they declare that the whole music-loving population of the city will say the same when they see his work.

FRIDAY, JULY 7, 1893

HERR EMIL PAUR THE MAN.

New Conductor Chosen for the Symphony Orchestra.

An Authoritative Announcement of the Engagement Made—His Acceptance Was Cabled Yesterday—Brief Record of His Professional Career—He Comes from Leipzig.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder and patron of the Boston Symphony orchestra, had the satisfaction of receiving a cable yesterday from Herr Emil Paur of Leipzig announcing his acceptance of the engagement offered him as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, his duties in that position to begin with the next season's concerts.

Although Herr Paur's name is unfamiliar in this country to the public at large, it is sufficient evidence of his ability to fill the duties of the position offered him to know that he was seriously considered for appointment by Mr. Higginson four years ago, and that since that time he is credited with a marked growth and development in his profession.

Mr. Paur is about 37 years old and has been trained in the best schools. He was born in Czernowitz, Austria, and received his education in Vienna. He studied violin with Hellmesberger and composition with Dessoff, and played first violin in the Court Opera, Vienna, under Richter and Herbeck.

He early developed extraordinary talent as a conductor in so marked a degree that without influential friends he was chosen, while still a very young man, for the fine position of court conductor in Cassel. His superior work at Cassel soon brought him a better offer from Koenigsberg, at the leading theatre of eastern Prussia.

His stay here was also short, as he was wanted for the more important position at the head of the court opera in Mannheim. His success with the critical public of this city was very great and he held the position for many years.

Director Staegemann of the Leipzig opera is a great admirer of Conductor Paur, and for many years had desired to secure his services for that city. He succeeded in engaging him when Mr. Arthur Nikisch left for America, and for four years he has been conducting the orchestra in that city, and has appeared as a violinist and piano virtu-

EMIL PAUR.

[From a photograph taken in 1890.]

oso, as well in chamber music. From the outset he made an excellent impression, not only upon the general public, but upon the most exacting critics, and he was at once accorded a most favorable reception.

A well informed German correspondent writes of Paur as follows: "With Paur at the helm the Boston Symphony orchestra will be in the hands of one of the most thorough and conscientious conductors of the present time. Paur's talents are especially for concert conducting, his disposition being a little too nervous for the opera, while his thoroughness, magnetism and generalship qualify him particularly for concerts. Of the numerous orchestra concerts here during the past season the two conducted by Paur for the Liszt-Verein and his part in the benefit concert at the Gewandhaus were incomparably superior gems."

Herr Paur married while at the Mannheim opera a very talented pianist, who, with two boys, make up his family. Herr Paur is a broad shouldered, thick-set man of medium height, with regular features and light hair and beard.

The men selected for the position by Mr. Higginson in the past have all been well chosen, and there is every reason to believe that under Mr. Paur's direction the orchestra will maintain its former high standard.

Mr. Paur Will Live in Jamaica Plain.

Emil Paur, the new Symphony leader, has leased, through the office of R. S. Barrows, the pleasantly-situated frame dwelling-house, numbered 32 Burroughs street, Jamaica Plain. This property includes a large garden and a beautiful lawn, covered with handsome shade trees.

MR. PAUR'S FIRST.

Journal

Oct 8/93

How He Led the Symphony at Rehearsal

The Journal Gives the First Description.

He Finds an Orchestra That Can Play "Piano."

On Wednesday last Mr. Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was first presented privately to that famous organization as a body, and for the first time guided it through the musical maze with his eloquent baton.

A private rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra is only one degree less secret than a meeting of a Masonic Lodge. You cannot get into the hall for love or money. All the avenues of ingress are closed save one, and this is closely guarded by two argus-eyed representatives of Mr. Higginson. Even Mr. Ellis, the manager of the hall, is debarred. So it was on Wednesday. From above floated in indistinct harmonies the music of the orchestra, but the strongest vision is incapable of piercing several flights of stairs and a thick door, as Mr. Sam Weller discovered long ago.

"A Chief Among Ye Taking Notes."

But it is possible for the Journal to get into the corridors, and, witnessing the rehearsal, become the first newspaper to tell its readers of Herr Paur's initial work with his famous orchestra.

He has already won golden opinions of the men who are to be his associates and are to follow his bidding at the concerts for the next three years, and, as far as can be learned, the comparisons between him and Mr. Nikisch are all in favor of the new arrival.

"The Observed of All Observers."

By twos and threes the musicians came to Music Hall on Wednesday morning, nearly all possessed with a tremendous curiosity to ascertain by personal observation what manner of man the new conductor might be. To the greater number he was a total stranger, for, while he is known to a few of the men, who have met him abroad, he is too young and began his career as leader at a time subsequent to that during which the veterans of the orchestra were in Germany.

The 30 odd musicians ranged themselves along the wooden amphitheatrical structure, which was in place on the stage, all in their accustomed positions. There were only three absentees. One was Mr. J. Schnitzler, first violin, who has not yet returned to the city, but who will be here before long. The other two were both basses, and had both been disabled by accidents. Mr. Goldstein had the misfortune to break one of his legs a short time since, and the other gentleman will be laid up for some time, on account of his having cut an artery in one of his arms, and thereby lost a great deal of blood. The vacancies will be speedily filled.

Interest and expectation were manifest on every face. The younger men could not sit still, and even the veterans who have played in Music Hall under all the successive administrations of the leadership kept rubbing their glasses and watching the door of the room where Mr. Paur and Col. Higginson were closeted.

The only outsider in the hall was gray-haired Carl Zerrahn, whose musical name and fame entitled him to the privilege.

"Hail to the Chief."

A few minutes after 10 o'clock the tall form of Col. Higginson appeared, crowned with the polished and altogether irreproachable head-gear that is inseparable from his identity. At his side walked Mr. Paur, with a baton in his hand and a most genial smile upon his golden-bearded face. He advanced to the centre of the amphitheatre, where Col. Higginson, without further ado, introduced him to the members of the orchestra.

Mr. Paur buttoned up his rather loose and flowing frock coat, glanced at the floor and then up at the sounding board as if he rather wondered how the electric light chandeliers got through the holes, and then made a little speech. He waved his arm, and it was plain to see that he said he was glad to meet them.

A Mutual Admiration Scene.

The next minute a conscious smile rippled from chair to chair, and anyone with half an eye could have told that the speaker was telling his hearers how the splendid reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has passed the ocean, and that he was pleased and proud of the privilege of being called to lead them.

Then a look of exceeding virtue succeeded the smile which meant, of course, that the new conductor had just told them that he hoped for their cordial co-operation in making the coming season a great success.

A slight inclination of the body concluded the oration. It was the briefest, most unconventional sort of a bow, just the kind of a salutation which you would bestow upon a friend were you to meet him upon the street some afternoon with his wife upon his arm, and as different from Arthur Nikisch's jackknife maneuver as could be imagined.

The orchestra applauded, and the faint crepitation produced by the smiting together of 30 pairs of hands sounded like the distant rattle of hailstones upon a slated roof.

Now to Business.

Then the rehearsal began. The first work essayed was Beethoven's seventh (heroic) symphony. It was familiar enough to both leader and musicians, and started off with a confident swing and spirit. Mr. Paur's blue eyes kindled with animation as it proceeded, and the strokes of his baton, at first short and precise, grew longer and more vigorous.

His method of conducting is not like that of his predecessor. It is not so graceful, and the poetry of motion which was wont to fascinate the symphony girls will be missed. But the members of the orchestra say that it is much more easy to follow. Somehow Mr. Nikisch's poetic waves were not always to be interpreted, and the musicians played on in such emergencies as their own experience suggested. With Paur there is no mistaking what he wants. Every stroke means something and is emphasized, and a nod of the head and a jerk of the other arm serves to impress the idea still further. To sum it up, Mr. Paur is not a graceful conductor; in fact, as far as could be seen from his first rehearsal, his manner seems to be a trifle clumsy in aspect. He moves his body from side to side, and this, together with his short and "stocky" physique, gives the impression. But the players say that the symphony was beautifully rendered. The music of the stately funeral march rolled grandly through the hall, and the smile which lit up Mr. Paur's countenance showed that he was entirely happy.

CHARACTERISTIC ATTITUDE OF HERR PAUR.

Piano!

"I have heard," he said, "that you can play piano. I have never heard an orchestra play piano and would like to now."

Soon a piano passage was reached and the great orchestra was playing with that wonderful sweetness, lightness and delicacy that can be likened only to the strains of a choir of million harps all pitched in perfect accord, and which has made the organization celebrated all over the musical world.

When it was finished Mr. Paur stood still a moment without saying a word. Then he bowed low to his men and said: "I have heard you play piano. I thank you, gentlemen."

When the customary recess was taken the musicians strolled about the hall or down stairs into the lower corridor. They naturally discussed their new leader, and there was no dissent from the favorable opinion of his merits as a musician, and his qualities as a man that were freely expressed.

A Man Among Men.

He has showed an unmistakable disposition to be friendly with his new associates, and their relations will be most pleasant. He will be popular, and that means a good deal. It is no harm now to say that his immediate predecessor was decidedly unpopular on account of his manner and the disdainful air with which he was accustomed to treat the men. "When he saw one of us coming he would pose," was how one of them expressed it.

But the recess was over and the rehearsal was recommenced. The second number on the programme was the Cserubini Overture. This was taken right through without interruptions, and at the close the leader was moving his brow in a fashion that showed how the vigor of his exertions had told upon him. It was evident, however, that he was more than satisfied with the performance.

The third and last selection was Beethoven's Leonore, No. 3. This was executed with skill and taste, and then the orchestra dispersed.

They will rehearse every day from now on until the first concert, but after that Mr. Paur has announced that Monday will be a day off. This is a concession that is highly appreciated, for being obliged to rehearse every day in the week, as has hitherto been the rule, is a weariness and vexation of spirit.

PAUR LIKES MUSIC HALL.

New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra Visits the Hall and Takes a Ride Around Boston.

"I think I shall like it," said Emil Paur, the new leader of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, after a visit to Music Hall. He spoke from the standpoint of a connoisseur and after carefully estimating the size and acoustic properties of the place.

"It is not quite so large as I expected to find," continued the distinguished musician, "although plenty large enough."

He spoke in German, of course, for he has not yet mastered the English language sufficiently to be able to speak it. His remarks were addressed to his old friend John Sauerquell, who had escorted him to the hall, and to Mrs. Paur.

Sunday was passed very quietly by Mr. and Mrs. Paur. Both were tired out, for their trip across the water was a very tempestuous one and they were badly shaken up on their arrival in New York last week. Mr. Paur seems to be even more exhausted than his wife.

It was nearly noon when they and their two children and Mr. Sauerquell came down to breakfast yesterday morning at the Thorndike, where they are now stopping.

After breakfast Mr. Paur donned his derby hat and gray top coat and, with Mrs. Paur, were escorted to Music Hall by Mr. Sauerquell. Mr. Sauerquell came from the same town in Austria that the new Symphony Orchestra leader came from, and in their younger days they were on intimate terms with one another.

Since Mr. Paur first stepped on shore in New York he has been in charge of his devoted friend, who acts as interpreter and in other capacities.

Considerable time was spent in Music Hall by the three. Mr. Paur stated, among other things, that he was glad that there were no private boxes in the hall or elaborate ornamentations, for he had found that the acoustic properties of many fine concert halls abroad had been ruined by such unnecessary additions.

In Leipzig Mr. Paur had a much larger hall than Music Hall in which to conduct the concerts of his orchestra. It seated about 5000 people, it is said. He expected to find Music Hall about the same size.

No wonder, then, that he thought it rather small.

After the visit to Music Hall the party took a carriage and enjoyed a long drive. They went out to Jamaica Plain, for Mr. Paur is looking around for a house in the suburbs or outskirts of the city. He and his wife are going to keep house and not live at a hotel while in Boston just as soon as they can arrange matters to their satisfaction.

They also visited Franklin Park, the Marine Park, South Boston, and other places of interest. Mr. Paur expressed himself as delighted with the outside appearance of the city when seen by a Journal reporter upon his return to the Thorndike about 9.30 P. M. He and his wife retired to their apartments almost immediately upon arriving at the hotel.

"To-morrow morning Mr. Paur and I will probably go down to Music Hall again and meet Mr. Ellis, the manager," said Mr. Sauerquell to the Journal reporter. "He will meet Colonel Higginson to-morrow also."

"In the afternoon I shall take him out to Brookline and he may possibly find a house to suit him out there."

"The first rehearsal of the orchestra will be Thursday afternoon and Mr. Paur will be the conductor. It is not necessary for him to understand English in order to act as leader. All the previous conductors, Nikisch, Gericke and all, always spoke in German when addressing the musicians, although there are some Frenchmen and Englishmen and other nationalities represented."

"The new leader is very quick to learn and I think that in six months at least he will be able to speak very good English. He can read it now and understands fairly well when talked to in English. But he cannot speak it. The Pairs will remain at the Thorndike probably until they go to housekeeping."

Symphony Concerts.

The earliest announcement to be made regarding the coming musical season and of foremost importance is that of the Boston symphony orchestra. The combination of circumstances of a few weeks ago when, for a time, it was extremely doubtful if the concerts by this splendid organization could be continued no doubt caused the public to realize, as never before, their importance in the musical life of the city.

No better evidence of genuine interest could be shown than in the speedy closing of the subscription for providing a new building for these concerts.

The orchestra will give 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings at Music hall, beginning Oct 13 and 14.

Season tickets for these performances will be sold by auction at Music hall, Sept 25, 26, 28 and 29. The sales will begin at 10 o'clock each day, and will be conducted under the usual rules. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a large diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Patrons of the concerts are naturally interested to know about the personality and musical tastes of Mr. Emil Paur, the new conductor in whose hands the artistic conduct of the performances will rest.

The successor of Mr. Nikisch will find at his command one of the best orchestras of the world. He has shown by his achievements in Europe that he is worthy the high position to which he is called and that he possesses many qualities which fit him for its exacting duties.

He is but 38 years of age. A reliable musical authority in Leipzig has this to say of him:

"In losing Emil Paur we lose an executive artist of extraordinary many-sidedness, a director of eminent endowments, a musician of the most thorough education, and a man full of energy, strength of character, and firm faith in the ideal in our great art. How our orchestra esteemed him, how highly it valued him as musician and as man, there are thousands of testimonies."

"What distinguishes him as a director? The piercing keenness of his perceptions, his direct sentiment, the fire of his generous spirit. He held in honor every work of genius. The masters of the past as well as of the present found in him the warmest admirer, certain to secure the best execution for their works. Not only the theater but the concert hall bears witness to his masterly direction. Need we mention how among other things he conducted Wagner's 'Faust' overture as no one but Hans von Bulow had done before in Leipzig."

"Need we point to the performances of the Liszt society and his interpretations of Berlioz, Liszt and Bruckner? How admirable were his performances! The best wishes of all follow him in his new career."

No announcement can be made as to programs until the arrival of Mr. Paur. These concerts are in no wise intended to exploit "star" artists, but care will be taken to secure the best soloists available and only those worthy to appear with the orchestra. Among those already engaged are Mme. Emma Eames and Mme. Lillian Nordica.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Mr. Emil Paur's Impressions and Plans.

Details Regarding the Suffolk Musical Union—The Visit of the Welch Ladies' Choir—"Prince Pro Tem" and "Venus" Still Reign—News Notes, Comment and Gossip.

"Do you know him?"

"No."

"Have you ever seen him?"

"Only in his photograph."

"Well, do you speak German?"

"Oh, yes."

"It's all right, then. Wie geht's?"

"Ganz gut, danke. Und Ihnen?"

This was the beginning of a chat with the Thorndike clerk after the HERALD representative had sent up his card to the recently arrived conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Herr Emil Paur. The hotel man had some pleasant stories to tell of Herr Paur's experience with our language, and of his relief at finding a hotel where he could make himself understood. It turned out, however, that the would-be interviewer was to be the means of adding a new story to the list. For, although the bell boy returned with the news that Herr Paur would be down directly, it was learned, after half an hour's waiting, that the cordial conductor's intention had been to invite the visitor below to come up. The kindly apologies which the Kapellmeister made became the happiest possible means of opening the interview, which, being carried on in German, gave our new conductor perfect freedom to express himself on the various subjects which were suggested for discussion.

The reasons for requesting an interview were soon stated. "Herr Kapellmeister, you know that we Bostonians are very proud of our orchestra. We not only take delight in it ourselves, but we have great gratification in hearing the good reports of its work in other cities where the taste for orchestral music has had a chance to develop. And our interest in it is, we believe, more intimate, direct and general than any similar feeling in any city of the Union. The most insignificant facts concerning it are not without interest to a large proportion of the music-loving public. It goes without saying, then, that the personality and ideas of the conductor are subjects of an attention in no way to be mistaken for that idle curiosity which prompts the general public to inquire concerning any celebrated personage. It was thought, then, that you would not object to talking informally in response to concerning your ideas on several topics which suggest themselves to one who has attended our concerts for many seasons."

A Few Questions

"I should be very glad to do so, I assure you. The reputation of the orchestra is well known to me; for it has passed the limits of your country, and has spread through the whole of musical Europe. I have heard, too, of the friendliness and musical intelligence of the Boston public, and am looking forward with the greatest pleasure to the performance of the task before me. What are some of the questions which you would like to ask?"

"As to your musical sympathies—are they distinctly for the classic or for the modern schools?"

"I am thoroughly unpartisan. I love and honor the classic writers, but am glad to recognize any evidences of talent or genius in the younger composers. Indeed, I consider it the duty of every conductor to be continually on the alert concerning newer productions. It is true that such a course involves much labor. One finds that a great proportion of contemporary compositions are worthless, but the satisfaction of introducing to the public something of real worth is to me very great. During all the time of my residence in Königsberg and Mannheim I gave much attention to new works. It was at Mannheim that the 'Ring of the Niebelungen' was produced for the first time outside of Bayreuth and Munich. You know that Mannheim has been, ever since before the time of Mozart, famous for its devotion to music."

"What have been the various stages in your career as a conductor?"

"It was in Vienna that I completed my studies. I early received much encouragement from my friends to devote myself to conducting, but it was not until, at the age of 19, I conducted with success a large choral performance in Berlin, that I definitely decided to adopt the career of Kapellmeister. I was for a time at Cassel, and in Hanover I came in contact with Von Bülow during the time when he was making his reputation as a conductor. My first absolutely independent position was in Königsberg, where I remained several years. My period of service at Mannheim extended over 10 or 11 years, and when Nikisch left Leipzig I became his successor at the Stadttheater of that city. In Mannheim I gave also a great many concerts of chamber music, and have several times appeared as pianist at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig. You see that my musical activity has been very varied."

"You speak of your

Love for the Classics.

Do you think that the works of Beethoven should be rendered according to modern fashion or in a purely classical spirit?"

"Most decidedly the latter. I am not at all in sympathy with certain tendencies which have lately become so pronounced in these matters. Greatly as I admire Wagner, I think he went much too far in his interpretation of the Beethoven symphonies. I believe in programme music only to the extent that an idea, poetical or other, may underlie a musical composition. But I cannot sympathize with Wagner in his wish to invest some of Beethoven's compositions with scenic suggestions and dramatic developments which need other than musical terms of expression. Indeed, I feel myself especially fitted to undertake the rendering of Beethoven's works; for my father was an instrumentalist and was closely identified with the musical life of Vienna at the time when Beethoven was exercising a direct influence there. He early called to my attention the distinguishing points of Beethoven's genius, and pointed out the means which the master employed to carry out his artistic purposes."

"Who among all the composers most command your admiration?"

"Bach, Beethoven and Wagner rank-sent for me the greatest in music. That may indicate for you the catholicity of my taste."

"If you were asked to give rank to Haydn and Mozart, where would you place them with reference to each other?"

"You ask that question so guardedly that I think perhaps you agree with me in not believing in drawing such comparisons. Both of these composers were consummate masters, perfectly individual, and thoroughly delightful. When one's mood is favorable to gaiety Haydn's music is more welcome, but Mozart's late operas stand alone in the loftiest realms of music. Haydn is a sun, and Mozart is a sun, too. Luckily we may enjoy the warmth and brightness of each of them, without attempt at comparison."

"Are Wagner's earlier works—'Tannhäuser' and 'Lohengrin,' for instance—or his later dramas more admirable, according to your judgment?"

"For me the greatest period of Wagner's Art Life was between the beginning of the composition of the 'Master Singers' and the conclusion of the 'Ring.' This period includes these works and 'Tristan.' These, for me, represent Wagner at his greatest."

"Of course you have often been at Bayreuth?"

"Nearly every season. I was there at the first performance '78."

"Then you must have met Liszt."

"Oh, yes, I was very intimate with him. When I directed the first performance of 'Gotterdammerung' in Mannheim—I believe I mentioned that—Liszt, Frau Cosima and others of Wagner's family were there to hear. I also gave in Mannheim what was considered to be an ideal performance of the 'Faust' symphony of Liszt."

"Do you consider that to be his greatest work?"

"Yes, if you use the word 'great,' I do so consider it. But I think that Liszt is most delightful, most characteristic, most spontaneous in his rhapsodies. They seem to me to be the happiest expression of his peculiar genius."

"And as to Brahms?"

"In the realm of absolute music Brahms is, in my opinion, the single German composer of today who possesses qualities of real greatness."

"You have, then, given many performances of his works?"

"I have produced practically everything of his. The C minor and E minor symphonies were performed in Mannheim while still in manuscript, and I have often been personally associated with Dr. Brahms in concert performances."

"Among those who belong to the so-called new German school, some have become very favorably known in America—Peter Cornelius, for instance."

"Yes, indeed; and what a pity it was that he died so young. He would certainly have accomplished many great works. I esteem very highly his songs, and consider his 'Barber of Bagdad' as one of the most important operatic works of our time. In the 'Cid,' too, there are moments of great power. His songs are very worthy of the popularity they are rapidly gaining in Germany."

"Have you interested yourself much in the work of Richard Strauss?"

"Yes, I know very well nearly all his published compositions. As my remarks concerning

Programme Music

may indicate, I cannot agree with him in his new departure in composition, as embodied in such symphonic poems as 'Death and Resurrection,' 'Don Juan' and 'Macbeth.' His earlier works were full of great promise, and I greatly enjoy his symphony in F minor. Nevertheless, in regard to his later works, it is not to be denied that there are manifestations of a certain genius in them—a genius which, if guided by ripe intelligence, may yield fruit in really great works. But that remains to be seen. At present there is too much 'programme' in him for my taste."

"Some of the Hungarian masters have no doubt claimed your attention?"

"Oh, yes, I place Dvorak by the side of Brahms, even if I must place the German master in the seat of honor. Dvorak has that which is rare in our day, a distinct and large individuality."

"And Moszkowski?"

"I have never been drawn toward him as toward some other modern composers. Perhaps it would be better not to express myself in any more definite terms."

"What of the French composers?"

"The one who is now perhaps most popular, Massenet, has always seemed to me to be inspired in only a very moderate degree. Saint-Saëns, on the contrary, I have always held in high esteem."

"A certain other French composer has lately excited attention in Germany. I refer to the composer of the opera 'Gwendoline,' Emmanuel Chabrier."

"I'm very glad you mentioned him. He is a delightful man, and a very good friend of mine. I suppose I did not think of him because he is not naturally classed with Frenchmen. Do you know, the poor fellow has become demented, and his friends think the reason of it to be the continued refusals of French theatre directors to undertake the production of his wonderful, but very difficult, opera. He has had little good fortune in his fatherland."

"That's the way it's likely to be with Frenchmen; they must—"

"Yes," said Herr Paur, anticipating what the writer was about to remark, "they must get recognition and fame in Germany before their countrymen wake up to the fact of their importance. So it was with Berlioz, so again with Saint-Saëns."

"And in regard to the Russian masters?"

"I believe that Russia will have a great musical future. Tchaikowsky is easily the first among their living composers, and is certainly a very delightful and characteristic writer. Borodin, too, has been lately attracting much attention, especially in Berlin."

"And the English writers?"

"Well," said Herr Paur, with a smile, "as we sometimes say in Germany, history is silent concerning them, apparently."

Frau Paur, who had been in the room almost throughout the interview, here remarked to her husband: "But I thought I heard you speak once of an interesting symphony by a man named—what was it?—Kofen—"

"Ah, yes, Cowen. I do remember such a work. It was written, however, in clearly German style. For that matter, I believe that Cowen was educated in Germany. In general the English seem to me to have produced nothing of importance in the higher forms of music."

"And young America?"

"I really know too little about the productions of your countrymen to pass judgment. I can only say that I

Was Greatly Surprised

at the excellence of some works I heard in an orchestral concert of American compositions given in Leipzig under the direction of a certain Mr. Arens. I was so unfortunate as not to hear the symphony of Paine (Herr Paur called it Pynah), which began the programme. I do very distinctly remember that something by MacDowell excited my admiration. There were works by—what was he called?—Chadwick."

"Chadwick," suggested Frau Paur. "Yes, that was it. Chadwick; and also something by Van der Stucken. Possibly there were others. In general, I remember, as I said before, that the extraordinary possibilities of your musical development impressed themselves upon me."

"Is there any one among the well known German musical critics with whose ideas you in general agree?"

"Hardly," was the reply, after a moment's thought. "Hanslick would be such a one, were it not for his wholesale condemnation of Wagner. By the way, did you know that Hanslick has experienced a partial conversion, and has been induced to recognize that he went too far in the earlier days. Dr. Wilhelm Tappert—of whom you doubtless have heard as a writer on musical subjects—had happened to preserve Hanslick's criticisms of the first performances he heard of 'Tannhauser' more than 20 years ago. Not long since Hanslick wrote a feuilleton praising certain parts of the opera. Dr. Tappert took the opportunity to lay before Hanslick the two criticisms, one of earlier years, one of today. The author of 'The Musically Beautiful' was obliged to confess that he had made some mistakes."

"Exactly what was your connection with the musical life of Leipzig?"

"I was chief director in the Stadt Theatre; that was my only official position. But I directed numerous large charity concerts in the Gewandhaus, and also directed the concerts of the Liszt society. During the last winter I had the direction of the semi-centennial celebration of Rubinstein's first appearance in Leipzig. The master himself was there. We performed his great oratorio, 'Moses.' At a matinee at our home we had some chamber music works of his, among others the fantasy for two pianos, which my wife and I played."

Rubinstein Seemed Delighted.

and richly rewarded our endeavors by treating us and the assembled company of musicians to an improvisation in his happiest vein. That evening I had arranged for a public concert of chamber music in the old Gewandhaus—no longer the hall for the regular concerts—where Rubinstein, then a boy of 12 or so, made his first appearance in Leipzig. We had a bust of the master before the stage, and the hall was suitably decorated. My wife and I played again the fantasy, and several other of his works were given. Again the enthusiasm was unbounded, and again Rubinstein delighted the hearers by his own playing. One of his last messages to me was: "If I cannot get my 'Christus' done in Germany, I'll come to you in America. The Americans will do it for me."

"Do you prefer to conduct in the theatre or in the concert hall?"

"Do you know," said Herr Paur with a sigh of apparent relief, while his wife seconded by a smile and nod the declaration which she knew was about to be made, "I consider it as a deliverance that I have nothing more to do with the theatre. Play houses are, after all, only business houses nowadays. That which will draw must be performed, and that which will not draw never receives the attention it deserves. And so it comes about that there are very few performances of great works concerning which the conscientious artist can truly say to himself: Well done! In concert performances, however, one may have plenty of time for preparation, and there are not so many influences which militate against really artistic work. The one thing which I used to object to in Leipzig is absent here. There the public want at least two soloists, and long programmes have become the rule. As a result, the minds of the audience are no longer in a condition to listen to the symphony which closes the programme. I am glad to note that there is a more sensible arrangement here."

"Have you as yet made the acquaintance of any of the Resident American Musicians?"

"As yet, none."

"Have you already held a rehearsal?"

"Yes, a single one."

"And how does the orchestra strike you?"

"My expectations were very high. I am glad to say that the reality has surpassed them. The tone quality (der Klang) is wonderfully fine. I cannot conceive of a better implement for the working out of orchestral problems than this very orchestra. I can't help hoping that the new hall which is to be erected will be modelled primarily with reference to the orchestral concerts. The present hall seems excellent, though a trifle too broad for its length. Too broad halls are not favorable to the hearing of orchestral composition. Nowadays they are too likely to build halls that may be used for concerts, for theatrical performances and possibly, on occasion, for a circus show. It would be a pity not to plan the new hall for the best interests of our orchestra. And, do you know," continued Herr Paur, "another delightful thing to me is that the orchestra is composed almost exclusively of young men. That has long been a desire of mine, to conduct an orchestra of young musicians. In Boston I shall have found my ideal in that respect."

"In general, how will your programmes be made up?"

"In length, about as they have been. I am not an enthusiastic friend of 'historical' programmes—three symphonies in one evening, for instance. I don't believe in overdoing one particular style of composition, as is especially likely to be the case with the overture. Again, I believe that works of widely different types should not be intimately associated on a programme. Harsh antitheses should be avoided."

"Is your first programme already made?"

"Oh, yes," replied the conductor, drawing a bundle of notes from his pocket. "I have the programmes of the first 15 concerts more or less clearly determined. The first programme will consist of the C minor symphony of Beethoven, a serenade for strings by Tchaikowsky and Wagner's 'Tannhauser' overture. There will be no soloist."

"What Novelties

may we expect this season?"

"I have on my list the following late works, most of which will, I think, be novelties: Second rhapsody, by Dvorak; overture, 'Bernhard von Weimar,' Raff; symphony in F minor, Richard Strauss; symphonie dramatique, Rubenstein; capriccio Italien, Tchaikowsky; Dimitrius overture, Rubinstein; Seventh Symphony, Dvorak; overture to Ibsen's 'Nordische Heerfahrt,' by a Danish composer, Hartmann; prelude to second act of 'Gwendoline,' Chabrier; double concerto, Brahms; serenade for small orchestra, Brahms; Hamlet overture, Gade."

"There is nothing by any American on your list?"

"No, not yet. I have as yet had no time to look about me with a view to finding American novelties."

"Are there any prospects of a chorus in connection with the orchestra?"

"Concerning that I know nothing. I should be very glad if there could exist a competent body of singers for our assistance. Of course, every conductor wants to give the Ninth Symphony. That is the crown of all things musical. But unless it can be well given it is better not to attempt it. My ideals in reference to the Ninth Symphony were formed in Vienna, where there are performances not only adequate, but superb. I have never heard such chorus singing in Germany proper. I should dislike to undertake a performance which could not carry out my convictions concerning the work."

The interviewer had exhausted his supply of questions and confessed the fact to Herr Paur. The latter did not at all seem overtasked or fatigued, and urged his caller not to hurry away, as, perhaps, something might come to his mind if the chat were continued. Some general conversation followed, in which the wife of the conductor took part. The only matters of musical interest touched upon were some interesting details concerning Herr Paur and Von Bulow. In the old days of Hannover there were many friendly controversies between the two concerning the interpretations of Beethoven's works. Paur could not countenance the "enormous freedoms" which Von Bulow allowed himself. And the younger man has had the satisfaction in later years of a recognition of the rightness of his more conservative views.

"That does not mean," said Herr Paur, "that I think the Beethoven symphonies ought to be rattled off as if by a barrel organ. No; but I believe that Beethoven's ideas, if properly presented, are sufficiently characteristic of themselves, without being colored especially for the occasion."

Both Herr and Frau Paur were delighted at the prospect of being soon settled in their cosy home in Jamaica Plain. They are apparently not only ready, but anxious, to begin life as Bostonians. Certainly those who may have the good fortune to make their acquaintance have a delightful experience in store. The interviewer left them with the firm conviction that, if artistic devotion, superb professional training and a delightful personality are determining qualities of excellence in a conductor of the Symphony orchestra, our good friend, Mr. Higginson, has found an ideal incumbent in Herr Emil Paur.

BENEDICK.

EMIL PAUR IN THE CONCERT HALL.

One of Leipzig's best critics writes of Emil Paur in the concert hall as follows: Emil Paur has only been four years in Leipzig, and yet he has succeeded in gaining laurels of fame and crosses of honor as incomparable conductor in large concerts; namely, in the new Gewandhaus for the benefit of the orchestra aspirants, in the Liszt Vereine, etc. In studying great symphonies and difficult novelties he endeavored to interpret the composer correctly, to leave nothing doubtful, and to impress everything thoroughly till perfection was attained. No commanding "Sir volo, sir jubeo," did the musicians hear from him, but they were convinced in a friendly tone of the correctness of his instructions.

They all learned from him, and they all must thank him for it. We had never before heard Liszt's "Faust Symphony," the same composer's symphonic poem, "Tasso," R. Wagner's overture to "Faust," Berlioz's "Symphony Fantastique" performed with such singing and force as under Paur's genial leading. He conducted lately, in the last concerts of the Liszt Vereine, the powerful "Seventh Symphony" (E dur), by J. Bruckner, a book with seven seals for many conductors who did not venture to attack it, and earned brilliant success.

The same symphony, which had been unfavorably criticised in the Gewandhaus concerts and been received with tokens of disapproval, now suddenly appeared in quite a new light and found universal approbation. That was called forth by the divine spark of real inspiration, which the impulsive conductor, Mr. Paur, bears in him and radiates. Pedantic and mediocre minds cannot do that.

As to the virtuosity of the pianist and violinist. Mr. Paur has seldom, but always with success, appeared here as pianist. He played brilliantly in the Gewandhaus concerts Beethoven's great "E's dur Concert," and later on Brahms's "B dur Concert," etc. The pieces on two pianos which Mr. Paur with his congenial wife, a highly intelligent and talented pianiste, played in different concerts, as well as at their own house before a distinguished audience (matinee), were unique in their kind.

We remember with pleasure these excellent matinees in Mr. Paur's house. Here was first heard many a good new work (chamber music) which helped to bring it into notice. Here Brahms's beautiful "Clarinet Quintet" (op. 15) was played for the first time in Leipzig. Not even a first rate violinist could have played the first violin part better than Mr. Paur did then. His melting melodious tone in adagio delighted every hearer. One felt the whole soul of the player was turned into music.

The fresh south German temperament, and the pleasant, unconstrained, natural behavior of the conductor Paur caused him to be liked in every circle in which he associated. No hypocrite and no paragon, no kid-gloved drawing room visitor and no maker of fine speeches in self interest, but a healthy, honest and jovial German, with his heart in the right place, but also a great artist, soaring to the highest aims with justifiable self-consciousness; in this light Mr. Paur has shown and maintained himself always here. May fortune smile on him in his more distant artist career! His genius will everywhere find admiration and bring him success.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

MAY BE HAD AT CONNELLY'S TICKET OFFICE,
44[A] ADAMS HOUSE 27

Symphony Concerts.

FOR SALE—One seat, O, 25, for Saturday evening concerts. Price, $28. Apply to Box 2746, Boston. 29

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

For sale, 2 seats in K, for Concerts, at cost, or will exchange for 2 seats less desirable and cheaper for difference in cost. Wanted to buy one Rehearsal and two Concert Seats. Address G. C. F., Boston Transcript. 14[A]

Symphony Tickets.
HEARD'S TICKET OFFICE, 43 WEST ST. 26

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

FOR SALE—Two seats floor under balcony; three first balcony on side; low prices. Address J. F. M., Boston Transcript. 14[A]

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL TICKET.
End seat, Winter street side, on floor, Z, No. 34. Price $23. Address Post Office Box 123, Beverly Farms, Mass. 14[A]

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Great Interest in the Symphony Concert Ticket Sales.

Last Week of "The Fencing Master"—
Changes in "Prince Pro Tem"—
"Venus" Still Shines at the Park—
The Gullmant Recitals—Worcester's
Festival—News Notes.

The general confidence shown in all the announcements made in regard to the Boston Symphony orchestra by its business manager, Charles A. Ellis, who represents the founder and patron of this great organization, Henry L. Higginson, is one of the best evidences of the uniform appreciation of the public spirit of this liberal supporter of this grand musical enterprise by the music lovers of this section.

EMIL PAUR.
(His latest photograph.)

Despite the changes made in the leader and members of the orchestra during the if seasons of its existence the public has never wavered in its support of the concerts given, and the character of the patrons of each season has shown that the Symphony orchestra's public is made up of the most intelligent classes in this community.

As each season brings many to this city who are unfamiliar with this history of the Symphony orchestra, it may be well to again state that the organization owes its permanent character to Mr. Henry L. Higginson, who makes himself personally responsible for its maintenance without regard to the extent of the liability so incurred. He occupies a unique position in assuming this responsibility, and during 12 years he has shown himself equal to all emergencies and willing to meet any ex-sense that should add to the value of the Boston Symphony orchestra or increase the interest in its concerts.

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA.

There is, therefore, every reason to have firm faith in the good judgment shown in the selection of Mr. Emil Paur as the conductor of the orchestra for the coming season.

He sailed for New York on the 19th inst., and comes directly to Boston for a visit at the home of Mr. Higginson preparatory to beginning his season's labors.

He has been made fully acquainted with the character of the concerts of former seasons, the resources of the library, and other matters calculated to enable him to outline his plans with a full understanding of the demands of the Boston public.

His familiarity with the present prominent composers of Europe, insure a hearing of all the best music of the modern school, and there is every reason to suppose that he will continue the policy of later years in these concerts in giving an opening to native born and resident musicians who have meritorious works awaiting a public performance.

The orchestral programmes will undoubtedly be varied with choice solo work, and the engagements already made with Mme. Lillian Nordica, Mme. Emma Eames, Mlle. Aus Der Ohe, Plunkett Greene and Mr. Max Heinrichs indicate that Manager Ellis will maintain the high standard of the concerts in this particular.

The Wife of the Symphony's New Leader.

All Boston will be interested in Mrs. Paur, the wife of the newly selected leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

Not that she has anything to do with the concerts (although like the wives of Mr. Henschel and of Mr. Nikisch, she is a musician), but yet the social position accorded the conductor of these most fashionable of entertainments gives to his wife a pedestal on which the "world" likes to view her.

MRS. NIKISCH.

It is not easy to tell much about Mrs. Paur. It was not easy to secure her photograph. You do not find it on sale at the stores; you do not find it in the books. And, for that matter, you do not find the photograph of Mr. Paur any easier. Indeed, in all Boston only two persons exist who, at present, know Mr. and Mrs.

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

Paur personally and therefore are able to speak about them. And in all Boston there is but one photograph of Mr. Paur (and that the Journal has already printed), and but one photograph of Mrs. Paur (and that the Journal prints to-day), showing for the first time in Boston the face of the coming lady.

It is an attractive face, young in looks—Mrs. Paur is about 30—and bright in appearance. As a pianist the wife of the new leader has gained attention abroad, but it is doubtful if here she displays her professional abilities in public, as she is very domestic in her taste and devotes her time to her husband and their two boys.

The wife of Mr. Nikisch and the wife of Mr. Henschel did appear in public. Before her marriage Mrs. Henschel, then Miss Lillian June Bailey, the daughter of the well-known Boston merchant, Lucien C. Bailey, won fame as a vocalist, and after a period of studying on the Continent became the pupil of Mr. Henschel and then the wife. Oftentimes she sang with him both here and abroad, and in London still keeps up that form of entertainment.

Mrs. Nikisch did not appear in public as a singer until November, 1890, when she made her American debut. A handsome woman, with deep blue-gray eyes and fair hair falling in a soft fringe over her forehead, the wife of Mr. Paur's predecessor had also a pleasant manner that made her agreeable company. She has two children, a little girl of 8 years and a youngest boy. The mother is German, having been born in Brussels, where her father was a printer and publisher. After he met with reverses the family moved to London, where Amelie found it necessary to teach music in order to support her mother. Then she went upon the stage in light opera, and soon met Mr. Nikisch, to whom she was married after a short courtship.

MRS. EMIL PAUR.

Wife of the new Symphony Orchestra leader.

But now it is the coming of Paur, and curiosity will centre upon the fair lady from across the water, who this fall, for the first time, sets foot in America.

SEATS FOR SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Sixty-Six Dollars Was the Highest Premium Paid This Morning.

There was an exceptionally large number of people present this morning in Music Hall at the auction sale of seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sale was of the $12 seats, and all bids were for the premium above that price. As a new conductor is to lead the orchestra this year whose reputation as yet is only established to the musical people of Boston and not to many patrons of these Symphony rehearsals, who go as a matter of good form, it was interesting to see how the prices would compare with those paid last year to hear the concerts led by the attractive and popular Nikisch. The highest price paid today was $66, three seats by Connolly, being bought on the right aisle in row K for that amount.

Eight seats were bought for the Welds, four in row H, on the right aisle, for $37 a seat, and four one row back for $65. Mrs. John L. Gardner bought her customary seats in G at a premium of $45, and those directly across the aisle from her sold for $47.

The bidding this morning began at first rather slowly, the first seat sold, No. 1 in A, bringing $14. Other seats in that row sold from $10 to $19, the former price being the lowest premium paid during the early sale. In row B, the extreme right end seat sold for $11, but others brought as high as $33. A single seat in the next row brought $39, and in row D two seats sold for $45 premium each. For six or eight rows now the prices bid averaged quite a little higher, though an end seat in row F brought only $16. The bidding seemed at this stage of the sale to be exceedingly erratic, a single seat selling for $26, and the two next to it for $44. The seats at the ends of rows G, H, I and J averaged about $21, some of them selling, however, much higher. In row L two seats sold for $15, and the next two to them for $44. From $14 to $54 were paid for seats in this row, and in the row back of this not less than $16, and as high as $55.

The large loss which the speculators are said to have suffered last year influenced the bidding quite a deal today, a great many more individual bidders being present, and the speculators not buying nearly so many tickets as in previous years, with perhaps the exception of Connolly and Herrick, both of whom had many private orders and who do not buy many tickets to resell. Although the price for a single seat this morning did not reach the exceedingly high mark of last year's sale, something over $100, the average today was full as high as in previous sales. If the sales which continue the rest of the week on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday for the remaining seats of the rehearsals and all those of the concerts average as high as those of today, it may be safely said that the promise of the coming symphony season in brilliant attendance will be as bright as any year in the long history of these concerts.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

Satisfactory Average Prices and a Large Attendance.

The loss which speculators suffered last year greatly influenced the bidding yesterday at the sale of seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Many more individual buyers, however, were present. The average prices were fully as satisfactory as usual.

The sale was of the $12 seats, and all bids were for the premium above that price. As a new conductor is to lead the orchestra this year, whose reputation as yet is only established to the musical people of Boston and not to many patrons of Symphony rehearsals, who go as a matter of good form, it was interesting to see how the prices would compare with those paid last year. The highest price paid was $66, three seats being bought on the right aisle in row K for that amount.

Eight seats were bought for the Welds, four in row H, on the right aisle, for $37 a seat, and four one row back for $65. Mrs. John L. Gardner bought her customary seats in G at a premium of $45, and those directly across the aisle from her sold for $47.

Last year a man paid over $300 for the "privilege," it is said, of occupying the seat nearest those of Mrs. Gardner.

The prices varied extraordinarily, the differences between the prices paid for seats next to each other often being ridiculous.

The bidding began at first rather slowly, the first seat sold, No. 1, in A, bringing $14. Other seats in that row sold from $10 to $19, the former price being the lowest premium paid during the early sale. In row B, the extreme right end seat sold for $11, but others brought as high as $33. A single seat in the next row brought $39, and in row D two seats sold for $45 premium each. For six or eight rows now the prices bid averaged quite a little higher, though an end seat in row F brought only $16. The seats at the ends of rows G, H, I and J averaged about $21, some of them selling, however, much higher. In row L two seats sold for $15, and the next two to them for $44. From $14 to $54 were paid for seats in this row, and in the row back of this not less than $16, and as high as $55.

SYMPHONY.

After filling orders, I have a few choice seats for sale for the Rehearsals and Concerts. 40 State street, Room 53. Office hours, 8.30 A. M. to 5 P. M.

311A17

30

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

MISS E. F. GOERING.

2 Hamilton Place.
Telephone 3533. 311A1

CYNICISMS. Santhe

I wonder what impression the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra will make. I do not mean what the public and the critics will think of him, but what effect he will have on the more youthful femininity that glorify the rehearsals. It seems that Mr. Paur is a blonde. He is the first who has wielded a baton over the orchestra. The others were of a different complexion. This should be in his favor, as a mere matter of change. However, all will depend on the girls. I wonder if they will forget the allegiance they swore to Mr. Nikisch when he was new to them; how they admired the poetic pallor of his countenance, and were fascinated by the whiteness of his hands when they protruded beyond the extensive shirt cuffs that he affected. I think, too, that they felt drawn toward him by the fact that he appeared to be in ill health, and that the prevailing expression of his face was one of profound melancholy. It is true that they never saw him when he was drinking lager beer or playing poker, but that was only so much in his favor. I cannot say that I admired him very greatly as a conductor, but I had a sincere admiration for him in his aspect as a poseur. There can be no question that he had talent in a certain way, as a musician, but he was gifted with positive genius for posing. I remember when he first came here the members of the orchestra were delighted with him. They hailed him as a welcome change from the stern discipline of his predecessor, Gerlicke, as they hailed the latter as a vast improvement on his predecessor, Henschel. In Nikisch there was nothing of Henschel's lack of camaraderie, or of Gerlicke's dignified stiffness. In fact, the men were charmed with him. By and by, however, this feeling of enthusiasm dimmed, and then dissipated. If I were a conductor, I am not sure whether I should feel pleased or otherwise if an orchestra took to me with admiration at the outset of my acquaintance with them. I have known many orchestras, but I never met one that did not heartily dislike its conductor after it had served under him for any length of time. I am curious to learn what the Symphony Orchestra thinks of its new conductor. Its opinion is doubtless favorable, but it is as certain to go the other way as it is that to-morrow's sun will shine. This matters very little, however, for Herr Paur's success here does not depend on his orchestra's like or dislike of him. It depends on the ladies. From all the reports that have preceded him hither, it would appear that he is a man eminently fitted for the post he has been called upon to fill. That, however, is not essentially a prime factor in his possible success. All depends on how he begins; on how and by whom he is taken up. Of course, it is understood that an artist occupying so prominent a position as that of conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, must be taken up; and already there is a spirited competition among the usual takers. This eagerness to obtain him is easily accounted for, on the ground that those who succeed in catching him attain a certain distinction as art patrons, and shine by reflected light. The only difficulty in the matter is, that there are rival coteries, little cliques, so to speak, each one of which is at daggers drawn with the others; and the consequence is that, if he permits himself to be caught by one, he makes enemies of the rest. The situation is perplexing; and it is to be hoped that Herr Paur will learn who is who and what is what before he suffers himself to be captured by the lion hunters, who become lions themselves through the larger lions that they capture. After he is once in the toils, he must be careful to remember that he is tethered, and must not strain his rope and get into the next field, if he would not find himself suddenly in disfavor with his capturers. As for his artistic merits, he may leave them safely to the judgment and appreciation of the really musical public and his critics. Still, I await the verdict of the Rehearsal girls; not on his conducting, but on the impression his personality will make. They have admired all of the Symphony conductors in turn, but they raved over Nikisch, despite the peculiar cut of his trousers, and remained loyal to him when nearly everybody else had deserted him. It remains to be seen if they will transfer their admiration in its gushing fulness to his successor. If he knew the intensity of the feeling experienced by Japonicadom to see him, and to pass judgment on him, he could scarcely avoid a painful nervousness until the ordeal was over. Does he realize how much hinges on that first Friday afternoon?

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS.

At Music Hall yesterday occurred the sale of the Symphony seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

Auctioneer Jackson had his hands full, as the seats went off briskly.

The speculators did not buy so many as last year, but they got possession of a big number. Agents Connolly and Herrick bought a lot, acting for a good many people who prefer to have their purchasing done through agents to getting the publicity themselves.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner was on hand, looking as charming as ever in a modest dark gown, and captured four seats in "G" for the low price of $44 each.

As this is only the premium, her seats cost her just $56. All seats were $12 apiece, with the bid added.

An agent for "Mrs. Weld" got eight seats, four in "I" and four two rows back, for $65 each. This was the largest sum bid.

The lowest sum bid was $10, which was what "A-32" brought. Several in the first row brought from $10 to $13.

A great many seats brought in the neighborhood of $50, but few climbed into the sixties.

One young fellow patiently waited, bidding and bidding, but always stopping at just $38. At last, however, he captured the prize, and got "9-P" at his figure, which with the regular price, made his symphony expenses for the season just $50.

Henry Hyde, Asa Potter's friend, got a couple of good seats after some bidding.

A little girl in blue, after waiting a good while, got an end seat for $14, a very reasonable figure.

Taken all in all the sale was a good one, and very successful.

The sale of $7 50 seats will take place at 10 A.M. today.

SEATS FOR SYMPHONY REHEARSALS.

Sixty-Six Dollars Was the Highest Premium Paid This Morning.

There was an exceptionally large number of people present this morning in Music Hall at the auction sale of seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sale was of the $12 seats, and all bids were for the premium above that price. As a new conductor is to lead the orchestra this year whose reputation as yet is only established to the musical people of Boston and not to many patrons of these Symphony rehearsals, who go as a matter of good form, it was interesting to see how the prices would compare with those paid last year to hear the concerts led by the attractive and popular Nikisch. The highest price paid today was $66, three seats by Connolly, being bought on the right aisle in row K for that amount.

Eight seats were bought for the Welds, four in row H, on the right aisle, for $37 a seat, and four one row back for $65. Mrs. John L. Gardner bought her customary seats in G at a premium of $45, and those directly across the aisle from her sold for $47.

The bidding this morning began at first rather slowly, the first seat sold, No. 1 in A, bringing $14. Other seats in that row sold from $10 to $19, the former price being the lowest premium paid during the early sale. In row B, the extreme right end seat sold for $11, but others brought as high as $33. A single seat in the next row brought $39, and in row D two seats sold for $45 premium each. For six or eight rows now the prices bid averaged quite a little higher, though an end seat in row F brought only $16. The bidding seemed at this stage of the sale to be exceedingly erratic, a single seat selling for $26, and the two next to it for $44. The seats at the ends of rows G, H, I and J averaged about $21, some of them selling, however, much higher. In row L two seats sold for $15, and the next two to them for $44. From $14 to $54 were paid for seats in this row, and in the row back of this not less than $16, and as high as $55.

The large loss which the speculators are said to have suffered last year influenced the bidding quite a deal today, a great many more individual bidders being present, and the speculators not buying nearly so many tickets as in previous years, with perhaps the exception of Connolly and Herrick, both of whom had many private orders and who do not buy many tickets to resell. Although the price for a single seat this morning did not reach the exceedingly high mark of last year's sale, something over $100, the average today was full as high as in previous sales. If the sales which continue the rest of the week on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday for the remaining seats of the rehearsals and all those of the concerts average as high as those of today, it may be safely said that the promise of the coming symphony season in brilliant attendance will be as bright as any year in the long history of these concerts.

THE SYMPHONY SALE.

Satisfactory Average Prices and a Large Attendance.

The loss which speculators suffered last year greatly influenced the bidding yesterday at the sale of seats for the rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Many more individual buyers, however, were present. The average prices were fully as satisfactory as usual.

The sale was of the $12 seats, and all bids were for the premium above that price. As a new conductor is to lead the orchestra this year, whose reputation as yet is only established to the musical people of Boston and not to many patrons of Symphony rehearsals, who go as a matter of good form, it was interesting to see how the prices would compare with those paid last year. The highest price paid was $66, three seats being bought on the right aisle in row K for that amount.

Eight seats were bought for the Welds, four in row H, on the right aisle, for $37 a seat, and four one row back for $65. Mrs. John L. Gardner bought her customary seats in G at a premium of $45, and those directly across the aisle from her sold for $47.

Last year a man paid over $300 for the "privilege," it is said, of occupying the seat nearest those of Mrs. Gardner.

The prices varied extraordinarily, the differences between the prices paid for seats next to each other often being ridiculous.

The bidding began at first rather slowly, the first seat sold, No. 1, in A, bringing $14. Other seats in that row sold from $10 to $19, the former price being the lowest premium paid during the early sale. In row B, the extreme right end seat sold for $11, but others brought as high as $33. A single seat in the next row brought $39, and in row D two seats sold for $45 premium each. For six or eight rows now the prices bid averaged quite a little higher, though an end seat in row F brought only $16. The seats at the ends of rows G, H, I and J averaged about $21, some of them selling, however, much higher. In row L two seats sold for $15, and the next two to them for $44. From $14 to $54 were paid for seats in this row, and in the row back of this not less than $16, and as high as $55.

SYMPHONY.

After filling orders, I have a few choice seats for sale for the Rehearsals and Concerts - 40 State street, Room 53. Office hours, 8.30 A. M. to 5 P. M.
314A17

$ 30

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

MISS E. F. GOERING.
2 Hamilton Place.
Telephone 3533. 114A1

CYNICISMS. Santhe

I wonder what impression the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra will make. I do not mean what the public and the critics will think of him, but what effect he will have on the more youthful femininity that glorify the rehearsals. It seems that Mr. Paur is a blonde. He is the first who has wielded a baton over the orchestra. The others were of a different complexion. This should be in his favor, as a mere matter of change. However, all will depend on the girls. I wonder if they will forget the allegiance they swore to Mr. Nikisch when he was new to them; how they admired the poetic pallor of his countenance, and were fascinated by the whiteness of his hands when they protruded beyond the extensive shirt cuffs that he affected. I think, too, that they felt drawn toward him by the fact that he appeared to be in ill health, and that the prevailing expression of his face was one of profound melancholy. It is true that they never saw him when he was drinking lager beer or playing poker, but that was only so much in his favor. I cannot say that I admired him very greatly as a conductor, but I had a sincere admiration for him in his aspect as a poseur. There can be no question that he had talent in a certain way, as a musician, but he was gifted with positive genius for posing. I remember when he first came here the members of the orchestra were delighted with him. They hailed him as a welcome change from the stern discipline of his predecessor, Gerlicke, as they hailed the latter as a vast improvement on his predecessor, Henschel. In Nikisch there was nothing of Henschel's lack of camaraderie, or of Gerlicke's dignified stiffness. In fact, the men were charmed with him. By and by, however, this feeling of enthusiasm dimmed, and then dissipated. If I were a conductor, I am not sure whether I should feel pleased or otherwise if an orchestra took to me with admiration at the outset of my acquaintance with them. I have known many orchestras, but I never met one that did not heartily dislike its conductor after it had served under him for any length of time. I am curious to learn what the Symphony Orchestra thinks of its new conductor. Its opinion is doubtless favorable, but it is as certain to go the other way as it is that to-morrow's sun will shine. This matters very little, however, for Herr Paur's success here does not depend on his orchestra's like or dislike of him. It depends on the ladies. From all the reports that have preceded him hither, it would appear that he is a man eminently fitted for the post he has been called upon to fill. That, however, is not essentially a prime factor in his possible success. All depends on how he begins; on how and by whom he is taken up. Of course, it is understood that an artist occupying so prominent a position as that of conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, must be taken up; and already there is a spirited competition among the usual takers. This eagerness to obtain him is easily accounted for, on the ground that those who succeed in catching him attain a certain distinction as art patrons, and shine by reflected light. The only difficulty in the matter is, that there are rival coteries, little cliques, so to speak, each one of which is at daggers drawn with the others; and the consequence is that, if he permits himself to be caught by one, he makes enemies of the rest. The situation is perplexing; and it is to be hoped that Herr Paur will learn who is who and what is what before he suffers himself to be captured by the lion hunters, who become lions themselves through the larger lions that they capture. After he is once in the toils, he must be careful to remember that he is tethered, and must not strain his rope and get into the next field, if he would not find himself suddenly in disfavor with his capturers. As for his artistic merits, he may leave them safely to the judgment and appreciation of the really musical public and his critics. Still, I await the verdict of the Rehearsal girls; not on his conducting, but on the impression his personality will make. They have admired all of the Symphony conductors in turn, but they raved over Nikisch, despite the peculiar cut of his trousers, and remained loyal to him when nearly everybody else had deserted him. It remains to be seen if they will transfer their admiration in its gushing fulness to his successor. If he knew the intensity of the feeling experienced by Japonicadom to see him, and to pass judgment on him, he could scarcely avoid a painful nervousness until the ordeal was over. Does he realize how much hinges on that first Friday afternoon?

SALE OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEATS.

At Music Hall yesterday occurred the sale of the Symphony seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals.

Auctioneer Jackson had his hands full, as the seats went off briskly.

The speculators did not buy so many as last year, but they got possession of a big number. Agents Connolly and Herrick bought a lot, acting for a good many people who prefer to have their purchasing done through agents to getting the publicity themselves.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner was on hand, looking as charming as ever in a modest dark gown, and captured four seats in "G" for the low price of $44 each.

As this is only the premium, her seats cost her just $56. All seats were $12 apiece, with the bid added.

An agent for "Mrs. Weld" got eight seats, four in "I" and four two rows back, for $65 each. This was the largest sum bid.

The lowest sum bid was $10, which was what "A-32" brought. Several in the first row brought from $10 to $13.

A great many seats brought in the neighborhood of $50, but few climbed into the sixties.

One young fellow patiently waited, bidding and bidding, but always stopping at just $38. At last, however, he captured the prize, and got "9-P" at his figure, which with the regular price, made his symphony expenses for the season just $50.

Henry Hyde, Asa Potter's friend, got a couple of good seats after some bidding.

A little girl in blue, after waiting a good while, got an end seat for $14, a very reasonable figure.

Taken all in all the sale was a good one, and very successful.

The sale of $7.50 seats will take place at 10 A.M. today.

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, July 9, 1893.

THE Higginsonian drag-net has caught a conductor, who will stand before the Boston Symphony Orchestra next October.

The name is Paur, and it belongs to a conductor now in Leipsic. The notices sent out from Music Hall to the Boston press say that the full name is Emil Pauer; but is not the new conductor, he that was formerly known as Ernst Paur, born at Czernowitz in 1855? Perhaps he has changed his name to Emil, so that he may be distinguished from the well-known Ernst Pauer, born in 1824; or perhaps Emil and Ernst both belong to him; or perhaps the management made a mistake. I confess that I do not know his full name.

Of course all such feeble jests as "More Paur to your elbow," Mr. Higginson," are barred, and summer sickness of the brain will not be accepted as an excuse.

* * *

Now that money enough has been subscribed for a hall and the conductor is known, there is a sigh of relief. The frequenters of symphony concerts are glad in the assurance of the continuance of the concerts, and they hear good reports concerning the successor to Mr. Nikisch. The public that does not care for music is delighted at the prospect of a change of conversation in street cars—for the Boston street car is the Boston salon—and a change of reading matter in the newspapers. And yet the announcement of the choice of conductor is only the preface; a large volume of printed matter will follow.

* * *

Members of the orchestra will be interviewed and they will express unbounded corybantic delight at the selection. Can you imagine one of the players expressing regret? There will be gossip of a personal and tender nature. Boston will be told how Mr. Paur first met his wife, if he is married; and if he is a bachelor, we shall hear the sad romance of a rejected passion. But I understand that there is a Mrs. Pauer, who plays the piano and is the mother of two children.

Then we shall be told that which Liszt said when he first heard Paur read from score. Dr. Hans Guido von Bülow will undoubtedly figure in an eccentric but appreciative rôle. Someone that was on speaking terms with Schumann will certify to the faithfulness of Paur's reading of the Rhenish symphony. And so on, and so on.

* * *

There should be a Manual for the use of conductors contemplating an engagement in Boston, and the directions in the matter of Boston customs, dress, deportment should be explicit and indexed.

When Mr. Nikisch first appeared on the stage of Music Hall he wounded unconsciously the feelings of several of our most esteemed patronesses of music; for his trousers, although they were said to be a triumph of the sartorial art of Leipsic, were of the accordeon pattern.

Mr. Nikisch made a fatal mistake in slighting the honorable advances of a patroness who affects to make or mar the success of musical aspirants. This patroness is an attempted combination of Minerva and Venus, a classical two-headed woman. Now Mr. Nikisch, a man of genial disposition, preferred the society of musicians and agreeable male amateurs of music.

Mr. Paur should be provided with a chart by which he may steer his course. All social shoals and ledges should be marked, that he may sail safely in the currents of popularity.

(Philip Hale)

BACK BAY. Symphony Concerts.

If the person who sent the season tickets for the Symphony Concerts to J. S. B. will send their address, WRITING DISGUISED AS USUAL, to the person in whose care they were sent, the tickets will be returned, with other things sent last spring.

These things I have no doubt were appreciated by the mother, but are not by the daughter.

Should the person persist in sending these annoyances, it may become necessary to use harsh measures to prevent it. "B." Wy & S[A]

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

TEN CONCERTS ON THURSDAY EVENINGS,

Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4, Jan. 23, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

Soloists: Mme. NORDICA, Mr. HEINRICH, Mr. KNEISEL, Mr. SHULZ, and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 14. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of tickets will be reserved for College officers and invited guests. 7[A]

Symphony Tickets.

REHEARSALS: E-23-24. F-23-24. H-23-24. I-24-25-26-27. Q-26-27-28-29. R-8-9. S-8-9.

CONCERTS: G-12-13. H-26-27. I-18-19. Q-24-25.

ON SALE AT

HEARD'S TICKET OFFICE,

43 WEST STREET.

1[A]

Telephone 3544.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Thirteenth Season. 1893-94.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10, and March 31, 1894, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. 7[A] 8 16

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

After filling orders, have a few seats left. 63 Harrison Avenue, Room A, 9 to 10 A. M. 1[A] 7 0 7

Music in Boston.

BOSTON, July 9, 1893.

THE Higginsonian drag-net has caught a conductor, who will stand before the Boston Symphony Orchestra next October.

The name is Paur, and it belongs to a conductor now in Leipsic. The notices sent out from Music Hall to the Boston press say that the full name is Emil Pauer; but is not the new conductor, he that was formerly known as Ernst Paur, born at Czernowitz in 1855? Perhaps he has changed his name to Emil, so that he may be distinguished from the well-known Ernst Pauer, born in 1824; or perhaps Emil and Ernst both belong to him; or perhaps the management made a mistake. I confess that I do not know his full name.

Of course all such feeble jests as "More Paur to your elbow Mr. Higginson," are barred, and summer sickness of the brain will not be accepted as an excuse.

* * *

Now that money enough has been subscribed for a hall and the conductor is known, there is a sigh of relief. The frequenters of symphony concerts are glad in the assurance of the continuance of the concerts, and they hear good reports concerning the successor to Mr. Nikisch. The public that does not care for music is delighted at the prospect of a change of conversation in street cars—for the Boston street car is the Boston salon—and a change of reading matter in the newspapers. And yet the announcement of the choice of conductor is only the preface; a large volume of printed matter will follow.

* * *

Members of the orchestra will be interviewed and they will express unbounded corybantic delight at the selection. Can you imagine one of the players expressing regret? There will be gossip of a personal and tender nature. Boston will be told how Mr. Paur first met his wife, if he is married; and if he is a bachelor, we shall hear the sad romance of a rejected passion. But I understand that there is a Mrs. Pauer, who plays the piano and is the mother of two children.

Then we shall be told that which Liszt said when he first heard Paur read from score. Dr. Hans Guido von Bülow will undoubtedly figure in an eccentric but appreciative rôle. Someone that was on speaking terms with Schumann will certify to the faithfulness of Paur's reading of the Rhenish symphony. And so on, and so on.

* * *

There should be a Manual for the use of conductors contemplating an engagement in Boston, and the directions in the matter of Boston customs, dress, deportment should be explicit and indexed.

When Mr. Nikisch first appeared on the stage of Music Hall he wounded unconsciously the feelings of several of our most esteemed patronesses of music; for his trousers, although they were said to be a triumph of the sartorial art of Leipsic, were of the accordeon pattern.

Mr. Nikisch made a fatal mistake in slighting the honorable advances of a patroness who affects to make or mar the success of musical aspirants. This patroness is an attempted combination of Minerva and Venus, a classical two-headed woman. Now Mr. Nikisch, a man of genial disposition, preferred the society of musicians and agreeable male amateurs of music.

Mr. Paur should be provided with a chart by which he may steer his course. All social shoals and ledges should be marked, that he may sail safely in the currents of popularity.

(Philip Hale)

BACK BAY. Symphony Concerts.

If the person who sent the season tickets for the Symphony Concerts to J. S. B. will send their address, WRITING DISGUISED AS USUAL, to the person in whose care they were sent, the tickets will be returned, with other things sent last spring.

These things I have no doubt were appreciated by the mother, but are not by the daughter.

Should the person persist in sending these annoyances, it may become necessary to use harsh measures to prevent it. "B."
WY & S[A]

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

TEN CONCERTS ON THURSDAY EVENINGS,

Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4,
Jan. 23, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

Soloists: Mme. NORDICA, Mr. HEINRICH, Mr. KNEISEL, Mr. SHULZ, and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of ten concerts, $7.50, will be on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge, on and after Saturday, Oct. 14. Sale opens at 8 A. M. A limited number of tickets will be reserved for College officers and invited guests.
7t[A] o 7

Symphony Tickets.

REHEARSALS: E-23-24. F-23-24. H-23-24. I-24-25-26-27. Q-26-27-28-29. R-8-9. S-8-9.

CONCERTS: G-12-13. H-26-27. I-18-19. Q-24-25.

ON SALE AT

HEARD'S TICKET OFFICE,

43 WEST STREET.

1t[A]

Telephone 3544.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Thirteenth Season. 1893-94.

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 14, 1893, to April 28, 1894, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1893, Jan. 13, Feb. 10, and March 31, 1894, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1893, to April 27, 1894, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1893, Jan. 12, Feb. 9 and March 30, 1894.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals $12 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be resold. 7t[A] s 16

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS
After filling orders, have a few seats left. 63 Harrison Avenue, Room A, 9 to 10 A. M. 1t[A] o 7

"EMIL PAUR, BOSTON."

The New Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Thorndike.

On the register of the Thorndike, under date of September 30, appears the name, written in broad, straggling characters, hard to decipher.

EMIL PAUR, BOSTON.

It was set down, at a few minutes after 6 o'clock, by a heavily built man with a kind, fatherly face, long, flowing locks and a beard that was at once light in color and light in texture, which curled about his chin like that of a Norse god.

It was the autograph of Mr. Paur, who will this winter direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he wrote the word "Boston" he observed with a satisfied smile, "I want to show that I come from a civilized place." He said this in the purest German, but Mr. John Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra, who came on with Mr. Paur from New York and acts as his interpreter, guide, philosopher and friend, translated the remark.

Besides Mr. Sauerquell came Mrs. Paur and the two little boys of the distinguished couple. They arrived on the fast "limited" train over the Providence Division of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, which was in on time. They walked through Church Street to the Thorndike, where rooms were assigned them, and where they will remain until Mr. Paur finds a house to his liking.

While supper was being prepared Mr. and Mrs. Paur were presented to several members of the orchestra who had made their acquaintance years before in Germany. The reunion was a happy one.

Then, as the evening was so pleasant, the whole party strolled out of doors and slowly walked up and down the shaded paths of the Public Garden. Mr. Paur looked with some astonishment at the loving couples who adorned every other bench, generally closely entwined within one another's arms, but he said nothing. The spectacle evidently surprised him.

When they were back at the hotel the newly arrived, with one or two friends, including Mrs. Paur and the little boys, sat down to tea, which lasted until a late hour.

The new leader's eyes sparkled, and they all seemed to be having a right good time. To the Journal reporter's inquiry he said that he was in the best of health and spirits and that so were all of his party. He expected to remain at the Thorndike for some time.

By-and-by the maid invaded the dining room and bore off the little boys to bed, but the older folks sat up until midnight, talking of times past, present and future.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

MAY BE HAD AT CONNELLY'S TICKET OFFICE,
6t[A] ADAMS HOUSE 02

SYMPHONY.

After filling orders, we have a few choice seats left at low prices at CASHIN'S Ticket Agency, Young's Hotel. 1t[A]

SYMPHONY.

All advance orders for the rehearsals and concerts should be sent to me on or before nine o'clock Monday next, the 25th, for rehearsals, and ten o'clock Thursday morning, the 28th, for the concerts. Each order should be as explicit as possible and contain full address.

CONNELLY'S

THEATRE TICKET OFFICE,

ADAMS HOUSE.

5t[A]

010

1893. Symphony. 1894

Orders now booked for Rehearsal and Concert Tickets for season at

CASHIN'S TICKET AGENCY,
YOUNG'S HOTEL
1t[A]

Symphonies.

Orders fulfilled by

JOHN R. HEARD,

Theatre Ticket Agency, 43 WEST STREET.

6t[A]

010

SYMPHONY.

Orders taken for REHEARSALS and CONCERTS. Apply to T. B. DILLAWAY, 453 Washington Street. 7t[A] 010

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Two seats for Rehearsals, rear row first balcony, opposite stage. Twenty-five dollars for the two. Address G. P. O., Boston Transcript. 1t[A]

SYMPHONY TICKETS

For sale and to rent. Miss E. GOERING, 2 Hamilton place. 1t[A] 07

Symphony Tickets.

HEARD'S TICKET OFFICE, 43 WEST ST. 1t[A] 026

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

For sale, 3 seats for Saturday concerts, first balcony, numbers 521, 522 and 523; $13 each. Apply at Room 70, Equitable Building. 4t[A] 04

TWO CONCERT SEATS

In second row of first balcony on left side facing stage, one-half way back, bought by mistake, may be secured for $21.50 each, by addressing A. W. N., Boston Transcript. 4t[A] 04

TWO SATURDAY EVENING

SYMPHONY SEATS in L. Price $25 each. Address P. R. A., Boston Transcript. 2t[A] 06

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

I have two seats on floor in row V for $23 each. Address K. S. G., Boston Transcript. 2t[A] 06

EMIL PAUR.

Journal

Interview with New Leader of Symphony Orchestra.

Expresses Great Satisfaction with the Same.

Herr and Mrs. Paur Pleasantly Situated in Their New Home.

The autumn wind was blowing and the restless gusts were carrying the dead leaves about yesterday afternoon when the Journal representative alighted from the car and turned into Burroughs Street, Jamaica Plain, on his way to interview Herr Emil Paur, the now fully established leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

As that light haired and bearded musical genius does not understand the simplest word of English, and as the Journal man was equally ignorant of German, it was not without apprehension that he undertook his mission.

The Paur household has become fully settled in their comely little residence, and before the Journal man rang the bell he had opportunity to observe the well-ordered condition of the grounds.

The bell was answered by a rather stout and short German maid, with a white apron.

"Herr Paur," said the Journal man, not daring to startle her with any further inquiry in English.

"Nein" came from the maiden, with a shake of her head.

"Mrs. Paur, is she at home?" said the newspaper man, whose courage had somewhat rallied.

This remark was followed by the disappearance of the maid through the door at the end of the hall.

She presently returned, and with some expression in her native tongue and a wave of her hand the Journal man was ushered into a neatly furnished reception room.

Mrs. Paur had evidently been occupied in selecting branches of autumn leaves from the trees, for as she entered the room she held a large bunch in her hand.

"I came to see Herr Paur, but he is away, I understand."

"Yes," replied Mrs. Paur, "he has gone to make arrangements for securing an English teacher. He is so sorry that he had not the time to learn the language that he is now making hasty preparation to educate himself in that direction."

Her husband is evidently a favorite subject with Mrs. Paur, for she talked pleasantly, giving the Journal man some idea of how quickly they had decided to come to this country.

"It was in July we decided to come; so you see that we are both to be excused if we do not understand English. But we soon will," she exclaimed, with a smile.

